There are many more who were so eager to receive an education that they transgressed or challenged laws which were barriers to their ability to realize their goals. For example, during slavery, when it was illegal to teach slaves to read and write, a freed black man by the name of Daniel Payne established a clandestine school for slaves in South Carolina.

After the abolition of slavery, through self-help, philanthropy, and sheer determination, black men and women quenched their thirst for education in schools commonly known as freedmen schools. These schools, some of which are today's historically black colleges, educated about 200,000 students. These colleges and universities have educated countless African-Americans who have distinguished themselves in the fields of education, medicine, law, music, art, science, and technology.

In more recent history, Thurgood Marshall, a great legal scholar, led the successful battle in Brown versus Board of Education which declared segregation in public schools unconstitutional.

Thurgood Marshall litigated several other successful cases challenging discrimination in voting rights, housing, education, and transportation. He was subsequently appointed by President Lyndon Johnson to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and later became the first black Supreme Court Justice. As a member of the Supreme Court, he has had a profound impact on the ability of minority students to have equal educational opportunities.

Today, I am honored to recognize the achievements of those individuals who were determined to learn and those who were committed to teaching. The value of education has been indisputable and in spite of legal and societal obstacles, the African-American community has furthered its goals through education. African-Americans have also contributed to the improvement of the quality of life in this country and in other parts of the world. Clearly, the legacy of Dr. Carter G. Woodson is still alive.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New Jersey for his contribution to this special order, and I am pleased at this time to yield to the distinguished Representative from the State of Maryland, who has the distinction of being the second black American in history to be elected to represent the great State in this body, a very valuable member of the Congressional black Caucus, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MFUME].

Mr. MFUME. I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] for yielding this time.

I do not know exactly what else I can add to all that has been said preceding me except to talk about chronologically some of the developments that have taken place in this Nation, as it relates to persons of African ancestry, and to talk about the conditions that exist now that I think are underlined and underscored as we celebrate Black History Month.

No matter what part of our recent history we choose to select from the year 1620 and beyond, we would agree that there were always those of us whose ancestors stumbled but refused to fall, bent but refused to break, tired but refused to quit; they were burdened yet unbowed.

We look at that period and move onward to the period of the Revolutionary War. It is instructive to take note of the fact that the first person to die in that war for this Nation was an African American, Crispus Attucks, not because he was necessarily brave or had some special quality, but he had a basic understanding of democracy and how to preserve a democracy and was willing to make the ultimate sacrifice.

So long after the Revolutionary War up until the 1800's, when we got into an era where cotton was king and where the historian John Hope Franklin called it the peculiar institution in America's history. That institution of slavery that ran all the way up to 1865 culminated with the Civil War in this Nation, and out of that the experiences of that war we had, as we come to know it at least, the Emancipation Proclamation.

The Emancipation Proclamation was signed by Lincoln, which is still celebrated today as Jubilee Day on the east coast and is Juneteenth Day in the West and Midwest, served pretty much as a threshold for the launching of a new era. We moved from emancipation to reconstruction. After that, the end of reconstruction, unfortunately, this Nation took a giant step backward where we entered what was known as the era of Jim Crow.

The era of Jim Crow has a peculiarity about it also. It offered up for the first time things such as the grandfather clause, where you could not vote unless your grandfather voted, but since your grandfather was a slave you to all intents and purposes could not vote.

Things such as the literacy test, which meant that you had to be able to recite at will any part of the Constitution that was asked of you to prove you were literate enough to vote.

Then we moved from that to what was known as the white primaries, where you could only vote in the primary election if you were white, and then you could only vote in general elections after that if you were black, but since most of the decisions were made in the primary elections you were still disenfranchised.

So that period of Jim Crow went from the end of reconstruction in the late 1800's all the way up until the civil rights era of the 1950's and 1960's. Many of us know what happened from that point onward.

I indicated as I began my remarks by saying that there was not a whole lot to add to what has already been said in the hour or so preceding me except to point out a very real fact, and that is that in employment, housing, health care, education, there is still a discrepancy in this Nation where African-Americans, regardless of their rich history, find themselves at a disadvantage, and that celebrations such as this are important and warranted.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] for year after year bringing us to this point. I would simply say that we must also use it as a point of instruction to realize how far we need to go in this Nation to bring about true democracy for all its citizens.

Mr. STOKES. I thank the distinguished gentleman for his contribution to this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield to the last speaker in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, it might be well for me to observe at this point in time that five members of the Congressional Black Caucus happen to be ministers in this Congress in addition to being Members of Congress.

The gentleman to whom I now yield hails from New York. He is the first Afro-American in the AME Church to be elected to the Congress, as a very distinguished black America.

Mr. FLAKE. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. Speaker, and to the Congressman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES] I certainly think it is an honor and privilege to be here to share in this special order. I think it is important as we consider how far we have come, to take a moment to talk about the denomination of which I am a part, because it represents the first formal founding of an African-American church in this Nation.

In 1787, Richard Allen purchased his freedom and went to worship in St. George's AME Church in Philadelphia.

Worshiping in the balcony, he and members of that congregation found themselves on their knees at the altar on a Sunday morning being physically removed, put out of the door of that church and determining that they would not go back there, that they would worship in dignity, they would have self-esteem and somehow they would find a way to express their feelings about God in their own way.

So up the street from St. George's, in a blacksmith shop, they began to worship in their way of worshiping and calling forth all people who were free, people who were descendants from Africa, people who had a will for self-expression, people who wanted an opportunity to be themselves, free to worship, being somehow able to make a difference in the society of which they were a part.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church brought together a group of people of limited education and in spite of that decided to start night classes, which ultimately culminated in the founding of the first university owned and operated by African-Americans in this land, Wilberforce University in 1856.

From that, they developed 11 other colleges and universities which have historically been at the forefront of educational change.

From that blacksmith shop the church has grown to a membership of over 2 million people in the United States, Europe, the Caribbean, and Africa.

I would say to Members, Mr. Speaker, I am not the first African-American to serve in Congress. I am happy for this opportunity to share with Members that the first African-American in the U.S. House of Representatives, Mr. Hiram Revels, was an African Methodist Episcopalian clergyman. Joseph Rainey, who served in the Congress from the 41st through the 45th Congress was also a member of the African Methodist Episcopalian Church clergy. I am pleased to be the third in the line of those to serve in Congress out of the African Methodist Church. I am proud to be a part of that, a movement of freedom, a voice of hope, a voice of salvation and education, one of social concern and political awareness. The church has not restricted itself just to those things which are religious, but also had adopted itself to a concern about those things which are profane and secular. I thank God for an opportunity that we could share this day, our legacy and our heritage, for not only the Members of this Congress but the members of this Nation and this world.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE] for his participation in the special order. Mr. Speaker, I want to especially thank all the Members of the House who have taken the time out of their very busy schedules to come here and participate in this special order on the floor this afternoon.

In addition to that, many of our colleagues, in the interest of time, have submitted their remarks for the RECORD.

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my distinguished colleagues in speaking in honor of Black History Month. The outstanding contributors and achievements which African-Americans have made to our Nation since its inception makes it appropriate that we set aside this month to honor and remember those individuals that have helped make America the great Nation that it is today.

In 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, known as the father of black history, established Negro History Week. In 1976 it was extended to a month because he recognized the need for all Americans to remember the history and culture of black Americans.

Today I join my distinguished colleagues in commemorating this special month, not only for African-Americans, but all Americans. Today is a time that we should reflect on great Americans such as Harriet Tubman, Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, Booker T. Washington, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and others who played vital roles in adding meaning to the development of democracy in America.

This is a time that we talk with our people and tell them of our rich and unique heritage. We must tell them of the uniqueness of our people. Reassuring them that the troubles of today are only temporary—if they keep their eyes on the prize. Dr. Woodson recognized this need when he started Black History Week some 60-odd years ago.

When I reflect on the contributions of African-Americans I tend to look at those involved in the civil rights and labor movements. Although they were seemingly two seperate movements there was only one goal and that goal was and continues to be, equality for all Americans. Equality in the workplace, as well as equality in all aspects of society, regardless of one's creed, color, or religion.

In the labor movement there were many struggles for the rights of African-Americans. From the formation of the first trade unions in the 1790's to the mid-1930's, the policy and practice of organized labor, as far as black workers were concerned, was largely outright exclusion or segregation. But because of the united front and adversity of African-Americans union members discrimination has been addressed and it will someday be eradicated from the workplace. I would like to take some time to honor two labor organizations: the American League of Colored Laborers and the Colored National Labor Union.

Before the Civil War, African-Americans had started to recognize the power of togetherness and organization. The American League of Colored Laborers was organzied in New York City in 1850, with Frederick Douglass as its vice-president. The main objective of the organization was to promote unity among mechanics, foster training in agriculture, industrial arts, and commerce, and assist member mechanics in setting up business for themselves.

In 1869, another group, the Colored National Labor Union issued its first appeal for the unity of American workers without regard to race or color. Nine Philadelphia garment cutters, whose union had been shattered and its members blacklisted, formed a secret society that ultimately was to transform this sentiment into reality. They named it the Noble Order of the Knights of Labor. By 1886 it had more than 1 million members. It had achieved what no labor body before it had accomplished, the organization and unification of the American working class.

In 1972, I, along with William Lucy, Nelson Jack Edwards, Cleveland Robinson, and William Simons, formed the Coalition of Black Trade Unionists. We formed this coalition to stress the significance of the black struggle for social and economic equality. Now after 18 years, this organization is still going strong. And we will continue to address the concerns of working Americans. Today there are a number of very influential African-Americans continuing to push the labor movement forward. With the recognition of these influential African-Americans during Black History Month, it is my hope that younger African-Americans will continue to carry the torch.

Black History Month is a time to learn from history and learn from our successes, as well as from our mistakes. Many strides have been made in the civil rights and labor movements in recent years. Unfortunately, recent incidents of racial discrimination, and Supreme Court decisions lets me know that the fight for equality is not finished. We must do more to expand employment and educational opportunities for young black Americans. Especially our young black men. Only yesterday a report was released that said one-fourth of all black males are either incarcerated or paroled. This is a sad figure and that is why I will continue to fight in this body to vote for legislation that will give every American a decent standard of living and opportunity to enjoy freedom and equality.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it is more than fitting that we commemorate this year's celebration of Black History Month by paying special tribute to its original founder, the late Dr. Carter G. Woodson.

Dr. Woodson was a great American in every sense of the term, because throughout his life he sought to make America an all-inclusive society for everyone, regardless of race, creed, or gender. He was in the forefront of the educational effort to make black America an integral part of this all-inclusive society, through his untiring efforts to broaden the scope of black self-awareness and intensify black pride through a thorough study of black history.

Born the son of former slaves in New Canton, VA, on December 19, 1870, Dr. Woodson knew from first-hand experience the demeaning, dehumanizing mode of life and labor forced on black Americans by the post-Civil War system of apartheid that we called segregation. It is to his eternal credit, and to our collective benefit, that he devoted his life's work to eradicating the stigmas and stereotypes of segregation imposed by a majority racist society on its nonwhite minorities.

Dr. Woodson holds a special place in the minds, hearts, and souls of black Americans because he sought to teach us the fuller meaning and better understanding of the totality of the black experience in America throughout our struggle for freedom and full equality in every aspect of American life. In 1916 he organized the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History [ASNLH], from which has flowed the increasing interest in, and demand for, the expansion of black history and black studies as valid intellectual and academic enterprises.

In his voluminous speeches and writings Dr. Woodson consistently argued that all Americans, regardless of color, had much to learn of value from a careful study of the black experience. But he also emphasized that black Americans needed most of all to study their own history, to gain a better appreciation of the struggles of their forebears and a more comprehensive understanding of their own cultural traditions. His establishment of the Journal of Negro History provided a scholarly forum for the publication of articles and reviews that could expand the scope of the learning process about our multidimensional past. For that endeavor alone, we are all in his debt.

In 1926 Dr. Woodson was also the moving force in initiating the celebration of Black History Week which, since 1976, has become Black History Month. My hope is that this annual commemoration of the black past and present will continue to grow as a necessary learning experience for all Americans, so that we can all work together to heal the wounds of racism and to struggle together so that all of us can live out the full meaning of the promises contained in the Declaration and the Bill of Rights.

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today, during this Black History Month, to recognize the contributions of black Americans to our Nation's history, and to the history of the world.

The achievements of black Americans are many. They include outstanding contributions in many areas. In fact, black Americans have produced outstanding men and women in every field of endeavor—after they broke down the walls of exclusion.

It is proper that the theme of this Black History Month be in honor of Dr. Carter G. Woodson, the great historian and educator who contributed so much to the study of Africans in America, and who explained perhaps better than anyone the crippling result of our failure to understand black history and afford it its deserved place among subjects. The achievements of Dr. Woodson and others are vital and they deserve recognition throughout the year.

I want to focus my remarks on black Americans' unique contribution to what is clearly the most powerful force in the world today—the idea of freedom. The human desire for democracy which is rapidly transforming our world, from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union to South Africa, Central America, and Asia. It is that same idea which has motivated black Americans to struggle against slavery and its legacy, segregation, and racism.

To most of the settlers who flocked to the New World, America was a land of vast opportunity and hope. Yet, before the new nation could begin, early Americans had to defeat colonial domination. So it was particularly ironic, and tragic, that to those Americans of African descent, this new land of bright promise for most was a land of darkness, slavery, and oppression.

When the Declaration of Independence was signed in 1776, forcefully declaring that "all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights," among which are the "Right to Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness," black Americans were not considered men. When the Constitution was completed in 1787, with the eloquent beginning, "We the People," blacks were not included in the "We."

The Constitution was never intended to include blacks, women, or native Americans in the "more perfect union" that the Founding Fathers envisioned. The blessings of liberty were to be secured for some, while holding others in bondage. In the original Constitution, blacks were considered to be three-fifths of men, there was a clause protecting the international slave trade, and there was a fugitive slave clause.

As we marvel at the mostly peaceful process of change in Eastern Europe, and hope for peaceful change in South Africa, we must grapple with the fact that our own evil empire was ended only after a bitter and bloody war which split this Nation in two. And we must reckon with the years of official apartheid and racist violence which endured, and the legacy which remains.

We are inspired by the people of Eastern Europe. Yet, the story of black Americans, who have pressed forward the struggle for freedom after surviving in a hostile, foreign land, against a captor who maintained his grip only through forbidding laws, lynchings, and the whip, is submerged. There is inspiration here as well.

At times in our history in America, blacks have been randomly murdered, raped, castrated, beaten, and, exploited, systematically denied the opportunity to fulfill our potential as human beings, and widely regarded as inherently less intelligent than others.

Yet, motivated by the desire to be free, black Americans have forged ahead, breaking down barriers, achieving against the odds. When little girls were bombed in church, communities terrorized, and leaders assassinated, black Americans have continued their quest for freedom. When Presidents and Congresses turned their backs, and Supreme Court of the Nation's ruled that "blacks had no rights, a white was bound to respect," and that "separate but equal" was constitutional, black Americans continued their quest for freedom.

As a result, the Constitution which we cherish is not the same document drafted 203 years ago. The 14th amendment conferred equal citizenship upon the freedmen; the 15th amendment prohibited States from denying blacks the right to vote—yet these two amendments were more laxly enforced than any other part of the Constitution for three quarters of a century. But in the 1950's and 1960's, they became the basis for Supreme Court decisions and civil rights legislation, including the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which have propelled us until today.

The black struggle for freedom has changed the Constitution, and it has changed the character of our Nation. It has broken down the walls of legal segregation and disenfranchisement, pushing our Nation from hypocracy, on the road to real democracy. In so doing, black Americans have motivated freedom fighters the world over.

Perhaps it is this spirit—the will to overcome the highest mountain or endure the darkest night in the quest for freedom—which is the essence of black history. In the 1990's, we are witnessing freedom breakout around the world. I am proud of the contribution black Americans have made to this struggle—and I look forward to the contributions which certainly are to come.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, in conjunction with Black History Month, which the Nation is celebrating this February, I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to a distinguished American who was important in encouraging black involvement in politics as well as a leading advocate for protecting the right of black Americans to vote. That man is the late Honorable George Washington Murray, who served as a Republican Representative from South Carolina to Congress from 1893 until 1897.

George Washington Murray came from humble beginnings, being born a slave in Sumter County on September 24, 1853, to become a skilled orator and a resourceful leader. From 1874 to 1876 he was one of the first black students to attend the recently integrated University of South Carolina, which is located in my district. Thereafter, for 15 years, he taught school and operated a small farm until 1890 when he was appointed to the important post of inspector of customs at the Charleston Customs House.

Thereupon, he launched his national political career by announcing his candidacy for the Republican congressional nomination. Murray successfully beat back several challenges to his electoral victories and demonstrated his independence of thought and action even as a freshman Member of Congress. Matters that drew his attention included the free-silver coinage issue, improving education, and aid to the needy. During this time, he remained active in the fight against the political disenfranchisement of black Americans. In order to promote black property ownership, he purchased 10,000 acres of land himself and resold tracts to black farmers.

Mr. Murray played an integral role in attempts to unify the Republican Party in the South, serving as the State chairman and as a delegate to several national conventions. Upon leaving Congress, he engaged in the real estate business and also devoted his time to lecturing and literary pursuits. He continued to be an active speaker and political figure until his death in Chicago in 1926.

George Washington Murray's life remains a testament to the heights that may be reached through perseverance, a yearning for education, a striving for justice, and a dedication to the full development of one's own God-given talents. It is fitting that we pay tribute to his accomplishments during this special month honoring the numerous and worthy contributions made by black Americans toward the greatness of the United States.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Carter G. Woodson, whose contributions preserved the rich and detailed legacy of black history in our Nation, and whose perseverance led to the establishment of Black History Month.

At 1538 Ninth Street, in northwest Washington, there is a historical site not known to many visitors to our Nation's Capital, nor to historians who have documented this city's rich heritage. This site is filled with the memories of one who devoted his life to preserving and documenting the historic contributions of African-Americans. The site is the home of Dr. Carter G. Woodson, the founder of the Association for the Study of Negro—now Afro-American—Life and History, and the father of Black History Month.

Dr. Woodson established the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History in 1915. Too often, he saw the works and achievements of African-Americans ignored and exploited by other historians. He devoted his life to ensuring these contributions became an integral part of American history. Dr. Woodson also saw the importance of sharing these achievements with scholars throughout the world and began publishing the Journal of Negro History in 1916. The journal is now entering its 75th year of publication.

People of this Nation have benefited from the knowledge contained in the volumes of this journal and have been enlightened by the intellectual achievements it records. I credit the Journal of Negro History for the preservation of African-American heritage within my home State of North Carolina and for recognizing the contributions of many persons and institutions in my district.

The contributions of North Carolina citizens like the Honorable James Adams Hyman of the 44th Congress, the Honorable James Edward O'Hara of the 48th–49th Congresses, the Honorable Henry Plummer Cheatham of the 51st–52d Congresses, and the Honorable George Henry White of the 55th–56th Congresses can be found within the binders of this journal. These men were the first African-American North Carolinians to serve in the U.S. House of Representatives.

The pages of the journal also include the history of distinguished colleges and universities in our country, like Show University and St. Augustine's College, historically black colleges in my district. Shaw University was founded in 1865 and is the site of the first 4-year medical school in the Nation. St. Augustine's College was established in 1867 by the Freemen's Commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church for the sole purpose of providing education and training for former slaves.

To encourage recognition of the contributions and achievements of African-Americans, Dr. Woodson went a step further to designate the week encompassing February 12th and 14th as Negro History Week. This week was chosen to honor the birth dates of two Americans—Abraham Lincoln and Frederick Douglass—who changed the lives of African-Americans in this country. It was later expanded into Black History Month.

The achievements of African-American men and women in this country are worthy of recognition and we owe the opportunity to share in this rich heritage, in large part, to Dr. Carter Woodson and all other scholars who have followed in his footsteps. I hope that we will continue to recognize the legacy of his work, accept the challenges it poses for us, and learn from his struggles and achievements. American history is incomplete if we do not recognize the contributions that Dr. Woodson worked to preserve.

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, as we know, February is Black History Month. Africans first stepped on American soil in 1619. In those 371 years, the history of black Americans has been marred by slavery, injustice, and racism.

However, in the face of these overwhelming obstacles black Americans have survived and often prospered. These people of strength and courage excelled in fields as varied as law, medicine, science, journalism, business, the arts, and religion. It is in recognition of the struggle and achievements of these incredible people that I present to you portraits of men who used their talent to benefit all people. These black American inventors did not allow prejudice to dowse the fire of imagination nor bigotry to put out the flame of knowledge. Instead they used their intelligence, ingenuity, and determination to enlighten the world. These men may may not be well-known figures, but they contributed substantially to the history of our country.

I do this in the hope that the knowledge of their struggle and ultimate triumph will inspire yet another generation to work to overcome any obstacle which may be encountered on the long and arduous road to freedom. As Dr. Martin Luther King said in his last speech, "I know that we as a people will get to the promised land someday."

These portraits are taken from the Encyclopedia of Black America, edited by W. Augustus Low and Virgil A. Clift, and the Black Almanac by Alton Hornsby, Jr. I commend these gentlemen on their enlightening work.

NORBERT RILLIEUX

Norbert Rillieux was born in New Orleans in 1806 to a Black mother and a White father. His father sent him to school in Paris. In 1830, he became an instructor of applied mechanics at L'Ecole Centrale in Paris.

After his return to the states, Rillieux built and installed a triple effect evaporator to process and refine sugar. However, this device had only limited success. Undaunted, he continued to work on the refining method. In 1846, he obtained a patent for the revolutionary multiple-effect vacuum evaporation process for refining sugar to obtain a whiter and grainier product. Before Rillieux's refining method, sugar was a luxury item used on rare occasions. In addition to making sugar accessible to many people, Rillieux's invention promoted manufacturing efficiency in reducing fuel consumption and labor requirements necessary for the production of the final product. The technique became the basic manufacturing process in sugar as well as condensed milk, soap, gelatin and glue.

Frustrated and disillusioned by racial discrimination in Louisiana, Rillieux returned to Paris in 1861.

LEWIS LATIMER

Lewis Latimer was born in Chelsea, Massachusetts in 1848. Latimer was a self-taught draftsman.

In 1876, Alexander Graham Bell asked Latimer to develop the blueprints for his telephone patent. In addition to his work on the telephone, Latimer was the only Black member of the Edison Pioneers, a group of distinguished scientists and inventors who worked with Thomas Edison.

In 1882, Latimer received a patent for manufacturing carbon filaments. This process proved superior to any other because the carbon filaments, made from cellulose of cotton thread or bamboo were excellent conductors of electricity. Prior to Latimer, others had attempted to develop a fiber suitable for filament. However these inventions were unsuccessful because they had a short life or low conductivity. Latimer's use of carbon filaments, which allowed durability, longevity and conductivity paved the way for the widespread use of electric light.

JAN EARNEST MATZELIGER

Jan Earnest Matzeliger was born in Surinam in 1852. At 19, he became a merchant seaman and sailed to America.

He settled in Lynn, Massachusetts. In the nineteenth century, Lynn, Massachusetts was the capital of the shoe industry. Matzeliger spoke little or no English when he arrived. However, he worked in a shoe manufacturing factory and attended school in the evenings where he learned to speak English fluently.

When Matzeliger began working in the shoe industry, the process of attaching leather uppers to the sole of the shoe was done by a manual process that required highly skilled craftsmen. This costly and tedious labor intensive process made the cost of shoes extremely expensive. In 1880, Matzeliger invented a machine which automated the process of stitching the leather upper to the sole of the shoe. Matzeliger's invention produced shoes ten times faster than the hands of a shoe craftsman.

Matzeliger's invention made Lynn, Massachusetts the undisputed shoe capital of the world. Over the next two years, he obtained four additional patents covering specific improvements on his machine. By 1889, the demand for his "hand-laster" had become worldwide.

GARRETT MORGAN

Garrett Morgan was born in 1875 in Paris, Tennessee. Morgan developed his first invention a belt fastener for sewing machines in 1901.

In 1914, he won the First Grand Prize Gold Medal at the Second International Exposition of Sanitation and Safety for his breathing helmet and smoke protector (gas mask). Because of widespread doubt as to the efficacy of his machine Morgan demonstrated the use of this device in the rescue operations following an explosion in a tunnel at the Cleveland Waterworks that trapped many workers below Lake Erie. The gas mask gained wider acceptance in World War I when it was used to protect against the use of poisonous gas.

Finally, in 1923, Morgan developed an automatic stop sign to aid the movement of traffic. He sold the rights to this invention to General Electric.

Everyday, we encounter the contributions of these Black inventors. From the time you put sugar in your morning coffee (Rillieux), put on your shoes (Matzeliger), stop at a traffic signal (Morgan) on your drive to work and arrive at your office to turn on the lights (Latimer). So the next time you do any of these things, think of them and understand that the intelligence and ingenuity of these Black men have improved your life.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, in honor of Black History Month, I would like to take this opportunity to insert in the record a excellent column by a dear friend of mine, James "Cap" Wheeler, on the crucial role African-Americans have played in the American labor movement. Cap Wheeler has been active in the United Auto Workers since the early 1950's at the Buick Foundry in Flint, MI. For the past 4 years he has served as financial secretary for UAW Local 599, the local of which my father was a member. Cap's column appeared on the front page of the Headlight, the union paper for Local 599.

As one who has been on the forefront of the struggle for civil rights for all Americans as well as the struggle for dignity in the workplace for American working men and women, Cap Wheeler brings a unique perspective to the history of African-Americans in the labor movement. I heartily commend Cap's column to all my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

[From Headlight, Feb. 8, 1990]

FEBRUARY: BLACK HISTORY MONTH

(By James "Cap" Wheeler)

Did you know blacks and unions go back a long way? The first blacks in America in the 1600s were not slaves but servants working in homes, just as many white immigrants were. Many bought land and prospered after their service was done.

Black workers were joining unions well before the slaves were freed in 1863. For example:

In 1838 the Caulkers Association organized in Baltimore to bargain with shipyard owners.

In 1850 the Waiters Protective Association organized in New York to improve wages and working conditions.

African-American longshoremen in Georgia and South Carolina staged strikes for justice in the mid 1860s. In 1871 the Longshoremen Association Number 1 organized in Baltimore.

In 1877 the Black Washerwomen in Galveston, Texas called for higher wages and refused to work for less than $1.50 a day. When the Black Washerwomen in Atlanta, Georgia went on strike, 1,000 black workers joined them, including cooks, servants and child nurses.

One of labor's greatest heroes is A. Phillip Randolph, whose memory was honored by a special stamp the U.S. Post Office issued last year. (This stamp is one of three that was chosen for our 50th Anniversary celebration at Local 599 an can still be obtained for 35¢ each.) Randolph organized the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters back in 1925, when the railroad was the way to travel.

When the Congress of Industrial Unions (CIO) began the greatest organizing drive in American history in 1936, blacks played a key role in unionizing steel, auto, rubber and meat packing.

The last automaker the UAW organized was the Ford Motor Company, which used violence and fear to keep out the union. Ford was the only major automaker that hired many blacks in the old days, and it brought in African-Americans from the South as scabs. With the help of local black workers and religious leaders, especially Rev. Charles Hill, the black workers came out of the plant and joined the strike that brought Ford management to its knees in April, 1941.

The UAW joined the Civil Rights movement with enthusiasm. The late UAW President Walter Reuther was the only white international union president to walk arm and arm with Dr. Martin Luther King during the famous marches of the 1960s.

Even in South Africa the UAW is at the forefront of the struggle to win justice. UAW President Owen Bieber has fasted, joined demonstrations, been arrested and traveled to South Africa to support freedom movements. Our pressure helped free South African Metalworker's Union President Moses Mayekiso last year after he was charged with treason.

As Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. said in his address to the AFL-CIO Convention, December, 1961 . . .

"I look forward confidently to the day when all who work for a living will be one with no thought to their separateness as Negroes, Jews, Italians or any other distinctions. This will be the day when we bring into full realization the American dream—a dream as yet unfulfilled. A dream of equality of opportunity, of privilege and property widely distributed; a dream of a land where men will not take necessities from the many to give luxuries to the few; a dream of a land where men will not argue that the color of a man's skin determines the content of his character; a dream of a nation where all our gifts and resources are held not for ourselves alone, but as instruments of service for the rest of humanity; the dream of a country where every man will respect the dignity and worth of the human personality. That is the dream. . . ."

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues today to pay tribute to the accomplishments and contributions that black Americans have made to our Nation. I deem it an honor to address my colleagues on a subject as important as this. The contributions that blacks have made to our great country have long been ignored and often forgotten by many.

Mrs. Harriet Tubman, one of the true reformers of the 1800's, and one of the true giants in black history, was a resident of the city of Auburn, which is in the 29th Congressional District of New York. She lived there during the 1850's until her death in 1913. Mrs. Tubman was born a slave in 1821 on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. She dedicated her life to seeing that slaves would someday experience freedom. She defied slave custom and refused to become a part of a system in which she did not believe. Although slavery did not offer Mrs. Tubman the opportunity to attend school, she possessed innate intelligence and creativity as well as extraordinary foresight and judgment. Having worked the fields, this muscular, small-framed woman was determined to use her inner strength to be free.

Mrs. Tubman escaped from her slave owners in Maryland, and began her journey to freedom by the guidance of the North Star and aided by conductors of the Underground Railroad. Having discovered freedom in the North, she wanted others to experience the same. She made nearly 20 trips to the South on the Underground Railroad and led thousands of black slaves to freedom.

During her many travels to Canada, Mrs. Tubman visited Auburn, NY. At that time, Auburn was experiencing a period of radical reform and abolitionist activity. Tubman settled in Auburn in 1857. Then U.S. Senator William Henry Seward violated Federal law by selling her, an ex-slave, a plot of land.

The brick house built on that land by Tubman's second husband between 1875 and 1888 is adjoined by a 25-acre site which Tubman deeded to the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in 1903. Also located on the site is a reconstruction of the Tubman Home for Indigent and Aged Negroes that Tubman established, and where she lived from 1912 until her death there in 1913. Although Tubman served as a Union nurse during the Civil War, she had to wait 30 years before the Government granted her a meager $20-a-month pension for her wartime services. She died nearly penniless, but with full military honors.

The many contributions and the timeless effort that this fugitive slave, abolitionist, nurse, and social reformer gave cannot be detailed in this short speech. The greatness of her life represented almost a century of struggle, beginning with the Negro's fight against slavery and ending in efforts toward social justice.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, last year at this time the release of the most prominent political prisoner was a dream, an unrelenting struggle. Today Nelson Mandela is a partner at the negotiating table to disassemble the apartheid system in South Africa. As I join my colleagues in observing Black History Month this year, I feel a sense of renewed confidence in light of recent events. All around the world, people are waking up and finally beginning to realize that oppression is neither permissible nor popular; it can not and will not be accepted today. Perhaps this is a sign that slowly but steadily, we are becoming a more educated society.

Despite thousands of years of subjugation, black Americans have persevered. And many praises are due to one visionary black historian for his tremendous efforts in researching and recording the history of African-Americans. The son of former slaves, Carter G. Woodson rose from poverty in the post-Civil War South to become a highly educated and influential person instrumental in recovering the black experience. Woodson accurately realized that "the achievements of the Negro properly set forth will crown him as a factor in early human progress and a maker of modern civilization," however, if left unrecorded, such contributions might be relegated to the basement of American history or even worse, altogether forgotten.

Self-educated until the age of 17, Woodson went on to complete high school, received a degree in literature from Berea College, a B.A. and M.A. from the University of Chicago, and a Ph.D. from Harvard in 1912. Three years later, Carter Woodson founded the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History, and in 1916, he published the first edition of the scientific quarterly, Journal of Negro History. Woodson established the crucial foundation which disclosed the field of Negro history that had previously been overlooked and ignored. Independently, Woodson built the association with nothing more than his own energy and intellect and today the association is used by thousands of scholars.

This year it is especially fitting that we honor the father of black history for he was determined to educate the public about his people. In opening the door to black history, we can begin to understand and credit black Americans for their contributions. We can begin to eradicate our racial prejudices through discovering their source and in learning to appreciate the heritage of our fellow man.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I participate today in the commemoration of Black History Month and the father of black history, Dr. Carter G. Woodson. I would like to thank my colleague, Mr. STOKES, for once again organizing this important special order, giving us the opportunity to come together and share our thoughts and hopes during this special celebration.

We all know that history is not simply what happened, but how it is remembered. For centuries in this country, the contributions of black Americans have been ignored, glossed-over, and even undermined by historians, teachers, and the public at large. Whether by the distortion that comes from naivete, outright racism, or simply lack of information, our country's history books have excluded the outstanding contributions that black Americans have made in the building of our Nation.

If is was not for the renowned historian, Dr. Carter Godwin Woodson, this tragically neglected part of American history might be lost forever. Dr. Woodson diligently and brilliantly laid the foundation on which the current edifice of Afro-American studies is being built. Writing in the October 1975 issue of the Journal of Negro History, Michael Winston makes the following observations on Woodson:

His commitment was contagious. His burning determination was the inspiration of a whole generation of historians, teachers, and a black community eager for a knowledge of its past, hungry for pride, and for simple dignity in the face of doubt and denial.

Dr. Carter Woodson created the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History and the prestigious Journal of Negro History in 1915. He discovered, researched, and organized the body of knowledge of African-Americans, developed its bibliography as well as its methodology and philosophy. Moreover, he developed supports and techniques that perpetuated and popularized the field so that it became and remains the main source and vehicle of knowledge and pride for black people everywhere as well as for the scholar and more serious student.

In creating and cultivating the field of African-American history, Dr. Woodson amassed thousands of books, periodicals, documents, papers, and photographs on the subject. He possessed one of the largest collections of material on blacks owned by an individual. The most valuable part of his collection, his documents and papers, he gave to the Library of Congress for public use.

Thanks to Dr. Woodson, one day our Nation will be able to appreciate fully the greatness and importance of Afro-American history and the values that inhere in the black tradition. To date, however, only the surface of this history's richness has been scratched. I anxiously await the day when the value of black history and its traditions are actualized and fully ingested by black and white children and adults, as a natural part of social heritage. When that day comes, we all will realize the full significance of Dr. Carter Woodson's accomplishments and foresight.

Until that day, however, we must make a conscious effort to ensure that all Americans are aware of what blacks have experienced and given to this country. Their struggle continues and, during Black History Month, and every other month, we must focus on the past, present, and future of the black fight for social justice. This fight is far from over—race still remains a major disadvantage in many areas of our society. A third of African-Americans live in poverty or near poverty; their unemployment rate is twice that of whites. Their school dropout rate is reported to be as high as 50 percent in some urban areas. Meanwhile, African-Americans make up only 2 percent of this Nation's elected officials when they make up close to 13 percent of its overall population.

For African-Americans to win the struggle for economic and political equality, all Americans must know the full truth, importance, and beauty of black history. Carter Woodson realized this and, his message, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free," is as potent today as it was in his lifetime.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in the House in celebrating and commemorating February as Black History Month.

In 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, known as the father of black history, established Negro History Week—in 1976 extended to a month—because he recognized the need for all to recognize the history and culture of black Americans.

Our Nation recently observed a national holiday in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. I was a proud sponsor of the congressional resolution which established his birthday as a national holiday.

It is fitting that a month be set aside to honor the significant achievements of black Americans, many of whom have lived in Louisville and Jefferson County, KY, the district I am honored to represent in Congress.

Today, I wish to honor one such Louisville native, John W. Shannon, currently Under Secretary of the Army.

John Shannon was born and reared in Louisville before leaving for Central State University in Wilberforce, OH, where he earned a bachelor of science degree. John received his master of science degree from Shippensburg State College in Pennsylvania, attended Catholic University for postgraduate studies, and is a graduate of the U.S. Army War College.

John entered the U.S. Army, and during his excellent career which led to his eventual promotion to full colonel, he held various positions of leadership earning respect from his peers.

His career included two tours in Vietnam as an advisor and an Infantry battalion commander. Secretary Shannon earned numerous awards while on active duty, including the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star, and the Secretary of Defense Award for Outstanding Public Service, just to name a few.

Before serving as Under Secretary of the Army, John Shannon held the Assistant Secretary position for Installations and Logistics. He assisted in direct Army policy and activities of logistics, installation procedures, and preservation and restoration of the environment. He also managed the Army's Chemical Stockpile Disposal Program.

Last week in Louisville, I had the honor of attending a luncheon sponsored by the Intergovernmental Black History Committee at which John Shannon delivered the key remarks. It was then that I fully realized what an outstanding role model John is for many of black youths in Louisville.

I am proud to recognize Under Secretary John Shannon for his many contributions to Louisville, to America, and to the world.

I also extend best wishes and warmest regards to his wife, Jean, and their son, John, who is a lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserve, who, when a young student, was an intern in my office.

Speaking for my constituents in Louisville and Jefferson County, John, we are all very proud of you.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in commemorating Black History Month.

The idea of Black History Month originated with the great historian and educator Carter G. Woodson, who started Negro History Week in 1926. It has been an important tradition ever since. We observe it by reflecting on the African-American experience and recalling the accomplishments of black women and men in American history.

One of the greatest and most impressive of these individuals—indeed, one of the most remarkable Americans of this century—was a gentleman named A. Philip Randolph.

There is no monument to him in Washington. No Hollywood studio has made a feature-length movie about his life. As a matter of fact, many people of our generation probably have no idea who he was.

But this wise, kindly, shrewd man changed our country more than almost any of his contemporaries. We still live with his legacy. It seems to me that Black History Month is an appropriate time to recall who A. Philip Randolph was and what he did.

He was born in rural Florida in 1889, the son of an African Methodist minister.

As a boy, Randolph nearly witnessed the lynching of a black prisoner in the county jail. The lynching was forestalled only because Randolph's father called out his parishioners for an all-night vigil outside the jail. That vigil not only saved the life of the prisoner—it also taught the minister's son that if blacks were organized, they would have a chance to defend themselves.

Randolph evidently remembered that lesson some years later in New York City. In 1925, he was making ends meet as the editor of a black magazine called the Messenger when some Pullman car porters approached him. They had heard one of his speeches, and they asked him to help form a union. He said he would.

The project he was taking on must have seemed doomed from the start. After all, as historian Joseph Wilson later wrote, Randolph was setting out to organize the rank-and-file porters, those who made up the sleeping berths, shined the shoes, slept in the smoking cars, and catered to their passengers' whims.

On the other side was the billion-dollar Pullman Corp. which used company spies, stool pigeons, blackmail, bribery, physical intimidation, and mass firings to prevent unionization among its Afro-American workers.

But Randolph remembered his father's lesson. And somehow, against all odds, he and his colleagues won. After 12 long, difficult years, the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters was finally recognized by the Pullman Corp. in 1937 as the bargaining agent for the porters.

As Randolph's protege Bayard Rustin pointed out, this was the first time in American history that a black union had won an agreement with a white company. It was certainly one of the most dramatic triumphs in the history of the American labor movement.

The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters became the most influential black trade union in the country. In a few years, it had some 18,000 dues-paying members in more than 100 cities.

The union brought about huge improvements in the wages and working conditions of the porters. But its historic importance goes beyond that.

"Because of [Randolph's] broad social vision," Bayard Rustin wrote, "he understood that the new-found dignity and modest prosperity of the Pullman porters would never be secure in a society where the vast majority of black people still lived in poverty and fear." Randolph and his union committed themselves to civil rights at a time when the civil rights movement itself was little more than a distant dream.

Randolph's first great battle for civil rights came before Pearl Harbor. He had been pressing President Roosevelt to issue an Executive order that would end segregation in defense plants. Roosevelt was not too eager to desegregate, so Randolph planned a march on Washington in 1941 to push his demands.

The New York Times later noted that "the announcement horrified official Washington: the thought of thousands of blacks marching in what was still a southern city caused near panic."

The turning point came in a meeting between Randolph and Roosevelt. The President complained that if 100,000 blacks came to Washington, which was segregated, there would be no place for them to eat, to sleep, to go to the toilet. Randolph paused—then he told the President that if he was really so concerned about where marchers would eat, sleep, and go to the toilet, he could simply issue an Executive order desegregating all public accommodations in Washington.

According to Rustin, Roosevelt's cigaretteholder nearly fell from his mouth. Six months before Pearl Harbor, FDR signed a fair employment practices order that called for an end to discrimination in defense plant jobs, and Randolph called off the march.

Randolph may have had a feeling of deja vu in 1948 when he pressed President Truman to desegregate the armed services. He met with Truman, testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee, and led a group of picketers at the Democratic National Convention. It took a few weeks for a reluctant Truman to issue Executive Order 9981 banning racial discrimination in the military.

Throughout the 1950's and 1960's, Randolph was the elder statesman of the civil rights movement. Martin Luther King, Jr., Roy Wilkins, and other major civil rights leaders all called Randolph "the Chief." Our former colleague Andrew Young once declared, "We could not have had a successful civil rights movement without Mr. Randolph." He was right.

Randolph's crowning achievement was the 1963 March on Washington. He spoke from decades of experience when he said, "We are not a pressure group; we are not an organization or a group of organizations; we are not a mob. We are the advance guard of a massive moral revolution for jobs and freedom. This revolution reverberates through the land, touching every village where black men are segregated, oppressed, and exploited."

A. Philip Randolph lived his last years in a modest union-owned apartment in New York City. A few days after he died in 1979, the tax examiner looked over his apartment. He concluded that except for a broken television set, which maybe could have been fixed, the value of Randolph's material possessions was about $500.

But he really left us a legacy far greater than that.

He understood early on that true racial equality must be economic as well as legal. He knew that many black women and men worked in deplorable, inhumane conditions, and that too many of them could barely get by.

When Randolph looked around him, he knew that one of the main vehicles for equality of black working people should be the trade union movement. That became a cornerstone of his strategy.

Fifty years ago, that may not have seemed very sensible. Many unions had no interest at all in accepting black members. So Randolph set out to desegregate the union movement. He nudged, cajoled, and argued for desegregating unions until the day finally came when blacks could feel at home in the labor movement.

Things gradually changed. During the 1960's, the labor movement was one of the strongest supporters of the civil rights movement. Today, more African-Americans belong to unions than to any other nonreligious organizations. A. Philip Randolph deserves a lot of credit for that.

Another part of his legacy is a spirit of universality. After he died, Rustin observed that "the Chief's commitments were boundless * * *. He was a true partisan, that is, a partisan for all humanity, regardless of race, religion or nationality."

In 1942, Randolph urged Rustin and others to defend the rights of Japanese-Americans in internment camps. Randolph himself helped start the first committee in America against apartheid. He was a strong supporter of Israel. He spoke out for independence movements in Asia and Africa, and he sent representatives to India, Ghana, Nigeria, Zambia, Kenya, and Tanzania.

He never faltered. "Even a few days before his death," said Rustin, "he emphasized to me the urgency of assisting the many refugees from Haiti who are reaching our shores in search of freedom."

A. Philip Randolph has been dead for 11 years now, but his legacy seems as vital and useful now as ever. One of the best ways we can celebrate Black History Month is by contributing in some way to the movement for justice and decency and equality that was his life's work.

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, a theme is established each year as a focal point during our Nation's observance of Black History Month when we honor the past achievements and review the current status of black Americans. This year, the 1990 theme for Black History Month is "The Father of Black History, Carter G. Woodson: A Living Legacy."

Dr. Woodson, a noted black historian, originated the idea to acknowledge the many outstanding contributions of black Americans. He chose February as the month for this special observance because it was the month in which two men, both who fought for equality in their own way, were born: Abraham Lincoln on February 12, and Frederick Douglass on February 14.

First established as Negro History Week in 1926, this observance evolved into Black History Week in the early 1970's, and was established as Black History Month in 1976.

Dr. Woodson envisioned a special time when the Nation's attention was focused on the important part that black Americans have played from our Nation's earliest history today; in fact, there is no facet of society that has not benefited from and enjoyed the contributions of and leadership from black Americans.

Their successes span across education, science, industry, music, literature, politics, sports, and the arts. They include people like Mary McLeod Bethune, noted educational leader who became the first black woman to receive a major appointment in the Federal Government; Jesse Owens, world-class athlete and U.S. Olympian; Shirley Chisholm, the first black woman elected to Congress; Dr. Charles Drew, who developed the first blood plasma bank; Dr. Daniel Hale Williams, who performed the first successful open-heart surgery; and Percy Lavon Julian, who was the first scientist to synthesize cortisone.

They include Sidney Poitier, first black to win an Academy Award for best actor; Dr. Ralph Bunche, U.N. Ambassador and first black to win the Nobel Peace Prize; Gwendolyn Brooks, first black to win a Pulitzer; Edward R. Brooke, the only black U.S. Senator since Reconstruction; Jan Metzeliger, inventor of the first automated shoemaking machine; and Colin Powell, first black to head the National Security Council, and now, first black Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Many do not know that the term "the real McCoy" refers to the numerous creations of black inventor Elijah McCoy, or that Garrett A. Morgan, who was black, invented the electric traffic signal and gas mask.

As we observe this year's Black History Month, let us commit ourselves to continuing to work for policies in this country that will enable us to perpetuate Dr. Woodson's living legacy, and create a climate that will present all citizens with the chance to share in the opportunities our Nation offers, and make contributions that will continue to benefit our Nation and all Americans.

Major Hollywood projects such as "A Soldier's Story" and "Glory" have brought some recognition to the black soldier. But these accounts of black military life only scratch the surface. To understanding the role that blacks have had in military history we must begin with this country's revolution.

Crispus Attucks and thousands of other slaves served this country during the Revolutionary War in exchange for their freedom. Crispus Attucks was the first man to fall in the Boston massacre of 1750.

According to President Lincoln it was the vast participation of the black soldier that ensured a Northern victory and the preservation of the Union.

Not many know that the 9th and 10th Cavalry, all black units led by Teddy Roosevelt, participated in the infamous charge up San Juan Hill.

During the First World War the 369th Infantry Regiment, known as Les Enfants Perdu, never lost a prisoner, a trench, or a foot of ground during 191 days under fire, longer than any other American unit.

We should recall Dorrie Miller, the heroic messman aboard the battleship Arizona at Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941. Although Dorrie was denied training in weaponry because he was black, he was credited with shooting down four Japanese planes for which he was awarded the Navy Cross.

It is difficult to forget that at a time when African-Americans were waging a war for civil rights at home, the Vietnam war took thousands of young black GI's to Southeast Asia. Despite domestic problems, studies of draft and casualty lists indicate that African-Americans participated in the Vietnam war proportionately more than any other group.

However, Black History Month is not only a time for remembering, it is also a time for doing. Although they have served their country with honor, valor, and distinction, today's black veterans have not always received the benefits they deserve.

Policy is needed for agent orange compensation. VA hospitals and vet centers need more funding. Additionally, posttraumatic stress disorder treatment programs need to be established. And we must address the astonishing estimate that one of every three homeless people in America is a veteran.

So it is now that I would like to take this opportunity to urge my colleagues to really remember the black veteran.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join the chorus of tribute for the many millions of African-Americans whose contributions to our Nation are remembered each year during Black History Month.

For the very special year of 1990, black history needs to be remembered and commemorated every month, both because of the many important anniversaries we remember and because of the many challenges we face.

Since 1990 is the 35th anniversary of that December morning when a seamstress in Montgomery named Rosa Parks refused to be denied a seat on a bus because of her color. And because Ms. Parks had the courage to sit down, millions more were inspired to stand up.

And 1990 is the 27th anniversary of that sad day when Nelson Mandela was imprisoned. But 1990 will be remembered in history as the year in which Mandela, and South Africa, began to stride toward freedom.

And 1990 is also the 25th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Then it was first major piece of civil rights legislation in a century, today it represents still one of this House's finest moments.

And, 1990 will be, I predict, the year in which the House and the Senate will pass the Civil Rights Act of 1990, to restore the rights that have been slowly eroded by a judiciary that is coming to be dominated by those who have the narrowest view of opportunity, dignity, and liberty. Fortunately, the Congress is entrusted by we the people to correct such mistakes. And correct them we will—with or without the support of the President.

The accomplishments we celebrate, the anniversaries we commemorate, are indeed extraordinary—especially for those of us who serve America in this House. I remember being moved when by the eloquent and elegant defense of the Constitution that was mounted by Barbara Jordan. Think of how far we have come—two centuries ago the Constitution indefensibly considered Ms. Jordan's ancestors to be three-fifths of a person. Today that Constitution, improved by amendments, is interpreted by an African-American on the Supreme Court.

As we celebrate Black History Month, I especially want to commend the outstanding work produced this year by Bruce A. Ragsdale and Joel D. Treese, under the direction of the Office of the Historian of the House, Dr. Raymond W. Smock, titled: "Black Americans in Congress, 1870–1989." This book, sponsored by the Commission on the Bicentenary of the U.S. House of Representatives, is an inspiration and an exemple of how far African-Americans have come. Their work celebrates the lives of 67 extraordinary men and women—including the first two African-American Missourians to serve in Congress, my friends and colleagues William Clay and Alan Wheat.

The promise of America has often been a promise unfulfilled for African-Americans. The dream, in the words of the poet Langston Hughes, has often been "a dream deferred." It has been through the efforts of courageous African-Americans that the cruel mendacity of denying the American dream to huge percentages of our population has been challenged—and overcome.

Lord knows we're not there yet. America still has miles to go. But in 1990 we are seeing that the promise of America is inspiring the hearts of millions the world over. It is doubly vital that in this year, with the eyes of the world upon us, we take steps to make the "dream deferred" a dream fulfilled. The lessons of the lives of millions of African-Americans whom we remembered this month teaches us that we can once again challenge ourselves to bridge the gap between America's promise and its performance.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, each February we honor noteworthy Americans during Black History Month. I rise today to pay tribute to the late Reverend Theodore Gibson. A long time Miami resident, Father Gibson has become a role model for people of all races to follow. During his years as a minister, community leader, and city commissioner, Father Gibson tirelessly fought racial discrimination and poverty in his neighborhood of Coconut Grove, FL. I had the privilege of knowing him for many years and I can attest to the fact that his efforts had a far-reaching impact on civil rights in Miami. His many accomplishments should be noted today so that Americans everywhere can follow in his footsteps and work for justice and social equality.

His civil rights work began in 1948 when he confronted residents of what was known as white town in Coconut Grove and complained about the poor living conditions his neighbors experienced every day. It was horribly unfair, Father Gibson argued, for people anywhere to live without basic necessities like indoor plumbing. He, thus, demanded that the dilapidated homes in his neighborhood be quickly improved. Because of Father Gibson's relentless work on this issue, the Miami City Commission passed an ordinance mandating that landlords install indoor plumbing in all their buildings. It was a first step taken by Father Gibson in his movement to improve living conditions throughout Miami.

After this significant victory, Father Gibson and a prominent member of Miami's white community, Elizabeth Virrick, founded the Slum Clearance Committee. Together, they pressured the Miami City Commission and many prominent property owners into cleaning up the ghetto into which the "black Grove" had evolved. Father Gibson was instrumental in obtaining necessary home improvements for many of his neighbors. In short, he felt he had a duty to ensure that all of his neighbors received whatever assistance they needed.

In 1956, a House committee in the Florida legislature searched for Communists in the NAACP. The committee demanded from Father Gibson, then the president of the Miami chapter of the NAACP, a list of his chapter's membership. Father Gibson refused the request. He knew that many members of the NAACP were schoolteachers who would probably be fired if it became known that they were members of the organization. Father Gibson, fighting for his principles, took his case to the Supreme Court and won. Justice William O. Douglas, writing the Court's majority opinion, hailed Reverend Gibson's actions and said, "If the NAACP can be ransacked because some Communists have joined, then all the walls of privacy have come down." In short, Father Gibson's life was more than a fight for racial equality; it was a fight to secure justice for all.

In 1957, Father Gibson filed suit locally to demand that his son be allowed to attend Coral Gables Jr. High School. The decision handed down in Gibson versus Board of Public Instruction was in Father Gibson's favor. While it ultimately did not have the national significance of Brown versus Board of Education, it was indeed very important in helping many of Miami's blacks gain entrance into Miami's white schools. As a result, black children received educational opportunities historically denied to them. This, as Father Gibson hoped, gave blacks the chance to enjoy an education they rightfully deserved.

Father Gibson remained active in city affairs and, in 1972, was elected to Miami's City Commission where he served with honor until his retirement in 1982. Later that year, Father Gibson died of cancer. His untimely death was a great loss to all of Miami's residents. However, his accomplishments have had a lasting effect on the city and, especially on his neighbors and friends in Coconut Grove. He strived to change the system by working within it to promote social justice and equality for all. Father Gibson's message of working together to solve racial inequality is as important for our Nation today as it was for Miami in the 1950's. We have much work left to do, but in remembering the work of Father Gibson, we see how far we have come.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, as you know, February is Black History Month and it gives me great pleasure to pay tribute to those Americans who have traveled a tumultuous course through America's history. We, as a nation, have come a long way. However, not until the leaders of the civil rights movement compelled America to take a hard look at itself, did we begin to move toward a free and equal society.

Black history in the United States has thus witnessed two major turning points. The Civil War was of course the first pivotal change for blacks in America and the second major change was the civil rights era. As a result of the Civil Rights Act blacks have finally been given greater opportunity to fully participate and prosper. They have made tremendous strides in all facets of American society and the country as a whole has benefited.

Herbert S. Cables, Jr., to Deputy Director of the National Park Service is a fine example of the many contributions black Americans are making to American society. Mr. Cables has had 15 years experience as a National Park Service Administrator. During his tenure at the NPS he was the recipient of the coveted 1988 Federal Meritorious Executive Rank Award. Mr. Cables has been involved with various park and recreation positions at the Federal and city levels for more than 30 years and has served for 7 years as Regional Director of NPS operations in New England, New York, and New Jersey, a region that encompasses 40 national park areas as diverse as the Statue of Liberty, Acadia National Park, Cape Cod National Seashore, and Gateway National Recreation Area. Mr. James Ridenour, the Director of the National Park Service, stated that Cables' experience "has given him invaluable understanding of the ways in which the National Park Service works and will be extremely helpful to me as I acclimate to the traditions and challenges of one of the most widely praised Government organizations in America."

As for his other achievements, Mr. Cables earned a bachelor's degree in recreation administration from the University of Bridgeport and a master's degree in business administration from New York University. He was an outstanding athlete in college and later went on to become the first black coach in the professional Eastern Basketball League.

Although there still remains many obstacles, blacks continue to make great headway and occupy a myriad of prominent positions within our society. People like Herbert S. Cables, Jr., continue to inspire us all by his commitment and dedication to the preservation of our national parks and cultural resources. He is also a role model for all Americans. His career and life is a testatment to the progress we are making as a society.

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my distinguished colleague from Ohio and the members of the Congressional Black Caucus in this special order in honor of Black History Month. I want to commend Mr. STOKES for calling this special order and Mr. DELLUMS, the chairman of the Black Caucus, for his many years of bold leadership on issues of concern to black Americans and all minorities in the United States.

We in the U.S. Virgin Islands join enthusiastically in observing Black History Month. For us it is a major opportunity to celebrate the primary culture of our islands, where the vast majority of our people are black west Indians. We are proud of our distinctive heritage as west Indians and Americans. And we are determined to create for ourselves a distinctive future, which will build upon our unique position as a west Indian and American territory under the U.S. flag.

I want to take special note of two big events that relate to the celebration of the Virgin Islands' own history within the context of this observance of Black History Month.

First, just last week on the island of St. Thomas we dedicated two statues in Post Office Square in Charlotte Amalie, now known as Educators Park. Statues of three outstanding Virgin Islanders now grace that park, and these three individuals represent the best in community service, accomplishment, and courage that are so important to remember during Black History Month. The statues portray J. Antonio Jarvis, an outstanding educator and newspaper editor; Rothschild Francis, a courageous community leader who fought for the dignity of all Virgin Islanders after our islands were acquired by the United States in 1917; and Edith Williams, a dedicated teacher who also established the first school lunch program in our islands. These three Virgin Islands leaders are an inspiration for us as we build upon our history to create an even better future for our islands.

Second, it is good to note during Black History Month, that the U.S. Virgin Islands has been selected for a special exhibit during this summer's Smithsonian Festival of American Folklife on the Mall here in Washington. From June 27 to July 8, the local culture of the Virgin Islands—from folk stories and native recipes to music and Carnival troupes—will be on display on the Mall. Our history and our living culture will shine brightly during that festival and I hope many of my colleagues here in Congress will be able to see Virgin Islands culture for themselves, thanks to the Smithsonian exhibit.

Mr. Speaker, again, let me say the U.S. Virgin Islands is proud to share its unique history and culture as part of this celebration of Black History Month.

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to highlight a special order today that puts black Americans in the spotlight. Black History Month has been celebrated since 1976 but its origin dates back to 1926 when Dr. Carter G. Woodson set aside a period in February to praise the contributions, achievements, and heritage of black Americans.

I rise on the important day to draw attention to a group of Americans that has survived slavery and segregation and has emerged as leaders who have paved the way for progress in our nation.

Because of Dr. Woodson's determined spirit and intellect, he landed himself a spot in the history books, and this year's Black History Month is dedicated to him. In 1915, he founded a national movement for the study, preservation, interpretation, and dissemination of black history that surpassed earlier efforts.

His accomplishments began accumulating after he founded the Journal of Negro History in 1916 and served as its editor for 34 years. In 1926, he launched Negro History Week, a public education program that reached virtually thousands in the span of a generation.

Dr. Woodson has helped bring the black tradition to the forefront of the nation. It is now our turn to pay tribute to black Americans' unyielding effort to share their talents with the rest of the Nation.

I honor the black Americans in the Third Congressional District of Maryland for their accomplishments throughout history. I hope that you, my colleagues, will join me in this acknowledgment.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to observe Black History Month. I recently cohosted my Third Annual Black History Observances in Columbus, GA, with Dr. Henry Cook, Mr. Sal Siaz-Verson, and Mr. Brad Turner, and in Fort Valley, GA, with Mr. Claybon Edwards and Rev. Julius Simmons. These annual events are to commemorate Black History Month and are dedicated to the recognition of individuals, organizations, and communities for a better America. These meetings pay sincere tribute to those individuals and institutions who have contributed their efforts and dedicated their existence to the improvement of America.

Joining me at these breakfasts were the Honorable MIKE ESPY, Under Secretary of the Army, John Shannon, and Dr. Eunice Thomas with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Both program sites were filled to overflowing with local citizens who were interested in observing Black History Month. They were treated to three excellent speakers who touched upon the need to continue the struggle for equal rights for all citizens. Proceeds from the breakfasts went to the House of Mercy in Columbus, a loving home for less fortunate people which was founded by Mrs. Ocie Harris in 1976, and to the Cleveland W. Pettigrew Endowment Fund of Fort Valley State College in Fort Valley, a fund which assists Fort Valley State College students and faculty.

Mr. Speaker, Black History Month allows us to set aside a time in the daily life of America to focus upon the significant accomplishments that blacks have achieved in this country's history. However, history is a living and growing thing and changes that are taking place today will have deep historical significance in the future.

In the past year, we have seen Colin Powell become the first black Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Art Shell become the first black professional football coach in the modern era, and Douglas Wilder, of Virginia, become the first black Governor. These are important changes, not just for these particular people, who richly deserve these positions, but also significant to all other Americans.

As more and more blacks and other minorities attain such distinguished positions, the more commonplace and accepted such occurrences will become. As these people are given a chance to participate and excel in their various jobs, racism and prejudice will soon fade into the darkness of forgotten jealousy and deserted pettiness.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank Congressman LOUIS STOKES for his reserving this special order time to observe Black History Month and for allowing me to participate.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I want first to extend my thanks and appreciation to Congressman LOUIS STOKES today for arranging this special time in which Members of Congress can rise and speak on black history. It is important that we reflect on the history of our people, their contribution and sacrifice, in living the ideals that we too often take for granted.

In recent months, we have had an unprecedented experience in hearing from leaders from Eastern Europe who have come here to relate to us in moving terms how they have lived the ideals set forth by the founders of our Nation. Most recently, President Vaclav Havel, of Czechoslovakia, reminded us of the way that responsibility serves as the underpinning for any progress in human rights. As he said: "* * * the only genuine backbone of all our actions, if they are to be moral, is responsibility. Responsibility to something higher than my family, my country, my company, my success—responsibility to the order of being where all our actions are indelibly recorded and where and only where they will be properly judged."

Mr. Speaker, we have heard here today, and will hear more as this special order proceeds, of the giants in black history who have fulfilled that commitment to responsibility. Their devotion to the higher order of human rights deserves the thanks of a nation. There are many of those giants serving with us in this House here today. Who here cannot hold but the deepest respect for the powerful words of a RON DELLUMS or the courage of a John Lewis? There is a rich pantheon of black leaders in many fields who should be remembered for their contributions to this Nation.

But Mr. Speaker, I rise here today not to speak on the black Americans who have won fame in the national spotlight for their works. Today, I want to offer praise for those leaders who have struggled and sacrificed in their own communities for black progress. For it is these local leaders who stand on the frontlines of human rights in every community across our great Nation and who are writing the latest chapters in black history.

I would like to talk about a few individuals from my own region in the San Francisco Bay Area who are making history.

The career of crusading newspaper publisher Carlton Goodlett offers a stunning example of how one man can make a difference for his community. A leading publisher of black newspapers, Goodlett has worked more than half a century in the civil rights struggle and has become an international figure in the cause of world peace.

For 44 years, Goodlett has published the Sun Reporter in San Francisco, building that paper into a publishing chain that reaches from coast to coast with a combined circulation of 500,000. Although few could agree with every stance that the Sun Reporter has taken over those years, no one could doubt that Goodlett has not lived up to the paper's motto: "Dedicated to the cause of the people—that no good cause shall lack a champion and that evil shall not thrive unopposed."

Goodlett, who in 1938 became the first black to gain a psychology doctorate at the University of California, has said that "I was trained to cure human illness, but I found that I spent most of my life trying to cure the social pathology known as racism." As a crusading black weekly, the Sun Reporter encountered many of the social problems that were confronting the black population moving into the bay area to work in its many shipyards.

An early campaign was to combat job discrimination. Goodlett participated in the lawsuit that forced the boilermakers union to end its policy of enrolling black workers into a segregated auxiliary. His paper was firebombed over his antigambling crusade and he faced the loss of advertisers for his anticrime campaign.

He has, in the words of one labor ally, "steel in his bones."

An untiring advocate of nuclear disarmament and world peace, Goodlett, in 1963, succeeded Dr. W.E.B. du Bois and Paul Robeson as a member of the World Peace Council Presidium. Goodlett's Sun Reporter was among the first black newspapers to oppose the Vietnam war. He also helped persuade Dr. Martin Luther King to unite the civil rights crusade in America with the peace movement.

In 1966, Goodlett was the second black in nearly 100 years to run for Governor in the United States. Although unsuccessful, Goodlett continued to promote other blacks to elective office. Terry Francois, who Goodlett helped become the first black person to sit on the San Francisco Board of Supervisors, has said of him: "* * * that there's no one who's made a greater impact on the welfare or the fate of the black community since World War II * * *."

Goodlett has certainly not been alone in his efforts to bring human dignity and opportunity to his community.

The Reverend Cecil Williams, pastor of San Francisco's Glide Memorial United Methodist Church, has developed a crusade to fight the crack epidemic in his community. Glide's "Fact on Crack" attack began in 1988 and is now acknowledged as among the leading programs in the country to confront crack cocaine addicting and to find solutions for people struggling to end their dependence on the drug.

Following the 1989 Loma Prieta earthquake, Rev. Williams led his Glide Church to help more than 1,500 homeless in downtown San Francisco. Glide served over 60,000 meals, placed dozens of people in temporary housing and provided human services for hundreds, ranging from new clothing to basic personal hygiene needs in the week following the earthquake.

Over the years, LeRoy King, regional director of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and the late ILWU vice president Bill Cheater, helped build a progressive labor-church-community coalition. This coalition proved a powerful force in the public life of the bay area. King helped the ILWU put together a model of urban racial integration in 1960 known as the St. Francis Square, a middle-income housing cooperative.

The sense of community help is perhaps best exemplified by Enola Maxwell. A community volunteer since coming to San Francisco on July 4, 1948, Ms. Maxwell joined the freedom riders in the 1960's to march for equal rights with the Reverend Martin Luther King in the South. She brought the spirit of the movement back to San Francisco where she founded the Potrero Hill Neighborhood House in 1970. As its executive director, she has fostered an extraordinary multipurpose community program that offers wide-ranging youth and elderly programs, recreation, juvenile diversion programs, substance abuse help, basic education, summer lunch programs, a social development program for the disabled, and even a theater ensemble.

As her son Ronald Hatter, a neighborhood house volunteer, describes her work, "from the civil rights struggle you come back and learn the community needs are here."

Mr. Speaker, these are just a few of the many black leaders who have contributed to their community. They—and the thousands of others across the United States—should also be honored during this special month. Black history, we must remember, is being written every day. As events in recent months have shown, the United States remains the beacon of hope for human rights worldwide. But we must not let this glow mask the work that must still be done here at home to make equal opportunity, equal rights, and economic freedom a reality in America.

Mr. VISCLOSKY, Mr. Speaker, I would first like to commend Congressman STOKES for organizing this special order to mark the observance of Black History Month.

With the release of Nelson Mandela earlier this month, it is particularly fitting that Congress has designated this February as Black History Month.

Mr. Mandela, who through 27 years of imprisonment, remained steadfast and unwilling to compromise his beliefs in order to loosen the ties of apartheid that have bound South Africans for so long, is symbolic of countless African-Americans who have suffered soley due to the color of their skin and who have heroically struggled to bring about necessary changes in our society.

Many have fought, bled and died so that African-Americans could be recognized as first class citizens with equal rights. Many whose names will never be known, and some whose names will never be forgotten.

I stand here today to pay tribute to those unsung heroes who have helped to lay the groundwork for our great country. It is because of these quiet warriors that prominent leaders of the past such as Carter G. Woodson, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Frederick Douglass, W.E.B. Dubois, Malcolm X, Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, Mary McLeod Bethune, Paul Robeson and Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., were able to pave the road for African-Americans leaders of today.

We must never forget that these leaders are the fruits of years of labor. More importantly, we must remember the branches, stems and roots of the civil rights movement that held these fruits in place so that they could blossom and become ripe in their own time.

We must remember roots like William Whipper who was one of the earliest advocates of the nonviolent movement, Ida B. Wells, who in 1898 went to President McKinley for help because of the abhorrent lynchings of African-Americans, Sojourner Truth who was one of the leading anti-slavery speakers in the 1800's, George T. Downing, who was a leader in working for equal rights for black troops during the Civil War and Harriet Tubman, who risked her life time-and-time again to carry slaves through the underground railroad to freedom.

Yes, these are a few, but there are more. We must never forget those roots that took their lives into their hands when they stood tall against the Ku Klux Klan and the burning crosses in order to exercise their rights to vote, to sit at lunch counters, drink from water fountains, use public facilities and to sit in the front of the bus. We must keep in mind the roots that were willing to die in the Civil War for a country that would never claim them as her own. We must keep in mind those roots that held fast to faith and inner strength when every hour seemed darker than the one before. These are the roots of African-Americanism that must never be forgotten.

Lastly, we must be mindful of roots like Oscar Micheaux, a novelist and filmmaker who was determined to present the truth and view the African-American heart at close range, whose branches brought forth the fruits of writers like Langston Hughes, Margaret Walker, James Baldwin, and directors like, Robert Townsend, Lorraine Hansberry and Spike Lee.

We must be mindful of roots like Alexander T. Augusta, a physician, soldier and professor who brought forth the fruits of Charles Drew, Patrick Healy, Ernest E. Just, Dr. Percy Julian, Dr. Olive O. Callendar and Dr. Roland B. Scott.

We must be mindful of the roots of Jefferson Franklin Long, our former colleague of Georgia who was the first African-American Member to speak on the floor of the House of Representatives. Because of his voice, the fruits of his branches stretched forth to bear Edward Brooke, the first and only African-American U.S. Senator, Julian bond, who was nominated for Vice-President in 1968, Shirley Chisholm, our former colleague, who was the first African-American woman in the U.S. House of Representatives, Richard Hatcher, who was elected the first African-American mayor of Gary, IN, and Douglas Wilder, the first African-American elected as Governor of Virginia.

Because so many lives were lost in the struggle for equality, we must be mindful that the struggle is not over. It is not over when we are losing our leaders through racial mail bombings; it is not over when we are losing our future leaders to drugs; it is not over when African-American college enrollment is slipping rapidly. There is so much more that has to be done. Black History Month reminds me of this and the words of Vernon E. Jordan Jr., when he said: "Civil Rights don't take place in a vacuum. They are meaningful only in the real world where people have to survive to work, to raise their families, to instill in their children hope for the future and the skills to function in society where a broad back and a desire to work are no longer enough."

Mrs. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, in honor of Black History Month, I would like to pay tribute to a dynamic woman whose life-long work enhanced the quality of life for all Americans.

Mary McCleod Bethune—educator, political adviser, community leader, and mother—was born in 1875 and raised in my home State of South Carolina in the town of Mayesville. Emerging from a home that emphasized the necessity of living by high standards, Ms. Bethune learned early the importance of setting goals and including others in her active quest to fulfill them.

With the collective well-being of African-Americans in mind and in heart, Ms. Bethune focused primarily on education as the means by which to challenge the social, intellectual, political, and economic conditions of the day. The choice to concentrate her efforts in the education field resulted from a childhood incident, in which a white playmate took a book away from her—explaining that the book was not for her since black people could not read. At that point, for her, education, particularly reading, became the symbol of racial differences and the key to dismantling these differences.

The list of her accomplishments appears endless, as they spanned nearly 60 of her 80 years.

After continuing her education in North Carolina and Chicago, Ms. Bethune married and started a family. She then taught for a number of years before founding Bethune-Cookman College in Daytona Beach, FL. In the earlier part of this century, she was vice-president of the National Urban League and president of the National Association of Colored Women. Ms. Bethune also served as an advisor on African-American education for five presidents, including Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In 1936, she became the director of the Division of Minority Affairs under Roosevelt's National Youth Administration. In this capacity, Ms. Bethune examined several projects that were established during the depression to meet the needs of the country's youth and worked to have some of the NYA funds allocated to various African-American institutions, including Bethune-Cookman College. A special advisor to President Roosevelt, Ms. Bethune held a coveted position as one of the few African-Americans who had personal access to the President.

Her position as a prominent and effective leader in the black community, however, took her beyond the responsibilities of a political figure. Mobilized by the need to address the community's spiritual concerns, for example, Ms. Bethune's work often included religious programs. The frequent confrontations with societal discrimination in schools, prisons and hospitals compelled Ms. Bethune to organize mission schools, a hospital in Daytona Beach, and fund-raising activities to support these endeavors—all of which required her personal and constant participation.

Ms. Bethune's immense contributions to progressive history in the United States are to be highly commended and appreciated. In memory of her devotion and determination, Ms. Bethune's work should be remembered as one of the most significant influences on this Nation's responsibility to cultivate the ideals expressed in freedom and equality.

It is with great pleasure that I stand here before you today to commemorate this outstanding individual, whose commitment to excellence continues to inspire us as we celebrate Black History Month.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, it is my great pleasure to participate in this celebration of Black History Month, which, for the past decade and a half, has greatly enriched our appreciation of the many contributions black Americans have made to our country.

Dr. Carter C. Woodson, the focus of this year's commemoration, was a pioneer in documenting the accomplishments of black Americans. As a historian best known for establishing Negro History Week, the precursor to Black History Month, Dr. Woodson, helped initiate the study of achievements which previously went unrecognized.

I am pleased that Dr. Woodson's legacy lives on in our schools and throughout our country. No more should our youngsters receive an education that limits the definition of famous Americans by race.

Without Black History Month, many Americans would probably never learn about the lives of so many individuals whose impact is still felt today. They would probably never know of the important medical contributions of Percy Lavon, the first scientist to synthesize cortisone, or Daniel Hale Williams, who performed the first open heart surgery in 1893. Without this month, the courage of explorers such as Christopher Columbus' captain on the Nina and Matthew Henson, who reached the North Pole before Robert Peary, would also go unnoticed. Many Americans would never know about World War II heroes like Dorrie Miller and other black Americans who have served this Nation courageously from Lexington and Concord to Vietnam. They might never read the poetry of Langston Hughes or the novels of James Baldwin. Indeed without this month, our history books would be much thinner and less compelling.

Black History Month also serves to help those who never heard Martin Luther King's empowering words to be moved by them for years to come. More recent leaders, such as Justice Thurgood Marshall and the current Governor of my State of Virginia, Douglas Wilder, are also honored with the celebration of this month. It is only through studying these individuals that Americans will feel the pride we should in the contributions of black Americans. It is only through praising these individuals that our children will have the role models they need to perpetuate the accomplishment of their predecessors.

It was in 1916 that Dr. Woodson established his scholarly journal detailing the contributions of black Americans. I hope all citizens take the time to honor those who overcome great obstacles to their own personal success to help build a Nation that now cherishes those sacrifices and the rich results they produced.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Ohio for taking out this special order today in celebration of Black History Month.

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in commemorating Black History Month and I would especially like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to three black universities in my hometown, Nashville, TN.

During Black History Month, we pause to reflect on the achievements of black Americans. Lessons learned by examining history can provide the groundwork for growth, progress and for avoiding a reputation of mistakes society made in the past.

I am very proud to note that many of the prominent black Americans who made significant contributions to our Nation's history and who participated in the struggle, for equal opportunity were natives of Nashville.

Throughout the struggle equality and civil rights, black educational institutions and churches provided a backdrop for communicating ideas and nurturing social and ideological beliefs. The three black universities in Nashville have historically served as forums for the development of ideas and social change. Equally important, they are contributions to Nashville, the State of Tennessee and the world.

I want to take this opportunity to salute Fisk University, MeHarry Medical College and Tennessee State University by briefly summarizing their histories and their unique roles with the black community.

FISK UNIVERSITY

Fisk University began as Fisk Free School, one of four schools founded for freedmen during the Union Army occupation of Nashville. In October 1865, the American Missionary Association, the Western Freedman's Aid Commission and the U.S. Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands decided to open a school to help answer the educational needs of freed slaves.

In December 1865, Gen. Clinton Bowen Fisk, head of the Kentucky-Tennessee Freedmen's Bureau, secured housing for the school in several old Union Army Hospital buildings between Church Street and what is now Charlotte Avenue.

On January 9, 1866, the school's founders, John Ogden and Erastus Cravath and Gov. William G. Brownlow, addressed the dedication ceremonies. The school taught basic elementary and grammar school subjects.

Following the Civil War, and with the reopening of the Nashville public schools in the fall of 1867, the need for basic education was less pressing. The institution was chartered as Fisk University on August 22, 1867.

Now chartered as a university, Fisk needed new quarters. In 1871, the surplus Union Army Fort Gillem was purchased. A student choir, organized in 1867 under the leadership of Prof. George L. White, began touring the Nation in order to raise funds for new buildings. This group, called the Fisk Jubilee Singers, raised over $50,000 for the construction of historic Jubilee Hall.

By the 1890's, Fisk's curriculum had expanded to include liberal arts, theology, teacher training, and a secondary school. Simultaneously the campus continued to expand.

At the turn of the century, with the arrival of a second generation of freed blacks, the school began to undergo even greater changes in curriculum and teaching methods. As time passed and the institution grew, demands were made for more blacks on the Fisk faculty and in the administration. In 1947 Charles S. Johnson became the first black to head the university.

Amid the civil rights movement during the 1960's, and facing diminishing financial support from white donors, Fisk was forced to dip into its $15 million endowment.

Since the 1960's the school has continued to work to increase its financial base.

Under the capable hand of Dr. Henry Ponder, Fisk University is providing educational opportunities to the students it serves.

MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE

Meharry Medical College originated in 1876 as the medical division of Central Tennessee College, an institution established by the Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The founder and first president of Meharry Medical College was Dr. George Whipple Hubbard, a former Union soldier who received his medical degree from the University of Nashville. He was born in New Hampshire in 1841. While still in school, Hubbard began the work of building Meharry, serving as sole instructor, religious advisor and superintendent of the teaching hospital.

Meharry's dental and pharmaceutical departments were organized in 1886 and 1889, respectively. There was only one member in the first graduating class in 1890. In 1910 the School of Nursing of Mercy Hospital was transferred to Meharry.

Meharry Medical College was granted a charter separate from Central Tennessee College, which has changed its name to Walden University, on October 13, 1915.

On February 1, 1921, Dr. John J. Mullowney, a 1908 graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and a former faculty member of Girard College in Philadelphia, became the second president of Meharry. Under his leadership, admission requirements were rigorously administered, the number of faculty members increased, research and hospital facilities were expanded, the bed capacity was increased to 100, outpatient clinics were reorganized according to specialty and a hospital superintendent was employed.

With contributions from the general education board and the Rockefeller, Rosenwald, Eastman, and Carnegie Foundations, together with assistance from the city of Nashville and Meharry alumni, the college moved from south Nashville to its present location in north Nashville adjacent to Fisk University. In 1923, when there were still many class B medical schools, Meharry was awarded an A rating.

In 1938 the distinguished internist and scholar, Dr. Edward J. Turner, assumed the post of president. Dr. Turner modified the curriculum of the medical school, insisting on a more scientific approach and stressing the importance of proper clinical procedures. During this time, Meharry began to experience financial difficulties which it confronted throughout the 1940's.

In 1952 Dr. Harold D. West was named the first black president of the school. Under Dr. West's guidance, the school initiated fiscal expansion and started a $20 million fund drive. Land adjacent to the campus was purchased and a new wing was added to the hospital.

In the early 1960's, the School of Nursing and Division of Dental Technology were terminated and significant improvements were made to the curriculum and the facilities in the schools of medicine and dentistry.

In 1968 Dr. Lloyd Elam was appointed president. Meharry then established a graduate school offering a Ph.D degree in basic sciences and a school of allied health professions in conjunction with Tennessee State and Fisk Universities. New buildings for the school of medicine and dentistry and a new hospital building were constructed in the 1970's.

Led by its current president, Dr. David Satcher, Meharry Medical College continues to provide not only quality medical educations to future health professionals, but provides critically needed medical services to the community.

TENNESSEE STATE UNIVERSITY

Tennessee State University, as it exists today, is the result of the July 1, 1979, merger of the former Tennessee State University and the University of Tennessee at Nashville. TSU developed from a normal school for Negroes to its current university status.

The origins of the school date to 1909, when the Tennessee General Assembly created the Agricultural and Industrial State Normal School, along with two other normal schools.

In 1922 the institution was elevated to the status of a 4-year teacher's college which was empowered to grant bachelor's degrees. The first degrees were granted in June 1924. During the same year, the institution became known as the Agricultural and Industrial Normal College. In 1927 the word normal was dropped from the school's name.

The general assembly of 1941 authorized the State board of education to substantially upgrade the college's educational program to include establishment of graduate studies leading to the master's degree. Graduate curricula was first offered in several branches of teacher education. The first master's degree was awarded by the college in June 1944.

Accreditation of the institution by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools was first obtained in 1946.

In August 1951, the institution was granted university status by approval of the State board of education. The reorganization of the institution's educational program included the establishment of the graduate school, the school of arts and sciences, the school of education and the school of engineering.

Provisions were also made for the addition of other schools in agriculture, business and home economics.

The university was elevated to a full-fledged land grant university by the State board of education in August 1958. The Land Grant University Program, approved by the State board of education, included the School of Agriculture and Home Economics, the Graduate School, the division of business, the division of extension and continuing education and the department of aerospace studies.

A school of allied health professions was authorized in 1974, from which a school of nursing was created in 1979. The school of business was also established in 1974.

What initially began in 1947 as an extension center of the University of Tennessee based in Knoxville, the University of Tennessee, Nashville, offered only 1 year of extension credit until 1960. In 1960 the board of trustees of the University of Tennessee approved 2 years of extension credit at the university in Nashville. Authorization was granted in 1963 to extend the credit to 3 years.

To more fully realize its commitment as a full function evening university, the University of Tennessee at Nashville became a full fledged 4-year degree granting institution in 1971 after successfully completing necessary requirements for accreditation by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. During the same year, the general assembly sanctioned the institution as a bona fide campus of the University of Tennessee, and the new university occupied its quarters in a building at 10th and Charlotte Avenues in Nashville.

Following erection of the building at 10th and Charlotte, a decade-long litigation to dismantle the dual system of higher education in Tennessee ensued, culminating with a court order issued by Judge Frank Gray in February 1977, which ordered the merger of the two schools.

Today, TSU is led by President Otis Floyd, and like the other two black universities in Nashville, TSU has developed a national reputation for quality in education.

Most importantly, the three black universities in Nashville continue to provide forums for creativity, the development of ideas and a climate for educational and social progress. Fisk, Meharry and TSU also serve as partners in the economic and social development of our city and region.

During Black History Month, I want to recognize Nashville's three black universities and salute everyone associated with the institutions since their creation. Despite facing many difficult obstacles throughout the years, Fisk University, Meharry Medical College and Tennessee State University have grown into strong educational institutions.

I believe that when America's history is reviewed a century from now, many of the people who will have played prominent roles in the events which shaped our country will be graduates of Nashville's three black universities.

I also want to reemphasize my strong commitment to Fisk, Meharry and TSU and pledge my full support, cooperation and effort in the continued growth and vitality of these institutions.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, for reserving this time to celebrate Black History Month.

Today, we pay tribute to black Americans who have made significant contributions to America and its history. I am pleased to bring to my colleagues' attention the contributions of the distinguished educator, Booker T. Washington.

Mr. Washington was born on a plantation in Franklin County, VA and moved with his family to Malden, WV after the Emancipation Proclamation. His mother, determined to see that her children were educated, obtained a copy of Webster's "Blue-back Spelling Book," and Mr. Washington mastered the alphabet during a time when there were few blacks able to read.

Mr. Washington continued his studies, while working in a coal mine and salt furnace during the day. One day he overheard a conversation between two miners who were discussing a school that was known for educating blacks. He enrolled in Hampton Institute in 1872 and graduated with honors in 1875. He returned to teach school in Malden, WV, for a short while before leaving to further his education. Mr. Washington became known for his oratorical skills and was in great demand as a public speaker throughout the country. His desire to leave an impact when he spoke, resulted in one of his most famous phrases, "In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress".

Booker T. Washington established the well known Tuskegee Institute in Tuskegee, AL and his philosophy was to ensure that blacks learned that through hard work, proper social graces, and economic progress, they would be ready to face the many challenges of life. Tuskegee Institute will always stand as a legacy to this great black American. Mr. Speaker, in my own Fourth District of West Virginia, I have a black historical college which espouses these virtues, Bluefield State College, in Bluefield, WV. In closing, let us remember those black Americans whose contributions to our country and world are too numerous to recount here. As we look around the world and rejoice in the progress that is being made in South Africa, by the recent release of Nelson Mandela and the destruction of the Berlin Wall, let America not regress, but continue to fight for equal rights, liberty, and justice for all. We are all children of God.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, Black History Month is a special event that provides all Americans with the opportunity to reflect on the impressive contributions of black Americans to the success of our Nation. Indeed, Americans are proud of such historical figures as Frederick Douglas, George Washington Carver, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and of such contemporary leaders as Carter Woodson, Martin Luther King Jr., Thurgood Marshall, and Rosa Parks. These men and women and many others not mentioned deserve the highest praise for their gifts to American scholarship, literature, technological innovation, and civil liberties, which are admired, if not envied, the world over. Through their example of courage and determination, often displayed in the face of adversity, these men and women continue to provide the hope that is essential for younger generations, who strive for similar achievements.

Mr. Speaker, in order to highlight the wide range of black American contributions, I would like to bring to your attention two native Marylanders, Harriet Tubman and Benjamin Banneker. Harriet was born in Maryland's Dorchester County in the early 1820's. Harriet fled to the North to escape slavery and helped 300 slaves, including her parents, to flee through the "Underground Railroad." By touring the North to decry slavery, Harriet defied those people offering an unbelievable $40,000 reward for her capture. She demanded not only the abolition of slavery, but also a redefinition of women's rights.

During the Civil War, she served as a nurse, spy, and scout for the Union forces. Well acquainted with the countryside from her days as a conductor on the "Underground Railroad," she was considered especially valuable as a scout. During the last years of her life, she opened her home in Auburn, MA, to the aged and needy. She died in 1913, leaving her home to posterity as a monument to her character and will.

Benjamin Banneker, born a free black in Baltimore County in 1731, was a self-taught man of science and an almanac maker, who helped to draw the plans for the District of Columbia. By profession, he was a tobacco planter. His amateur interest in astronomy led him to make projections for solar and lunar eclipses and to compute tables of the locations of celestial bodies. Abolition societies in Maryland and Pennsylvania were instrumental in the publication of almanacs of his findings. At the age of 30, Benjamin constructed a striking wooden clock without having seen a clock before that time, although he had examined a pocket watch.

Benjamin did not forget his brethren in chains. He wrote to Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, with a letter rebuking Jefferson for his proslavery views and urging the abolition of slavery. Described by some writers as the first American black man of science, Benjamin was an extremely competent mathematician and amateur astronomer.

Nearly one century later, Abraham Lincoln continued the call for freedom in his Emancipation Proclamation, stating:

That on the 1st day of January, A.D. 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free * * *."

The desegregation movement of the 1950's and the civil rights movement of the 1960's yielded victories as awe-inspiring as the Emancipation Proclamation of the great Lincoln himself. Because so many of the black people we honor were and are activists for greater civil liberties, Black History Month offers the valuable opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to principles that result in free minds and free spirits. We must reaffirm our commitment to protect civil liberties in our own country, even as we pray for Nelson Mandela, Bishop Tutu, and the milions of black South Africans who are working for a peaceful transition to greater democracy in their country. In order for America to lead by example, we must ensure that all American men and women are treated equally by our laws.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to recognize the achievements of black Americans, not the least of which is their persistence in fighting for a commitment to civil liberties that benefits, not only present and future generations of Americans, but the world community as well.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in commemorating February as Black History Month. In 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson had an idea to celebrate the forgotten, ignored, and overlooked achievements of a race of people. Beginning as Negro History Week, Dr. Woodson's creation was designated by Congress in 1976 as a month-long observance intended for all Americans to learn of and appreciate the accomplishments of African-Americans.

"The Father of Black History" in the United States began life as a son of former slaves. From these humble beginnings, Dr. Woodson started on a journey in search of education, both for himself and for others. Whether studying in this Nation at the University of Chicago or at Harvard University, or abroad in Europe and Asia, he distinguished himself as a student of history.

Woodson knew that black people in America had been conditioned to believe that they, as a race, were inferior to whites. He understood that, although the physical chains of slavery had been removed, the psychological chains of bondage were still intact. To correct this condition, Woodson began a lifelong mission to achieve a new and more positive kind of thinking among his people. Conducting comprehensive research, this remarkable scholar published numerous books and journals to reeducate those who were the victims of a miseducation.

To achieve his goal of reeducation for the masses, Woodson founded the Association for the Study of Negro Life and History in 1915. The following year, he inaugurated the "Journal of Negro History" and served as its director and editor. Through this publication, as well as through such books as "The Mis-Education of the Negro," Woodson established himself as the foremost historian of African-American history.

Though Woodson died in 1950, he left behind a great collection of works that reflect his never-ending effort to spread knowledge. After his death, his legacies of teaching self-education and the need for a positive self-esteem continued. As the activities of the civil rights movement of the sixties grew, so did the emphasis on cultural pride and awareness. The movement's two most prominent leaders, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Malcolm X, shared Woodson's belief that "if a race has no recorded history, its achievements will be forgotten and finally claimed by other groups." Because of this view, both men led passionate crusades to achieve black self-awareness through reeducation.

Common acts of overt discrimination and racial violence that once scarred this Nation have gradually vanished, although such ugly instances do, at times, resurface. The recent mail bomb murders of a Federal judge and a civil rights attorney are just two examples of the racial hatred that remains alive today. Also, we should not forget that, for a variety of reasons, a significant number of African-Americans currently have very little opportunity to realize that fabled American dream.

Though America remains far from Dr. King's dream of racial harmony, the remarkable strides toward full justice and equality for all citizens can be observed across the country. As we near the 21st century, we can see noticeable changes in the American population. During the past year, great achievements have been made in the city halls and State capitals of this Nation. In Virginia, the cradle of the Confederacy, the grandson of a slave, Douglas Wilder, has risen to be the first elected African-American Governor. In Mississippi, the heart of the Deep South, there are now more African-American elected officials than in any other State in the Union. In New York City, Mayor David Dinkins is also breaking new political ground. In fact, in cities as diverse as Cleveland, Seattle, Detroit, and Los Angeles, African-American mayors have broken down racial barriers.

Also, during our commemoration of black achievements, let us also celebrate this month's release of South Africa's Nelson Mandela. Mr. Mandela's continuing resistance to an unjust system of apartheid is an example of undying determination. He shares a common bond with African-Americans, in his persistent struggle for complete equality and justice.

The innumerable contributions that African-Americans have made to this Nation can never be fully recorded. Brought to our shores to be the burden-bearers of a beginning country, they have endured through adverse and hostile conditions to achieve success. In politics, academics, medicine, science, the arts, sports, and entertainment, they have reached great heights. During this deserved celebration of a people's heritage and culture, let us never forget to continue striving to make both the American dream and Dr. King's dream realities for all.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, for over 14 years February has been observed and celebrated as Black History Month. During this time many black Americans have been recognized for their outstanding accomplishments and contributions to the history of our Nation. The tribute to these famous black historians continues today as we highlight a wide range of contributions that black Americans have made to our society.

Many black Americans have touched our lives with their beliefs and actions. One of the most prominent of those who helped to change the course of American history was Dr. Carter Woodson. Dr. Woodson's life was a fascinating story in itself. He was an outstanding educator, a detailed writer, and a leading black historian. Dr. Woodson has made vast contributions to the recording of black history and is recognized by many as the "Father of Negro History."

The son of former slaves, Dr. Woodson was unable to attend school until the age of 20. He was self-instructed and received his high school diploma in less than 2 years. After high school Dr. Woodson went on to the University of Chicago, Harvard, and the Sorbonne where he learned to speak French and Spanish fluently. Dr. Woodson was always ambitious for more education. He had a deep passion to learn and to pass on what he had learned to others. His hunger to teach eventually brought him back to the high school he had graduated from just 4 years earlier. He went on to serve as dean of the School of Liberal Arts of Howard University and as dean of the West Virginia Collegiate Institute. Dr. Woodson had a strong desire to be the very best that he could be and because of his great personal and educational achievements he serves as an inspiring example to us all.

Today, with our children falling dreadfully behind in their education, and with so many distinguished role models to whom they may aspire, we must all do our best to inform them about the great men and women who played an important role in making American history. If we do this, we will provide them with great examples to follow and with even greater reasons to lead. Our children are witnesses to the rapid and dramatic changes that are occurring in the world today; freedom, justice, democracy and peace are taking hold around the globe. And all of it before their very eyes.

Yet sadly, too many of our children are poorly educated, and woefully ignorant of black history. It is our responsibility to make sure that each and every one of them become educated. Our children need to know that just as the people of Eastern European countries are struggling today to bring about the freedom and justice that had been missing from their lives for so long, black Americans are still struggling to achieve the same goals here in our country.

Rosa Parks spoke recently about her role in the civil rights movement. A modest person, she said that her role in history was small, but that it has the potential of being great if the children of America learn of the values and beliefs that she so firmly believed, embraced, and supported. "If they learn and understand why I did what I did, then someday maybe they will make a difference too."

Dr. Woodson served as a prominent black role model for many in the early 1900's. He believed that if the history of his people was not recorded in some way, then his people's achievements would be forgotten and eventually claimed by other groups. He would never let this happen and thanks to him, we will never forget. In our time we have come to recognize many famous people, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Linda Brown, Marion Anderson, Jackie Robinson, to name just a few, as being firsts for their times. Dr. King was the first person to rally over 200,000 people together to appeal for racial equality. Linda Brown's case, Brown versus the Board of Education of Topeka, became the first suit against a board of education that challenged segregation as being unequal and unconstitutional. Marion Anderson was another great first. She was the first black singer to perform at the Lincoln Memorial in front of more than 75,000 people. The first black player in modern major league baseball is a title that belongs to Jackie Robinson.

The key to all of this is that we have learned from these famous people and our lives have been changed by these people. They have educated us with their desires for freedom, justice, democracy, and peace.

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, let me also commend the gentleman from Ohio who has convened this special time to honor this special group of Americans who have risen against great odds, and have made many significant contributions to our great country. I might add, a country which in its own unique way created the special atmosphere which allows the underdog to rise up like the proverbial phoenix from the ashes of despair, and challenge those outmoded institutions which would denegrate the rights of any person based on race.

History is probably the most subjective of social sciences, always seen through the eyes of he who prepares the chronicle, unfortunately sometimes these observers are not noted for their objectivity, making events appear according to their interpretation.

Before the mid-20th century very little balance existed in the chronicle of American society. It is therefore appropriate that Black History Month be dedicated to Carter G. Woodson who richly deserves the title of "Father of Black History", his work as historian, educator, editor, and author makes him a pioneer in the field of black history and interpretation of the black image. This broadened interpretation and improved self-image has resulted in the rise of events and personalities among black leaders in America.

With the establishment in 1916 of the "Journal of Negro History", and Negro History Week in 1926, which later became Black History Month, Carter G. Woodson set in motion activities and events which have changed the shape of not only black history, but of American history as well.

On August 28, 1963, Dr. Martin Luther King gave his most passionate address most known as "I had a Dream". I believe that Carter G. Woodson also had a dream, and that his was not so different from that of Dr. King. Carter Woodson would have been proud to see many of the changes in the late 20 century with many firsts for black Americans moving into leadership roles at all levels of our society. In politics, the great State of Virginia elected Douglas Wilder as the first black Governor; Gen. Colin Powell, is Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. There is no question that black Americans have made it to the top in the highest fields of endeavor and professionalism in American society today.

I believe an important consideration is that these individuals have not reached these high positions because of racial considerations. No, it is because they have competed in the open arena and won with the support of all in their communities and spheres of influence. Fairness and merit is all that is needed to enhance our democratic principles, which is what America is all about.

As we enter that last decade of the 20-century we can look back and see that much has been accomplished, even the last and most adament adversary toward racial equality has started to succomb. With the release of Nelson Mandela and a commitment to sit down and discuss the problems of apartheid and their resolution in partnership with the black leadership, the leaders of the last bastion of separatism and racial tension has begun to yield.

What greater tribute to Carter G. Goodson than to close the 20-century with terms related to race and color being outmoded and replaced by "people."

Mr. Speaker I submit this is how we measure the greatness of this wonderful country of ours. Justice and fairness is colorblind, and truly the struggles, tribulations, and hardships experienced by our Black American community over the years—is something we ought never forget. We have attempted to correct many wrongs of the past, and I pay special tribute to our black community throughout the United States for bringing about constructive and meaningful changes for the benefit of all citizens—for all races, all nationalities, all creeds, and all denominations.

Mr. Speaker, I salute Black History Month and my highest commendation to all black leaders throughout America for their faithful services and untiring beliefs in providing for a more fair and just society.

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of Black History Month, I would like to introduce a man that made history in Ohio's Ninth Congressional District. It is an honor to pay tribute to an outstanding young man of 91 years of age. He is a man for all seasons. James B. Simmons, Jr., is a man whose intelligence, composure, and dignity positively influenced all those, whose lives he has touched. His lifelong devotion to his wife Isabelle marks him as a man of love and valor. J.B. grew up in Georgia in the early part of this century. His entire life demonstrates a commitment to people, to human development, and service to his community. J.B. Simmons began his career beating the odds in pre-civil-rights days when Martin Luther King, Jr., and Jesse Jackson were too young to have national influence. He achieved two positions in Toledo that had never been held before by blacks. The values of commitment and service were instilled in him at a young age and guided his life thereafter.

J.B., as his friends call him, began his learning process with his father who taught him carpentry. His educational attainment in the post-World War I years set a pace for others to follow. He attended Booker T. Washington Tuskegee Institute, graduating in 1921 with a degree in printing. He accepted a job at an African Methodist Episcopal Church college in Florida, but a Lincoln University professor encourage him to attend that university. The educators found a scholarship for him to help him afford the costs. During the summers, he worked as pullman porter to supplement the scholarship. He obtained a pre-law degree from Lincoln University in 1925. Later, he received Lincoln's alumni award as a distinguished graduate. These were important accomplishments for a black man who once dared to dream of a life as a painter or a school teacher. In 1935 he moved to Toledo. His desire was to do advanced study in law school but he was hindered by lack of financial resources. However, he persevered and was able to attend night school at the University of Toledo's law program. He graduated with law degree in 1945. In 1950, his zeal for education was recognized by former Ohio Gov. Frank J. Lausche, who appointed him to the board of trustees for the College of Education and Industrial Arts at Wilberforce University.

In 1945, after 9 years as a resident of Toledo, he began serving the Toledo community. J.B. decided to pursue a seat on Toledo City Council. With $2,100 that was raised for the effort from businesses and local unions, he achieved a ninth place finish. It earned him a place in the history books of the 20th century. He holds the distinction of being the first black in the history of our community to be elected to that body. J.B.'s victory drew national attention. However, J.B. was very modest about his role in the victory, "* * * it wasn't J.B. Simmons that won. It was a crusade, a crusade that involved the whole community. Maybe I motivated people. That was all." From his first days on council, Mr. Simmons made it clear that he would use his seat to continue the struggle for racial equality. The next election in 1947 brought much more favorable results; he finished fourth. Still better, in 1949, Mr. Simmons finished third. You can't help but know J.B. and come to respect him more and more.

Mr. Simmons also worked for the community by being an active member in many service-oriented organizations such as Ohio Welfare Council, Federal Housing and Rent Control Board, Selective Service Advisory Board, the Planning Committee for the YMCA's town meeting and Grand Master of the Free and Accepted Masons. J.B. involved himself in order to promote change in his community. Looking back, J.B. states, "I may not live to see all the changes that need to take place, but I guess I've seen a few." Mr. Simmons is held in the highest regard throughout our community.

In 1959, he achieved the distinguished position of vice mayor, again a first-time achievement for a black in our community. At his victory rally he stated, "Sometimes they will understand me, sometimes they won't agree with me, and sometimes they will wish they had not elected me, but I promise not to forget that I represent the people." And Mr. Simmons kept his word. He spent 7 terms, 14 years serving the people of Toledo. It was during this period, that I remember my own father paying him the highest compliment my father could pay any person, "J.B. Simmons is an honest man."

J.B. was also a key figure in civil rights activities throughout his life. He was instrumental in integrating plants in Toledo and opening new avenues for blacks by breaking down barriers to black employment in stores, hospitals, factories, and public transportation. He was a forefather of the Mass Movement League, which brought blacks together for the purpose of pursuing civil rights. The league employed direct action with picket lines, mass rallies, and confrontation to force cab companies to hire blacks as drivers, convince local hospitals to allow blacks to become nurse's aides and nurse trainees, and persuade the telephone companies to hire blacks as telephone operators. An early protest in November 1942 targeted unfair practices at a local organization. The picket line drew 50 police officers and resulted in an injury to a pregnant woman who was picketing. The league produced a leaflet asking, "How long will black men stand by and see their pregnant women beat up with the nightsticks of these police officers?" Later, 1,500 people gathered at the Frederick Douglass Community Center to hear Mr. Simmons call for justice. Looking back J.B. stated, "That was where we really started to move. People saw the need for a mass movement and they started joining." The league was also influential in making sure that blacks obtained jobs utilizing machinery instead of being floor sweepers at organizations like Champion Spark Plug Co. and Willys-Overland. J.B. states today, "I don't like to say I accomplished things, but I think I helped create an atmosphere where blacks had more opportunities in the city. I showed people that blacks could serve the community." J.B. was also a member of the NAACP and a patron of Eastern Star, a women's group similar to the Masons. As Mamie Williams, the first black deputy registar for this area stated, "Everyone looked up to him as a father; he has been a leader of blacks for the last half century."

After 1962, he devoted his time to being an attorney. Even then, he continued to help black people by getting many of the city's most prominent black lawyers get started. Among the lawyers he mentored was his son, J.B. Simmons III.

Mr. Speaker, I am honored to be able to recognize James B. Simmons today. He has moved this country forward by his vision, strength, and determination to move history, beginning here in our own city. He has done this always with such aplomb and good will, I do not believe there is a single person who does not hold him in the highest esteem. His life honestly made a difference in Toledo, in Ohio, and in our Nation. It gives me great pleasure to share with my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives a glimpse at the life of my dear friend J.B. Simmons, Jr., for whom I hold the deepest respect and admiration. May he and his wife be blessed always for what they have done for others. J.B. has lived the words that were stated by Robert Kennedy in 1969, "Some men see things as they are and say why? I dream of things that never were and say why not?"

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Mr. STOKES, for calling this special order on Black History Month. It is especially fitting that this year's theme is "The Father of Black History, Carter G. Woodson: A Living Legacy" as we witnessed in 1989 the removal of long established racial barriers with the elections of David Dinkins, Norman Rice, and L. Douglas Wilder; and 1990 has already proven to be a watershed in black history throughout the world with the release of Nelson Mandela. I am proud to take part in this special order to celebrate the significant contributions of African-Americans to our society.

The work of Carter Woodson has enabled all of us as a nation to study the history of African-Americans. His work has opened new frontiers for scholars. Mr. Woodson's publications have been used as the standard text in the study of black history in this country. His life was dedicated to chronicling the achievements of the African-American community with the belief that if a race has no recorded history then its achievements will be forgotten.

As an accomplished historian, Carter Woodson recognized the need to celebrate the achievements and contributions of blacks worldwide. Most of the resources on black history available today can be traced back to Carter Woodson. His work serves as an inspiration to all of us.

I believe that Mr. Woodson's work serves a significant function in our society. It is critically important to educate our children to the 300 years of struggle of African-Americans. Black History Month and the work of Carter Woodson help us to focus on the past, present, and future of the fight for social justice in our society. We must recognize that the struggle is still far from being over. Yet this year we should be encouraged by the progress we have made. Not long ago freedom for Nelson Mandela seemed unlikely and an end to apartheid appeared impossible.

I am proud to represent an area where we enjoy an abundance of creativity and innovation within our African-American community. With the help of the Glide Memorial Church, St. Paul of the Shipwreck, the Third Baptist Church, the Washington Senators, and the Omega Boys Club, we will find solutions to the crises in education and drugs. I am encouraged by the work of these groups within our community and I commend them for their creativity and achievements.

I look forward to continuing my involvement as an associate member of the Black Caucus to ensure job opportunities, affordable housing, health care, and drug treatment and rehabilitation services for all Americans. Again I would like to thank the gentleman from Ohio for calling this important special order. Thank you.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, well over a half-century ago, historian Carter G. Woodson posited that a people whose history and achievements go unrecorded "becomes a negligible factor in the thought of the world and stands the danger of being exterminated." Motivated by his own foreboding, Carter G. Woodson set out to document the experience of black women and men in Africa and the "New World," and to record the tremendous contributions of African-Americans to the Nation in which they toiled for three centuries as slaves.

Woodson's scholarship brought new integrity to the study of black history and culture and earned him the title, "Father of Black History." Woodson believed that "the achievements of the Negro properly set forth will crown him as a factor in early human progress and a maker of modern civilization." Africans, he wrote, "produced in ancient times a civilization [which] influenced the [Mediterranean] cultures * * * and taught the modern world trial by jury, music by stringed instruments, the domestication of sheep, goat, and cow and the use of iron by which science and invention have remade the universe. Must we let this generation continue ignorant of these eloquent facts?" Sadly, generations do, still, continue ignorant of these eloquent facts, despite the efforts of Dr. Woodson and his proteges.

Subsequent research has revealed volumes more about the centrality of black Africa in the spawning of modern civilization and about the central role of African-Americans in building, literally and figuratively, this great Nation. Yet, mournful are the voices which attest, in swelling choruses, to a dearth of positive black role models for today's African-American youth. I believe that there is, in fact, a wealth of positive African-American role models whose examples beg exposure and emulation.

I rise today to recognize a number of African-Americans from the Los Angeles area who have made noteworthy contributions to the advancement of their respective professions and from whose pioneering work the African-American community derives significant benefit.

Leroy Weekes, M.D., is a prominent Los Angeles obstetrician with an established record of community service and leadership in the medical profession which spans over 40 years. He continues to practice in my district at the Julian Ross Medical Center, which Dr. Weekes named for his mentor at Howard University Medical School where he trained. Throughout his career, Dr. Weekes has been active in community affairs. Dr. Weekes initiated efforts to establish a Martin Luther King, Jr. Medical Center to serve residents of the South-Central Los Angeles area.

L. Julian Haywood, M.D., is professor of medicine and director of the Coronary Care Unit at LAC/USC Medical Center. He is vice president, cofounder and former president of the Sickle Cell Disease Research Foundation and former president of the American Heart Association's Los Angeles affiliate. Dr. Haywood has published scores of articles in numerous scientific journals and serves on several medical review boards. He has conducted pioneering research in the areas of hypertension, sickle cell disease, and computer applications in cardiology, and has been committed to addressing the medical and health care needs of the African-American and disadvantaged communities.

My esteemed colleague and friend, U.S. Congressman AUGUSTUS "GUS" HAWKINS, whose district includes Watts, South Central Los Angeles and Huntington Park, will retire this year from over a half century in elected office. Representative HAWKINS served for 28 years in the California Assembly before being elected the first African American Representative from a Western State in 1962. In 28 years in Congress, GUS HAWKINS has compiled a distinguished record at the national level as a staunch advocate of the poor, minorities, and the disadvantaged, and he is responsible for important legislation in the areas of civil rights, employment, and education. He is responsible for the creation of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission [EEOC] under title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and is currently chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor.

Rev. James Lawson has contributed to the human community as a spiritual leader, civil rights activist, and peacemaker. As president of the United Methodist Youth Fellowship, Reverend Lawson spent over a year in Federal prison as a conscientious objector. As a close associate of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., Lawson trained freedom riders and became one of the preeminient voices for nonviolent direct action. Today Reverend Lawson focuses his energies on the problems of the urban poor in Los Angeles, as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference/Greater Los Angeles and vice president of the SCLC national board. Additionally, he is pastor of Holman United Methodist Church and president of the Peace with Justice Leadership Conference, a coalition of 60 denominational and religious groups.

Herbert L. Carter is executive vice chancellor of California State University and the first black chairman of the board of the United Way of Greater Los Angeles. Carter earned his doctorate in education administration, and is responsible for guiding, coordinating, and integrating policy formulation and program planning for the entire California State University system. A longtime volunteer, Mr. Carter has held numerous positions with the United Way and is responsible for the creation of the United Way's Black Partnership Development Council.

For 20 years, Willie West has taught classes and coached the basketball team at Crenshaw High School. During that time, Crenshaw has maintained a virtual stranglehold on Los Angeles city's top high school basketball honors, garnering an incredible 11 city championships and 4 State championships. The Cougars have amassed a total of 433 victories against 48 losses overall for an amazing winning percentage of 90 percent against all opponents—giving West one of the highest winning percentages among high school basketball coaches in the Nation.

Astronaut Ron McNair was one of four African-Americans participating in the American space program at the time of his death. McNair was a trained physicist and a mission specialist on the ill-fated 1986 space shuttle Challenger mission. A graduate of North Carolina State A&T University, McNair received his Ph.D. in philosophy and physics from MIT. McNair was an enthusiastic individual whose love of science and discovery was an inspiration to the African-American youth whose interest he encouraged in the sciences.

Dr. Mae Jemison is the first black woman accepted to participate in NASA's Astronaut Corps Training Program. A graduate of Stanford University and Cornell University School of Medicine, Jemison worked as a Peace Corp medical officer in Sierra Leone and Liberia before applying to NASA in 1986. Dr. Jemison now awaits her opportunity to become America's first black woman in space, as a mission specialist on an upcoming space shuttle mission.

Beyond Los Angeles, African-Americans can take pride in the steady rise in the number of black officials elected and appointed to high office. Speaker of the California Assembly Hon. Willie Brown, majority whip of the U.S. House of Representatives, Hon. BILL GRAY, Virginia Governor Douglas Wilder, New York City Mayor David Dinkins, Commander in Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff General Colin Powell, and Secretary of Health Dr. Louis Sullivan have all attained positions of leadership never before occupied by blacks.

Clearly, the recent ascension of African-Americans to key posts in government and the professions has not and will not, by itself, eradicate the range of problems plaguing the African-American community. Nevertheless, it is important that African-American youth take note of the despite-the-odds accomplishments of the black men and women I have mentioned. Each one of them has overcome imposing obstacles to reach their respective position, and all have given generously to the African-American community that is their common base. Thus, it is in the spirit of Carter G. Woodson, and with the hope that the black youth of today will be inspired to heighten their own aspirations, that I recognize these contemporary African-American role models whose lives comprise a significant part of the ever-expanding body of eloquent African-American historical facts.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Ohio for taking out this special order today on the contributions that black Americans have made to our Nation's history.

The year 1989 was an important year for black public officials and their contributions to society. We saw recent history made with the election of Douglas Wilder of Virginia as the first black elected Governor in America, and through the election of New York City's first black mayor, David Dinkins.

Late in the year, Gen. Colin Powell, the first black chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, directed the military invasion of Panama, liberating that country from the oppressive rule of Gen. Manuel Noriega.

The year 1989, was also a year that tragedy struck one of my colleagues and a leader in Congress, when Congressman Mickey Leland was killed in a plane crash on a visit to a refugee camp in Ethiopia. Mickey Leland's efforts to end hunger in America and Africa have left us all a goal to achieve and a legacy to live up to. Mickey's successor, Congressman Craig Washington, has promised to continue those goals and I know that I and other Members will be working with him toward those efforts.

The theme this year for Black History Month is "The Father of Black History, Carter G. Woodson: A Living Legacy." Today we celebrate the contributions of Carter Woodson and his introspectives of black life and black history in America.

It is my hope that as this country enters the last decade of the 20th century, we will witness a greater understanding of black history and black culture and the important role black Americans have played in the formulation of this Nation.

I want to express my appreciation to the members of the Congressional Black Caucus and thank them for allowing me to enter my comments into the record on the occasion of this historic special order.

Mr. TANNER. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in this special order today to commemorate Black History Month. It is appropriate that we take the time each year to focus on the achievements of black Americans throughout our history. The observance of Black History Month offers us all an opportunity to gain a better understanding and appreciation for the contributions black Americans have made, and are making, to our society.

Like all of our colleagues, I take great pride in the many attractions of my congressional district that make it unique to the other 434 congressional districts in this great Nation. Of special significance today is the town of Henning, TN, the birthplace of author Alex Haley and the home of the Alex Haley Museum.

The reason I feel that is significant on this occasion is that the list of contributions of black Americans to American society is not complete without those of Mr. Haley. His literary works have focused on the heritage of black Americans and the terrible obstacles they had to overcome to achieve the hopes and dreams all Americans yearn for. Indeed, his legendary book "Roots" itself is a significant contribution to our society.

Not only did that book chronicle the Haley family, it provided black Americans a source of pride in their African heritage.

Moreover, it vividly sensitized white Americans to the cruely of slavery, the tragedy of freedom denied, and the hardships faced by black Americans.

While each of these accomplishments are noteworthy in and of themselves, there is another that was significant as well. It is the great interest that "Roots" generated in many Americans in their own heritage. It renewed for many the desire to bring families back together for reunions and renewal of familial bonds so important to any society, but of even greater value in this Nation of immigrants.

So, as we commemorate Black History Month, I think it is important that we look now only at the past, but at the present achievements of those thousands of living black Americans who toil diligently every day making contributions, large and small, that enhance the lives of all of us and the generations that are to follow.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include therein extraneous material on the special order just completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on each motion on which further proceedings were postponed in the order in which that motion was entertained.

Votes will be taken in the following order:

Conference report on H.R. 2742, by the yeas and nays; and House Concurrent Resolution 87, by the yeas and nays.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for the second electronic vote.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2742, LIBRARY SERVICES AND CONSTRUCTION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1990

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending business is the question of suspending the rules and agreeing to the conference report on the bill, H.R. 2742.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the House suspend the rules and agree to the conference report on the bill, H.R. 2742, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 401, nays 4, not voting 26, as follows:

Mr. ARMEY and Mr. BARTLETT changed their vote from "yea" to "nay."

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the time within which a vote by electronic device may be taken on the additional motion to suspend the rules on which the Chair has postponed further proceedings.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained in Connecticut this afternoon and missed two votes.

Had I been here, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall 16, approving the conference report on H.R. 2742, the library services and construction amendments.

I would also have voted "aye" on rollcall 17, passage of House Concurrent Resolution 87, which condemns persecution of Baha'is in Iran.

EXPLANATION OF MISSED VOTES

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, because of meetings in the Senate with Senator GRASSLEY and the Iowa League of Postmasters and representatives from the North Iowa Community College, I missed rollcall votes 16 and 17 on H.R. 2742 and House Concurrent Resolution 87, respectively. While both passed overwhelmingly, I want to make clear that had I been present I would have voted in favor of both. My record on H.R. 2742 is clear. I supported it when it was before the House Education and Labor Committee, on which I serve, and when it was first before the House last September.

CONCERNING IRANIAN PERSECUTION OF THE BAHA'IS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending business is the question of suspending the rules and agreeing to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 87).

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY] that the House suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 87) on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 404, nays 0, not voting 27, as follows:

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to district commitments, I was forced to miss three recorded votes this week.

Had I been in Washington, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall 16, the conference report on H.R. 2742, the Library Services and Construction Act amendments. I would have also voted "aye" on rollcall 17, House Concurrent Resolution 87, concerning Iranian persecution of the Baha'is.

Mr. Speaker, I take great pride in my voting record which was over 99 percent last year. I do not take my voting responsibilities lightly, however, this situation was simply unavoidable.

MORE THAN MEETS THE EYE IN CLEAN AIR DEBATE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Louisiana). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. POSHARD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. POSHARD. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this time today and in future afternoons and evenings to ask for your attention to a very serious matter.

As we all know, revisions to the Clean Air Act are on their way. For my district in southern Illinois the impact could be devastating if we don't make some changes.

So over the course of the next few weeks and months, I am going to take the time to tell you a little about what we think could be done, and the consequences if we do not.

Southern Illinois is coal mining country. Presidential tickets of both parties have come to our mines to learn about the industry and the men and women who work there.

I would like to take this opportunity to issue an open invitation to anyone in this body who wants to know more about coal mining, the people who depend on it for their survival, and the issues involved in this clean air debate, to come to southern Illinois for a first hand look. We will do that at your convenience.

One thing you will learn is the coal there is high quality but also in some instances high in sulphur content. That is what makes it a target of this legislation.

One Member who has taken the opportunity to find out more about the relationship between coal and clean air is my friend, Congressman ESTEBAN TORRES. He brought the Small Business Subcommittee on Labor and the Environment to southern Illinois for a hearing on the impact of acid rain legislation on small businesses and the coal mines.

Here is the text of that hearing. It answers some of the questions you may have about what stake southern Illinois and the Midwest has in this debate, and why we are so committed to making modifications to any legislation that would throw our people out of work.

Let me encourage you to pick up a copy, or ask me for one, and just read some of the testimony.

Just as a foreword, let me take a few revelations from this hearing for your consideration.

Here is what Congressman TORRES said:

As we look at the Clean Air Act or the clean air bill, we must understand the adverse affect on small businesses and the coal industry so we can minimize the economic disruptions. And those are: layoffs, plant closings, mine closings, dislocations of people. And it causes great economic misery to communities.

The United States Congress is a place and an opportunity for all views and voices to be heard through hearings very much like this one.

Let me thank Congressman TORRES for his commitment to this dialoge.

That is what southern Illinois wants. A chance to make its case, and I am going to bring it to you as best as I can in the upcoming debate.

What will I be talking about?

You will hear from the United Mine Workers, who predict 19,000 jobs lost, directly and indirectly, if the President's bill passes without any changes. And the Illinois Coal Association, which predicts real disaster for the coal industry in my State. Even before the bill is really considered, the bad news is rolling in. Old Ben Coal No. 21 closes, 337 left jobless. Two family members of my staff are affected by that. Everyone in southern Illinois feels the effect.

You will hear from utility companies like Central Illinois Public Service Co., which says if it and other utilities like it are impacted with legislation that keeps them from using Illinois coal, the mines will be devastated, and people at home will feel a resounding thud when that increased utility bill hits their mailbox.

And we could go on and on with spinoff effects in small businesses that serve the mines and the people who work in them. I do not mean to exaggerate. We are talking about outright economic disaster being heaped on areas on the country like mine. And I suggest to my colleagues—there must be a more fair solution.

Yes, one of the arguments you will hear me make is for some kind of cost-sharing approach to reducing utility plant emissions. And I think the historical basis for that is clear.

When the savings and loan industry needed billions, we took it from all of the American taxpayers, even though the problem was in many ways fairly centralized to a few particular States. That is one example. There are hundreds of problems that have faced one area especially that have been met with a national solution. We suggest the same can be done here.

Now I know some of you must think that I do not support clean air, or that I want us to ignore that problem, pretend it does not exist, or otherwise turn our backs on it. I do not believe that at all.

I definitely want us to make progress on cleansing our environment for my kids and yours to enjoy. I understand the principle that we have been given but one mother earth, that we are the stewards of her destiny, and as a young man who grew up on the rich earth of southeastern Illinois and all it offered, I am very much aware of what damage can be done.

And I do not suggest that those of you who champion this cause of clean air amendments that crack down hard on plant emissions and other types of pollutants are insensitive to the plight of coal miners in my district. I know your intent is not to harm them or their way of life.

I see it more as a balancing test. We have the need for cleaner air that we must meet, and we have the need for jobs and an economy that produces goods and services.

Those needs are not mutually exclusive. They can be met together. With a real program of clean coal technology, a cost-sharing approach to the cleanup, and a commitment to long range solutions, we can meet all of the diverse needs of this country.

That is what makes us so great today, the ability to address a problem in an open and democratic way. I encourage us to take that approach with the clean air bill. We will all be better off for having done so.

A TRIBUTE TO BENNINGTON HIGH SCHOOL

(Mr. WATKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, not so long ago I would not have stood before you with the pride, enthusiasm and hope that I have today. Not so long ago I was nearly ready to agree with the naysayers. The television and newspapers brought reports of drug-related death, crime, and violence to my home almost daily. And I have witnessed far too many families suffer the pain caused by drugs. I grew sad and then mad when I imagined the future of a nation on its knees, helpless, and hopeless.

But then I learned about a recent event at my alma mater—Bennington High School—in my hometown of Bennington, OK. And now I know that the tide is turning. There is light at end of the tunnel.

For many of you it might be hard to imagine that all the students at a high school would submit to a drug test. Now imagine every single one of those students volunteering for such a test. Yet that is exactly what happened at Bennington High School, which recently became the first 100 percent drug free high school in Oklahoma and perhaps the Nation. Every single student was tested for drugs and every single student passed.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it takes a team effort to achieve great goals. And that is just what is going on in Bennington. Local merchants, for example, have joined the effort by offering discounts to students certified as drug free. The local Jaycees sponsored a party for drug free students from Bennington and other communities in Bryan County. The merchants and the Jaycees decided that positive consequences ought to come from positive accomplishments. I agree.

But that's not the end of the story, Mr. Speaker. From now on, 10 percent of the high school students will be randomly selected and drug tested once a month. If I were a betting man, I would wager that Bennington High School will keep its drug free title.

Someone once said that a journey of a 1,000 miles begins with the first step. I recognize that this country has many miles to travel before arriving at a point where it can say it has won the war on drugs. And I don't deny, Mr. Speaker, that I am talking about a relatively small group of young people. But the steps they have taken symbolize something much bigger. Their action symbolizes a changing attitude and spirit among young people when it comes to drugs. It is happening all across this country, in the smallest towns and in the largest cities. And that is why I rise today with renewed hope and enthusiasm for America's future.

I close by taking you back to 1787. It was a time much like today, when this Nation's future was at a crosswinds. At the close of the Constitutional Convention, Benjamin Franklin rose and made an observation about the chair from which General Washington had been presiding. On the chair was the design of a Sun low on the horizon, and many of the delegates had wondered whether it was a rising or a setting Sun. "We know now," Franklin said. "It is a rising Sun and the beginning of a great new day."

And because of the students at Bennington High School, supported by their parents, teachers and community, I see a rising Sun and the beginning of a bright future for Oklahoma and for America.

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, February 24 marked the 72d anniversary of Estonian Independence Day, for it was on this date in 1918 that the Estonian people gained independence from the tyranny imposed on them for centuries by the Russians.

The people of Estonia were able to grow and prosper for 22 years after their declaration of independence. Sadly, late in the spring of 1940, the Soviets invaded Estonia, and began their efforts to suppress the culture, language, and religion of the Estonian people.

The Estonian people, however, remained steadfast in their desire for freedom, and during the last few months we have witnessed bold steps taken by Estonia to shake itself loose from the tyrannical yoke of the Communists. As this drive for independence is sweeping across the Baltic States, commemoration of Estonian independence takes on special significance. Estonian elections are scheduled for March 18, and if the recent elections in Lithuania are an indication of the rejection of Communist rule and the wave of nationalism rolling across the Baltic States, then Estonia will also continue on this road to self-determination.

On the occasion of the commemoration of Estonian Independence Day, Estonian-Americans gathered in New York, Chicago, Lakewood, New Jersey, and other locations throughout the United States, and approved a resolution calling for the withdrawal of Soviet military forces from Estonia and the restoration of independence for their beloved homeland. A copy of the resolution follows:

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY RESOLUTION

Whereas, we, Estonian-Americans, have gathered throughout the United States of America on this 24th day of February, 1990, to commemorate the 72nd anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Republic of Estonia on February 24, 1918;

Whereas, the government of the Soviet Union has, after many years of denial, admitted that the invasion and occupation of the Baltic Republics was a result of the infamous Molotiv-Ribbentrop Pact in which the Soviet Union colluded with Nazi Germany to allow the Soviet Union in 1940 to illegally seize and occupy the Republics of Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia and to incorporate them by force into the Soviet Union.

Whereas, the people of Soviet-occupied Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania have publicly let the world know of their desire for justice, human rights, the right for self-determination, and end of foreign occupation by participation in many massive demonstrations throughout their countries, as well as through their elected officials;

Whereas, the majority of Estonian people have recently registered themselves as citizens, or descendants of the citizens of the Republic of Estonia at the time of forcible occupation by the Soviet Union in 1940, with the goal of restoring the institutions and the government of the Republic;

Whereas, Estonian-Americans expect the United States Government to continue in its steadfast support of the policy of non-recognition of the illegal annexation of the Republic of Estonia by the Soviet Union in deeds as well as in words, particularly in any negotiations and agreements for reduction of military forces in Europe; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that we urge the President of the United States to take full advantage of the momentum generated by the prospect of negotiating the Conventional Forces in Europe treaty with the Soviet Union and demand: 1) that the Soviet Union withdraw all its military, as well as uniformed and secret police and border patrol forces from Soviet-occupied Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania; 2) that the Soviet Union allow restoration of unconditional independence for the Baltic republics; and 3) that the Soviet Union fully compensate for all property and human rights violations resulting from its illegal occupation of the Baltic states under the infamous 1939 Hitler-Stalin agreement; and be it further

Resolved, that we pledge that American citizens of Estonian descent will faithfully support all United States Government efforts to promote and secure basic human rights, including the right of self-determination, for all peoples and all nations; and be it further

Resolved, that we convey to the President of the United States our heartfelt greetings and pray that the Lord will guide him in his efforts to secure peace, justice, and freedom throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, on the inspiring occasion of the 72d anniversary of Estonian Independence Day, I am proud to join with Estonian-Americans in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Americans of Estonian descent throughout the United States, in celebration of this special day. Hopefully our continued support for the Estonian people will help them to achieve at long last their cherished dream of a truly free and independent Estonian state.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY SURPLUS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ENGEL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, there has been much discussion about the surplus in the Social Security fund, which is being used to reduce the national deficit. I propose that a portion of these funds be used to give senior citizens comprehensive, long-term health care benefits, including long-term nursing home care and a good prescription drug program. I would also use a portion of this surplus money to help the so-called "notch" babies born between 1917 and 1921. As you know, these people, through no fault of their own, receive less social security than others. This is unfair!

Our Government is constantly giving senior citizens the short end of the stick. The Government gives them help on the one hand and takes it away from them with the other. As a result, seniors are finding themselves worse off with each passing year. Because of these inadequacies seniors are forced to also pay more every year for private coverage.

Last year, seniors wanted the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act repealed. I supported this successful effort because of the inadequate coverage provided under the law and the horrendous surtax it required seniors to pay. However, the repeal of this law does not diminish the need for a long-term health care program—it only emphasizes the need to construct a more effective plan. The Government has an obligation to provide older Americans with proper medica coverage without an unfair and discriminatory surtax. We should not be using funds designated for Social Security to finance the Federal budget deficit, especially in light of the inadequate health care coverage provided by Medicare.

During my first year in Congress, a recurring theme in all my discussions with senior citizens was the need to make long-term health care widely available and affordable. A recent report from the Family U.S.A. Foundation found that 84 percent of older Americans cannot afford the cost of basic nursing home insurance. Additionally, many seniors currently in nursing homes have been forced to go into poverty in order to receive Medicaid coverage. This is a national disgrace!

The Federal Government must immediately address the need for long-term nursing home care and home health care services, as well as comprehensive prescription drug program. Congress must look at the possibility of using excess Social Security funds or investing them to finance a comprehensive health care program for older Americans.

Additionally, we must address the Social Security "notch" issue. Every Congress, bills to correct this injustice are introduced, but no action is taken on them. It is unfair that some people are being penalized because of the year they were born. These so-called "notch" babies should not continue to be second-class citizens.

Current estimates show that it will cost a total of $6 to $10 billion per year to correct the "notch". The Social Security surplus is currently $155 billion and is expected to rise to over $1 trillion by the end of the decade. It is only right for us to use a small portion of this money to correct this horrible discrimination.

Social Security was set up over 50 years ago to address the retirement needs of senior citizens. Throughout its existence, Social Security has adapted to address the changing needs of older Americans. Today, there are new and different issues which need to be confronted.

The United States has the resources to bail out the savings and loan industry, as well as build bombers at a cost of $500 million per plane. Surely, we can provide comprehensive health care for our senior citizens and correct the Social Security "notch." I look forward to working with my colleagues to see that the needs of our senior citizens are met.

MICKEY LELAND MEMORIAL DOMESTIC HUNGER RELIEF ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Louisiana). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to announce the introduction of a very special piece of legislation, the Mickey Leland Memorial Domestic Hunger Relief Act. This bill addresses the continuing problem of domestic hunger. I am pleased that this bill has been a bipartisan effort, thanks to the efforts of BILL EMERSON, the ranking Republican on the Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations and Nutrition Subcommittee. CHARLIE HATCHER, chairman of the subcommittee, has also been instrumental in the designing of this bill.

This bill is named for our late colleague, Mickey Leland. As you know, Mickey had a very personal interest in the issue of hunger, both domestic hunger and international hunger. Mickey was a special person. He had a rare combination of compassion and commitment. I would like to think of this bill as a sort of living memorial to Mickey and his work. By providing more food to the millions of American children living in poverty and by preventing some of those children and their families from being thrown into the ranks of the homeless, we can help Mickey Leland's spirit to live on.

Recent data indicate that two to five million children do not have adequate food and that millions more may be at risk of hunger. The U.S. Public Health Service has reported that the Surgeon General's goal of eliminating growth retardation of infants and children caused by inadequate diet cannot be met under present circumstances. Recent research shows that hungry children have significantly impaired abilities to learn and are more likely to suffer from health problems. Clearly, proper nutrition for all of our Nation's children and their families must be a top national priority.

I am proud to say that the legislation that we are introducing today is an entirely fitting memorial to Mickey Leland. The bill makes a serious effort to attack the causes of hunger rather than just its symptoms.

TO HELP THE HOMELESS AND THOSE ON THE BRINK OF HOMELESSNESS

The centerpiece of the bill is a pair of provisions designed to alleviate hunger among the homeless and near-homeless. HUD and Census Bureau data show that 45 percent of all poor renters spend at least 70 percent of their incomes on shelter costs. Households that are forced to devote this much of their income to shelter costs will almost by definition be at severe risk of hunger. Moreover, the high cost of shelter for low-income Americans is forcing more and more of them to double-up in housing. Unfortunately, current food stamp rules do not properly recognize the needs of these households.

Our bill would allow households with children to deduct high shelter costs in the same way that elderly and disabled households do at present. Under current law, households may deduct shelter expenses that exceed 50 percent of their incomes, but only up to $177 a month. The cap does not apply to elderly and disabled households.

The excess shelter deduction was enacted to avoid forcing households with high housing and utility costs to choose between eating and paying their shelter costs. But for households that are not elderly or disabled, this deduction is limited to $177 a month—even if the household's excess shelter costs are greater than this. This means that the very families that face the most severe housing cost burdens—families that do not receive HUD housing aid and that pay extremely high proportions of their incomes for housing—are the families that are not permitted to deduct the full cost of their excess shelter costs. Under the current food stamp benefit structure, families with very high shelter costs are thus assumed to have money available for food that actually must go to pay the rent and utility bills—and as a direct result their food stamp benefits are set at unrealistically low levels. The cap most severely burdens families with children since it is a fixed limit with no allowance for household size.

Since the cap was enacted in 1977, the low-income housing market has changed radically. In 1978, the number of low-rent housing units—defined as units renting for no more than $250 a month, as measured in 1985 dollars—exceeded the number of housholds with incomes below $10,000 a year. In 1985, there were 3.7 million fewer low-rent units than there were households below $10,000, a sharp reversal of the conditions that prevailed only 7 years earlier. The result has been a stunning incease in the housing cost burdens on poor households.

Moreover, the rationale for the cap has disappeared since 1977. Congress imposed the cap to keep middle income households from getting food stamps by claiming large shelter deductions. At the time, eligibility was based solely on income after deductions. Gross income limits have since been added to the program to exclude higher-income households without regard to their deductible expenses. Lifting the cap therefore will not allow middle income households to receive food stamps: it will only provide more realistic benefits to families with high shelter costs who are now eligible.

Our bill also would simplify the current food stamp household definition. It would require that persons purchasing and preparing food together apply for food stamps as a single household. Adults who buy and cook food on their own could do so as separate households from their relatives. For example, when two sisters who had previously lived on their own move into the same apartment because they cannot afford separate housing, either or both could apply for food stamps independently if they bought and cooked food separately. The bill would still require parents and their minor children to be in the same household.

Current law requires, subject to several exceptions, that parents and their adult children, and adult siblings, be in the same household even if they buy and cook food separately. State food stamp administrators have complained that the current definition is far too complex and excessively error-prone.

The current household definition discourages low-income people from doubling-up in the homes of relatives. This is extremely counter-productive at a time of rising homelessness. These rules hurt migrant farm workers, who may live separately in their base States but double-up with relatives in labor camps during their travels to save money.

The AFDC, Medicaid, and SSI Programs have no comparable rule requiring adult siblings, or parents and their adult children, to apply for and receive benefits together.

The bill would direct State agencies to certify homeless households on the basis of reported expenses for shelter except where the household's report is questionable. It would also have USDA issue rules under which State agencies could conduct surveys to determine how much homeless people in their jurisdictions typically spend on temporary shelter in the course of the month. Homeless households reporting shelter expenses up this level could be certified on that basis without having to produce receipts from people who put them up.

According to recent information from USDA, only 18 percent of homeless people are receiving food stamps even though virtually all are eligible. Social service agency staff working with the homeless report that, in most cases, the reason homeless people are not on the program is not resistance to dealing with public welfare system. Instead, the main problems are: First, homeless people's difficulty in complying with complex procedural requirements that were designed for households with stable living situations; and second, the small benefit allotments that homeless people receive under current procedures despite their high need.

Homeless people are unlikely to have birth certificates, social security cards, driver's licenses, and other similar documents with them. Whatever documents a homeless person starts out with may rapidly be destroyed by the elements, stolen, or inadvertently left behind when the homeless person is forced to leave somewhere quickly.

Also, homeless people with any income—such as county general relief or SSI checks—often live for part of each month in a cheap hotel or with acquaintances—who charges them rent by the day or the week. Homeless people seek out these accommodations because of crime and overcrowding at shelters, because shelters do not consistently have room for them—or have rules limiting how many nights they can stay—or because they live in rural areas or small towns that have no shelters. They may return to the street when their money, or their welcome runs out. Next time they have some money, they may return to the same place or find temporary abode for a few days or weeks somewhere else. But because they rarely get receipts for these expenses, and because they are inherently difficult to predict, current rules prevent food stamp offices from giving these household shelter deductions for them. Moreover, current budgeting rules deny homeless households credit even for expenses that they can verify.

As a result, homeless people rarely receive any shelter deduction even though they spend as much money as they can on housing. Therefore a homeless person getting general relief or SSI will get a very low food stamp allotment as their entire check is counted against their food stamps.

TO PROMOTE SELF-SUFFICIENCY

The bill seeks to promote self-sufficiency and personal responsibility in several ways. It would exclude the first $50 a month paid as child support from consideration as income in determining the food stamp allotments of AFDC households. AFDC already allows household to keep the first $50 of child support paid each month.

The $50 exclusion in AFDC recognizes the importance of having parents assume responsibility for their children: it gives custodial parents an incentive to seek out absent parents and absent parents an incentive to pay child support. The Food Stamp Program currently undercuts these incentives by counting the $50 payments as income, which reduces food stamps.

Excluding the first $50 of child support payments for food stamps as well as AFDC will simplify the administration of the two programs and ease burdens on case workers. This reform passed this body in 1987 as part of the welfare reform bill.

The bill would raise the current $4,500 limit on the fair market value of vehicles that food stamp recipients may own.

The current $4,500 vehicle limit was written into the Act in 1977 and has not changed since, despite substantial inflation. As inflation passes the $4,500 vehicle resource limit by, more and more working families are made ineligible for food stamps because of cars they depend upon to get to work. The Consumer Price Index for cars has risen 120 percent since 1977. Working households may be forced to choose between going hungry for lack of food stamps and selling their cars, which can force them to leave their jobs.

The President's task force on food assistance in January 1984 recommended that this limit be increased to $5,500 immediately. Increases in the limit passed the House with the 1985 farm bill in the Senate with the 1988 Hunger Prevention Act. The bill also would require USDA to conduct demonstrations to determine the effects of broader exclusions of one car for each food stamp households. We should do nothing that will compromise households' opportunities to retain and enhance their abilities to be self-sustaining. These demonstrations, conducted in a sufficient number of locations, should provide an opportunity to examine the impact of our vehicle rules on households' ability to get and keep jobs, and on needy households' ability to obtain food assistance.

The proposal would strengthen food stamp employment and training [E&T] programs in three ways. First, it would allow and encourage States to include initiatives to help recipients become self-employed in the employment and training programs. Resources needed for these ventures, such as looms, would be exempt. Second, it would increase the limit for reimbursements to recipients for the costs incurred in E&T activities—apart from child care—to $75 per month. Current law limits reimbursements for these costs to $25 a month and requires States to exempt households from work requirements if their costs would be higher. And third, it would test a State option to allow States to give priority in their E&T programs to volunteers.

The provision concerning volunteers would give States new opportunities to conform their food stamp E&T programs to the rules for AFDC's JOBS program. The Family Support act requires States to give first consideration to certain volunteers in their JOBS programs. Volunteers are likely to be more motivated and therefore better able to get the most out of an E&T program.

The bill would allow low-income people to receive food stamps while attending programs at colleges or universities as part of their compliance with food stamp E&T, the Trade Adjustment Act, or other State-operated employment and training programs. These students have already been determined to be legitimately low-income and the educational program essential to their long-term self-sufficiency. Students who are currently ineligible who are not in higher education through State or local training programs would continue to be ineligible.

This section also would remove the prohibition on receiving food stamps for students over age 50 who do not have at least half-time jobs but would make them subject to the food stamp E&T program. Current rules allow students over 60 to receive food stamps. Students over 50 are likely to be displaced homemakers or other workers seeking retraining for new jobs. Many of these students are unlikely to be able to obtain even part-time work unless they go to school. Their ability to remain viable members of the work force may depend upon this training, but current rules may prevent them from obtaining it without depriving their families of the means to eat. This provision would ensure that employers' preferences for younger workers do not deny these low-income people the chance to obtain food stamps.

Finally, this section would promote administrative simplicity in the rules for counting educational benefits as income. It would apply the rules that govern the large Federal educational benefit programs, such as Pell Grants and work-study, to all other forms of educational benefits.

A similar amendment regarding students and education assistance passed the House in 1987 as part of the welfare reform bill, H.R. 1720, but was dropped along with all other food stamp provisions from the final bill.

The bill would seek to preserve the role of parents in combined households by allowing household members to designate a parent of children in the household as its head. The fact that adult children move back in with their parents should not displace the parents' role as head of their own household. The intent here is merely to protect the commonsense meaning of what it is to be the head of a household.

The bill seeks to avoid hunger and hardship caused by inadequate benefits in the Food Stamp Program. Almost two-thirds of those getting food stamps are elderly, disabled, or children. Almost 83 percent of all food stamp benefits go to families with children.

TO PROMOTE BENEFIT ADEQUACY

The bill would raise basic food stamp benefit levels in stages to 105 percent of the Thrifty Food Plan. This needs to be done to allow households to purchase the Thrifty Food Plan for most or all of the year. Under the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988, basic food stamp benefits will reach 103 percent of the Thrifty Food Plan in fiscal year 1991. Food stamp benefit levels increase every October to reflect food costs the previous June.

Over the 13-year history of the Thrifty Food Plan, the average cost of the plan in the last half of the fiscal year has exceeded the cost in the previous June by an average of 5.4 percent. The adjustment to 105 percent of the previous June's cost is needed to make it much more likely that food stamp allotments will be sufficient to allow food stamp households to purchase the Thrifty Food Plan for most or all of the year.

It should be noted that even this increase is relatively modest. Food stamps provide an average of less than $0.57 per person per meal. The maximum food stamp benefit for a family of four provides only $0.91 per person per meal. FNS has reported that "fewer than 1 in 10 families spending an amount of money equivalent to the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan received 100 percent of the recommended daily allowances. Less than half received even two thirds of the recommended daily allowances."

The bill would return to the rule enacted in 1981 and eliminate the pro-rating of food stamps for households reapplying within 30 days of going off of the Program. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 [OBRA] required that new applicants for food stamps have their initial month's benefit prorated based upon the day of the month that they applied. OBRA 1982 extended prorating to recipients whose participation in the program is briefly interrupted because the household, for whatever reason, does not reapply by the first day of the month. A recent GAO report recommended this change back to the OBRA 1981 rule.

GAO found that the vast majority of the households suffering short gaps in benefits remain eligible throughout the period. Gaps frequently result from State errors, forms lost or delayed in the mails, or honest misunderstandings by household members. These gaps in benefits can force households to divert some of their rent, mortgage or utility money to pay for food, leaving them in danger of an eviction or a utility shut-off. The situation of recipients who suffer a brief gap in benefits is different from that of new applicants, who may have been living off of income from a job in the early part of the month before they applied for food stamps. The Drought Relief Act of 1988 enacted this provision for migrant farm workers, and the Senate's version of the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 would have applied this rule to all households.

The bill would specifically exclude from consideration as income the special back-to-school clothing allowances that West Virginia, Massachusetts, and New Mexico have been providing to poor families with school-age children for years. The exclusion would apply without regard to the form in which the allowance is provided. Until recently USDA generally had not treated these allowances as income, but a policy change in the last few years has led to litigation. This provision would recognize that presentable clothing is important to children's self-respect and ability to learn in school and would not reduce the food stamps of families receiving back-to-school clothing allowances.

The bill would index the $10 minimum benefit provided to one- and two-person households to reflect inflation. The current minimum benefit has been unchanged over the past 12 years. The cost of the Thrifty Food Plan has risen 89 percent over this period.

The purchasing power of the $10 minimum benefit has shrunk enormously over the years. For many minimum benefit households, the cost of traveling to certification and issuance centers is as much as or more than the amount delivered. Chief among the victims of this problem are the elderly and disabled, whose households constitute 87 percent of all those receiving the minimum benefit.

Indexing the minimum benefit for inflation will have relatively little cost but will ensure that it does not erode further. In the interest of administrative simplicity, the indexed amount will be rounded to the nearest $5.

TO IMPROVE EFFICIENCY AND ADMINISTRATION

The bill contains a number of other provisions to simplify program administration and reduce administrative burdens for State administrators. It would give States the option to reduce unnecessary paperwork by allowing those States that require monthly reporting the option to simplify their forms and have households report on a smaller number of subjects than at present.

The Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 gave States the option to eliminate monthly reporting altogether or to limit the categories of households subject to it in whatever manner they felt appropriate. Some States have taken advantage of this option. Other States, however, wish to continue collecting monthly reports from some households but would like to simplify the reporting process by reducing the number of items on which each household must report. This amendment would give States the opportunity to do so.

The bill adopts an administration proposal to allow one household member to sign all declarations required in the application process on behalf of the household. In rural areas, where transportation to food stamp offices is often more costly and difficult, requiring multiple signatures can impose a substantial burden on low-income households because of pro-rating. State food stamp administrators have advocated this change as a benefit both to food stamp offices and to households.

The bill would seek to ensure flexibility for States' outreach activities by allowing States to assist households with the application process rather than merely distribute information. Prescreening and counseling activities appear to be among the more effective methods of outreach to eligible nonparticipants. States should be permitted to fund these activities under the permissive outreach provisions we included in the Hunger Prevention Act 2 years ago.

The bill includes a clarifying amendment concerning a simplified procedure for claiming excess medical deduction. It seek to minimize administrative burdens on food stamp offices and elderly and disabled recipients seeking to claim deductions for excess medical cost. It would require States to estimate recipients' medical expenses for the certification period based upon their verified costs for the past few months and available information about their conditions. The household's medical deduction would then be based on these estimates unless the recipent experienced a significant change. Under this procedure, households would not have to make change reports unless there is a significant unanticipated change in their medical expenses.

Many medical expenses are recurrent but not monthly: for example, medicine that needs to be refilled every 40 days, doctors' appointments set every 6 weeks, monitoring tests scheduled every 3 months. Current rules that require households to submit, and food stamp offices to process, change reports every time medical expenses go up or down by more than $25. Where the change was predictable at the last certification interview, these reporting requirements create unnecessary burdens on both recipients and administrators.

Section 351 of the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 was intended to correct this problem. Unfortunately, FNS' interim regulations provide little change from the status quo and are unlikely to simplify the current procedure significantly for either households or State agencies. This provision would clarify the intent of the earlier amendment.

The bill would simplify eligibility determinations for recipients of State and local general assistance programs by making them categorically eligible for food stamps. To ensure that the programs subject to this requirement are in fact legitimate, means-tested program, we would have USDA certify their appropriateness to receive categorical eligibility.

The bill would simplify eligibility determinations for recipients of supplemental security income and aid to families with dependent children and encourage one-stop shopping for needed benefits. Under current law, food stamp offices are not required to make separate resource determinations for households in which all members receive AFDC or SSI. But if one member of the household is not on AFDC or SSI, the food stamp office must evaluate the resources every member of the household. For household members who have already met the AFDC or SSI resource test, this is a waste of time. The proposal would provide that the food stamp office does not have to consider any resources that the AFDC or SSI programs have already determined to be exempt.

This section extends to members of mixed households the Food Stamp Program's longstanding principle of relying on other low-income programs' resource determinations. Few resources that are excluded for AFDC or SSI count for food stamps, yet the current rules require a whole new resource valuation be done for food stamps unless an entire household is receiving AFDC or SSI. Allowing food stamp workers to disregard resources that AFDC and SSI rules have already had disregarded should simplify the eligibility determination process significantly. It should also eliminate some serious inequities in a few isolated cases where AFDC or SSI rules do differ. For example, it would not deny food stamps to SSI recipients with resources that are exempt because they are needed under one of SSI's PASS plans for helping disabled persons eventually achieve self-sufficiency. State food stamp administrators have specifically recommended excluding resources that SSI has excluded because they are needed to carry out a PASS plan.

TO HELP THE RURAL POOR

The bill has a special emphasis on reducing hunger in rural America. It would exempt from consideration as resources those vehicles that are used to transport water or fuel where the household lacks piped-in water or fuel. This is still necessary in some rural areas. In places that still are not served by water mains, households may have to haul drums of water for long distances, and often over difficult terrain. Other rural households may have to haul firewood or coal to their homes for heat. Even the poorest of these households cannot afford to be without a dependable vehicle that can hold up under this kind of use. Yet the trucks that many of these households have for this purpose, through far from luxurious, tend to have fair market values well in excess of the current $4,500 limit. Denying otherwise eligible households food stamps solely because they have such a vehicle serves no legitimate purpose.

The bill would require States to designate areas where low-income persons face substantial transportation difficulties, under a procedure to be included in State plans of operation. In these designated areas, States would be required to issue food stamps by mail. Many if not most rural counties already issue benefits by mail because it is administratively cheaper and more convenient for households. The bill would exempt from this requirement any area in which the mail loss rate exceeds the extremely low threshold set out in existing FNS regulations. The bill also would incorporate current rules on loss-prone households, excluding them from the requirement to mail.

In many rural areas, the nearest food stamp issuance center may be 20, 30 or more miles away. Many recipients are dependent on others for transportation. Households report having to pay friends and neighbors an amount for transportation that is almost as much as the value of their allotments. These households are still having to pay to get their food stamps a decade after the purchase requirement was abolished for all other households. Under these circumstances, many rural households have decided that food stamps are not worth the difficulty of applying and arranging transportation to pick up their benefits each month.

The provision passed the Senate as section 330 of the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 but did not appear in the final bill.

The bill includes a provision that would simplify resource determinations in rural areas. It is designed to save food stamp offices and households from having to determine and verify a precise value for a household member's small, undivided interest in a marginal piece of property. Most of this property exists in rural areas, where many people die intestate and the value of the land does not justify probating the estate. After a couple of generations, a small, isolated plot of land may have as many as 20 or 30 part-owners, each of whom now must obtain an appraisal or other verification of the value of their interest before they can get food stamps. This section would exclude this property as inaccessible.

OTHER PROVISIONS

The bill would ensure that in any demonstration project, cashed-out food stamps would be increased to reflect any State or local sales taxes and that they not be counted to reduce benefits in any other programs. Current law prohibits States from charging sales tax on items purchased with food stamps. Current law also prohibits other Federal and State benefit programs from counting food stamps as income. Demonstration projects could undercut these protections by cashing out food stamps. It then is no longer apparent which purchases are made with food stamps, and the prohibition on reducing other public benefits because of the receipt of food stamps is no longer, as it is now written, applicable. This amendment seeks to ensure that food stamps remain a basic, reliable nutritional safety net for these children by ensuring that these projects will not cause recipients to lose food stamps or have other needs-based benefits reduced by counting food stamps as income.

In a provision of special interest to those of us from Northern California, the bill would simplify procedures for giving replacement food stamps to recipients who fall victim to earthquakes, hurricanes and other natural disasters. It would give USDA authority to issue food stamps to households meeting regular eligibility standards to replace food destroyed in a disaster up to the amount of the applicable maximum benefit allotment. Current regulations limit replacement stamps to the amount of the household's normal allotment. This offers little benefit to elderly and disabled households who receive the $10 minimum benefit but who have exhausted their month's income buying food that has been destroyed in a disaster.

This provision would also give USDA the discretion to extend the current 10-day period for reporting losses where food stamp offices are not open to receive reports or where telephone service is still out for more than 10 days after the disaster. This was a problem in areas such as Charleston, SC, and the Virgin Islands after Hurricane Hugo struck last fall. The amendment would not limit or expand FNS's separate authority to issue special emergency eligibility rules for disaster victims.

The bill would provide important protections to recipients in electronic benefit delivery projects. USDA has been moving rapidly to introduce electronic methods of delivering benefits. These systems require there to be special equipment in check-out lanes for a food stamp household to use their benefits. Current law has USDA absorb the cost of any required new equipment, but it does not ensure that the equipment be made widely available.

To save money, USDA has examined limiting the number of the required devices in each store, which could result in segregated check-out lines through which all food stamp recipients must pass. This would be inconsistent with current regulations that prevent stores from discriminating against or singling out food stamp recipients. Forcing food stamp recipients to stand in special food stamp lines would increase the stigma of receiving benefits, which already keeps many eligible households from applying.

A further problem is that when these systems are set up without taking into account the needs of retailers, many stores on which households depend may refuse to participate. The Washington Post recently reported that Safeway, one of the Nation's largest supermarket chains, has refused to participate in any of the demonstrations because of the cost and inconvenience of operating the systems USDA is currently promoting. This could force food stamp households to buy food at small convenience stores, where the higher prices will exhaust their benefits earlier in the month.

This section would require that before any demonstration can take place, all necessary equipment must be provided to each checkout line in all stores in the area. Ideally, this will be equipment the stores have purchased themselves to serve non-food stamp customers. It would also provide that systems may only be implemented where they accommodate retailers' needs sufficiently to have enlisted most of the area's supermarkets, and most of the stores serving special language groups that may have difficulty using stores with only English-speaking staff. Finally, it would direct USDA to develop standards for these projects in consultation with representatives of the States, food retailers, recipients, and other affected parties.

The bill would allow States to give households with benefits at or near the minimum the option of receiving 2 or 3 months' benefits at once so that they do not have to go to issuance centers as frequently. At present, households receive monthly allotments no matter how small the amount of the benefit. For households that do not have their stamps mailed to them, getting the monthly allotment can be burdensome, involving long bus or car rides at inconvenient hours. Allowing the State to batch small monthly allotments together avoids this problem and provides enough in benefits so that recipients can take advantage of economies of scale in their purchases. Also, States are expected to experience significant administrative savings by being able to make one issuance instead of two or three.

The bill would extend to homeless recipients the authority States already have to negotiate concessional prices with restaurants to provide meals for the elderly in exchange for food stamps. Only restaurants agreeing to serve meals for bargain prices are allowed to accept food stamps.

The bill would correct a technical error in the current statute that gives applicants for and recipients of social security benefits, but not SSI applicants and recipients from mixed households, the right to receive food stamp applications at social security offices. SSI applicants and recipients are even more likely to be eligible for food stamps than those applying only for social security. This amendment would not expand SSA's obligations to process food stamp applications to new categories of households: the food stamp applications of mixed SSI/non-SSI households would be submitted to the regular food stamp office for processing.

The bill establishes a commission to seek ways to coordinate AFDC and food stamp policies and to reduce barriers in both programs. The bill also authorizes a few carefully controlled pilot projects that will allow States that assure basic protections to households to compare the effects of using some AFDC income rules in computing food stamp benefits. I also would be interested in seeing demonstrations of the effects of applying many of the rules we have developed over the years in food stamps to the AFDC Program.

The bill would move towards completion of the reform of the food stamp quality control system that we began in 1988 by voiding the sanctions applied for years prior to when the States had a reasonable opportunity to conform their operations to the new system. In this respect, we would be following the reforms of the AFDC QC system enacted in last year's reconciliation bill. We remain concerned that States' applications for waivers be given full and fair consideration by the Department. This matter requires further scrutiny.

The bill would accelerate the collection of overissuances from households that have been convicted of food stamp fraud by giving them 10 days, rather than the current 30, in which to make their decision about how to repay the overissuance. This change is in keeping with our long-standing insistence on firm measures to protect the Program from those who would take advantage of it.

The bill would reauthorize the Food Stamp Program for the length of the farm bill. It would also reauthorize the Puerto Rico Nutrition Assistance Program at the current services level. It is not the intent of this proposal to interfere with any decisions about the status of that Program that may be made in the context of legislation on the future relationship of Puerto Rico to the United States.

The bill also strengthens our commodity distribution programs in important ways. It reauthorizes the TEFAP program for 5 years and increases the mandatory purchase authority for commodities to be distributed through TEFAP to $190 million for the first 2 years of the bill. For the final 3 years, the bill would authorize $220 million a year in commodity purchases for TEFAP. The bill also would require USDA to buy $32 million a year in commodities for distribution to soup kitchens and food banks. And it would extend the current food bank demonstration projects and allow them to expand.

The bill authorizes funds for a National Gleaning Clearinghouse to share information on available, unused food that could be made available through the emergency feeding network. The bill establishes a separate authorization for Commodity Supplemental Food Programs for the elderly. In this way, we intend to emphasize the importance of adequate nutrition for our older Americans without in any way neglecting the importance of programs for women and children.

I believe that this legislation will go a long way to address the great need for nutrition assistance in our country. Clearly assistance of this type does not come without some cost. However, the authors of the bill are commited to ensuring that this initiative is paid for in the Budget Resolution and achieves its goals within the Gramm-Rudman targets. To this end, we have provided for a delay of up to 1 year of all cost items included in the bill, except for the shelter deduction provision and TEFAP commodity purchases, should a sequestration take place in fiscal year 1991. The increase in the shelter deduction and TEFAP program would be reduced by the same percentage as the sequestration.

I urge my colleagues to review this legislation and support its passage. It not only honors Mickey Leland, but address real problems faced by real families everyday. Imagine having to make the choice between heating your home or eating 7 nights a week. I believe that no family should have to make that choice. This bill makes important changes in the Food Stamp Program to ensure that families do not have to make these choices.

COMMUNISM: WHAT IT IS AND WHO ITS PERPETRATORS HAVE BEEN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Please start the clock.

I have waited since early November for this moment to discuss communism, what it is, who have been the perpetrators of it for all of my life and the decades before I was born. I was born in 1933, the year that our then President Franklin Delano Roosevelt recognized the brutal Communist government that had stolen power from a democratic government back in 1917.

I wanted to do this after the Berlin Wall began to crumble on November 9. I understand if you rush you can still get a historical chip out of that ugly edifice to man's inhumanity to man.

After that a series of events started to unfold that can only be described as stunning, absolutely stunning, and they occurred up to Christmas Day itself, when one of the world's true tin pot Communist dictators was executed in Romania, with his wife at his side. I refer of course to Ceceauscu and his wife, Elena.

Then, when it looked as if all these events were going to be left behind in 1989, the 200th anniversary year of the French Revolution, great events continues on into 1990.

In this Chamber just a few days ago the imprisoned poet, arrested on October 27 and then inauguarated as President less than 60 days later, came before this Chamber, President Vaclav Havel of Czechoslovakia. He received several well deserved standing ovations from my colleagues in this House.

In spite of that, some of my colleagues—now listen to my next words, Mr. Speaker, because I believe them, I know I am correct—some of my colleagues in this Chamber, thank God only a handful, were pulling for the victory of the Communist 9, the military junta in Nicaragua.

I have a suspicion that some people were down there in Nicaragua, to sign off on a fair election, no matter what took place in that election 2 days ago. They were willing to sign-off on an Ortega victory so that they would not look like fools for the last 10 years for praising Daniel Umberto Ortega, Tomas Borge, Arce, Father D'Escoto, the suspended homosexual priest, and all of the other horrible things that have taken place down there for 10 years. They wanted to accept the election, disband the Contras, get off Danny Ortega's back, and start pouring money into the first Communist dictatorship that ever would have been voted on in history.

That is what all the papers were saying just 72 hours ago. They were predicting that the first Communist would be voted into power shortly, the first in history. But history remains pluperfect. It did not happen. Communism was not voted into power in Nicaragua. Communism lost.

So I am going to take this hour to start with Nicaragua, but broaden out and discuss communism in general, and to repeat what I said in a brief 1-minute addressed to this House this morning, that for 40 years, at least, back to when I was 16 years of age—and I am 56 now—I have been described as an anti-Communist by the dominant media culture. We did not know what to call it in the forties and fifties, but "liberal" would suffice, liberal big media.

The dominant media culture has described this person whether as a broadcaster or as a Congressman, and always as a candidate, as an anti-Communist. And when they would use that term, which I think is a term of honor, they would put a spin later in the article so that it became an ignominious appellation, a term of opprobrium, disgrace. How tasteless that someone should be an anti-Communist.

Well, let us start off with today's New York Times, what is described in the dominant culture as America's paper of record.

They begin their lead editorial in the morning's paper with the title "The Morning After in Nicaragua."

The morning after, like it is a hangover.

It says,

Violeta Barrios de Chamorro's remarkable victory is far from complete. Her Sandinista opponents are still entrenched in power.

Read that Chamorro opponents. That is certainly true. Entrenched in raw power.

Her own supporters are deeply divided. Her country's economy is a mess. She'll need generous help, especially from Washington.

When? When she is inaugurated, God willing, on April 25? Or do they want us to pour money in right now so that the Communists down there can divert more money to their Swiss bank accounts?

How many times did I come out in this well with Daniel Umberto Ortega's bank account number and the exact amount he had in it to a penny? His bookkeeper, Maj. Roger Miranda, had defected and gave us that case study. Of course, it was ignored by many people on the other side of the aisle. By many people.

The New York Times says,

The good news from Nicaragua deserves to be savored while its multiple surprises are fresh.

Why are we always so surprised when communism fails at the ballot box, when it has a 100-percent record of failure if there truly is free and secret balloting?

It says, "Mrs. Chamorro's upset is a devastating rebuke to Sandinistas." The Marxist-Leninist-Communist Sandinistas.

It says, "Daniel Ortega guessed wrong about the outcome." So did a lot of people in this Chamber. They were confident he would win, and they were going to defend his victory to the hilt, even if some evidence did surface that the election was stolen. The retiring president of Costa Rica Oscar Arias, said in Costa Rica, the country that adjoins on its southern border that the election was stolen back in October because of the way the Sandinistas manipulated the registration process.

The New York Times goes on to say that "Mrs. Chamorro's convincing victory is another boon for Mr. Bush in a time of startling democratic surprises." Amen, New York Times, "It follows the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe."

I hate to read that line because Tiananmen Square is still like a ghost, and at every meeting or seminar on the collapse of communism we still should recall the young students ground into a bloody rubble by the tank treads in Tiananmen Square, which I had walked across with my younger son, just a few months before, never dreaming that this could happen in China's capital city.

It continues "Mrs. Chamorro's convincing victory," and "the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, deepens the isolation of Fidel Castro in Cuba." I pause for a prayer. Please, God, please give this old Communist his call to judgment. Take him out. Let the people of Cuba know the exhilarating thrill that people are feeling in Hungary, Bulgaria, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania over the weekend, and just across that little Caribbean gulf in Nicaragua now.

The New York Times says, "and it enables the administration to claim victory for its Nicaraguan policy." You bet it does. And it ends discussing "a decade of divisive, and obsessive, aid for Contra rebels."

Was our aid to Afghanistan's rebels, the Mujahidin, obsessive? Was our aid, supposedly covert, to Angola obsessive?

The aid that continued to these young Contra fighters with their blood, toil, tears and sweat, to quote Mr. Churchill, forced the Communists in the military junta in Managua into an election that they never for a minute dreamed they woud lose or they never would have had it.

Can my colleagues imagine Castro on the phone yesterday to the Ortega brothers telling Danny.

Tell Umberto to get on the extension. Listen, don't ever tell anybody I am your mentor again. I told you not to have an election. I have not had an election in 30 years and I am still in power. You blew it.

That is what Umberto was quoting for a while when it looked like this election would never come to pass.

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Missouri who marched in the streets of Managua with me. How long ago was that, 2 years?

Mr. BUECHNER. It was 2 years ago.

Mr. DORNAN of California. And holding up your fingers in a "L" for liberty. Who would have believed then, with the turbas divinas on every street corner, ready to beat up people on every street corner, that we would ever have this victory?

Mr. BUECHNER. I have heard the elegant words of the gentleman from California about the brave freedom fighters, and when we met with Mrs. Chamorro's brother and the other leaders of the domestic opposition, not the people fighting with the Contras, but the leaders of the labor unions, the independent unions, the people that did not want to have the Sandinista government, and when we talked about cutting off the assistance for the Contras, they said they could not publicly support the Contras because that was considered treason and they would be subject to arrest, and for that matter death. They said but please send a message to your Congress, take it back to your colleagues that unless the Contras keep a presence there we will never be able to force the Sandinistas into giving us one inch of quarter.

So I have listened, as has the gentleman, to our colleagues that say it was Jimmy Carter that brought about this election, or it was the fact that we cut off the military aid. The bottom line is that the people down there believed in democracy. We had a totalitarian government that determined how people got to the polls, we had a totalitarian government that determined what they got to read about the election, what was going to be on the radio, what was going to be on television. Literally the food that was being handed out to these starving families the week before the election, they were so cocky, they were filled with Madison Avenue, the people from New York City and Los Angeles that came down and put on the big hype, and they had done what the gentleman from California and I know as politicans should never be done, which is to believe your own campaign rhetoric.

Mr. DORNAN of California. They got puffed up, and when you think you have the election in the bag, that is when you are heading for a fall.

Mr. BUECHNER. But have we not heard some of our colleagues talk about the fact that this was a popular front, that the Sandinistas were not Communists, were not totalitarians, were not Marxist, they were a popular front, they enjoyed the highest depth of popularity that we could possibly imagine?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I would ask the gentleman to stay with me for a second because the word "Marxist" appears in this editorial in the New York Times. It goes on to say how Mrs. Chamorro skillfully deals with the unhappy losers. The reason they are unhappy is because they thought they had it in the bag.

Mr. BUECHNER. They are unhappy because they lost.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Right. They remain the largest party in the country, true. They continue to control the bureaucracy, the police, the army, "during a treacherous transition." That is the New York Time's words, that this transition is going to be treacherous, fraught with the possibility for the Communists just saying, "The hell with all of this; we are not giving up power."

It says international observers will remain in Nicaragua. My passport sits at the Nicaraguan Embassy right now. Eight Congressmen in this chamber were given the honor of not being allowed into Nicaragua, not that everybody who went down did not have a good vehicle, whether it was Carter, or the OAS, or the United Nations group going down. But eight of us were singled out and told no, you cannot go down and count votes, and I would have loved to.

I could have gone to Namibia earlier in the year. I have been to El Salvador for four elections, been a presidential observer, a civilian observer during my forced break in service here in 1983 and 1984. I would have loved to have gone down there, but that is all right. I prayed all night long, and I enjoyed waking up and calling the State Department Situation Room and hearing the great news.

It says international observers are going to remain in Nicaragua, and I am going to try to go down there soon, even if Mrs. Chamorro has to intervene for me with the embassy where she will soon appoint an ambassador and, of course, unless treachery takes place.

It says, "Mrs. Chamorro has many strengths. She was an early supporter of the revolution, and indeed personified its promise. It was the murder in 1978 of her husband, Pedro Joaquin Chamorro," exact date November 10, 1978, "editor of the newspaper La Prensa, that provided the spark for the mass uprising against the Somoza dynasty."

That was when the middle class rose up against Somoza, and she broke with Somoza, she was with the original junta, and she quit that, "when their new tyranny supplanted the old." This is the New York Times, "when their new tyranny supplanted the old."

We have had people in this House, according to the New York Times' characterization, supporting tyranny for 10 years.

It says Mrs. Chamorro is going to need help from Mr. Bush. Of course, I had the honor of introducing Mrs. Chamorro and her intelligent, bright daughter, Christiana, to George Bush when he was Vice President at the inauguration of Oscar Arias on May 8, 1976. As the American delegation walked into the big soccer stadium in Costa Rica, we got a standing ovation from the crowd for 5 minutes. We circled around and were seated immediately in front of Mrs. Chamorro, and I asked her to step out of her box and to come down and to meet George Bush. I introduced him to Christiana and I said later on, kidding, I mean kidding I said, "Here is a future president of her country."

Then the Nicaraguan delegation comes in and everybody starts whistling. I said I did not know that they were that popular. Mrs. Chamorro said, "You misunderstand. Here in Central America whistling is like booing in your country." The crowd in Costa Rica is booing the Nicaraguan delegation. You better believe she has earned her spurs to bring this country back to sanity.

Mr. BUECHNER. If the gentleman will yield back, I know this is his article because we marched together for liberty, and I really think that this is really a heady time for those who stood here and listened to the debate so many many times, and heard our belief that there were folks in Nicaragua, a majority of people that did not believe in a Marxist form of government, that wanted freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the ability to determine their own lives, and not be told something by someone wearing a bandana, and that we were literally mocked by some of our colleagues who said that we were out of touch with reality down there.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Exactly.

Mr. BUECHNER. Last night I saw on television the arm patches of the police in Nicaragua. It does not say "the Police of Managua." It does not say "the Police of Matagalpa." It says "Policia Sandinista." They are the Sandinista police, the ones who take an oath of office to the political party.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Does the gentleman know the last party, pure political party that had their own private police like that?

Mr. BUECHNER. The Nazis.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The Gestapo. It was the Gestapo. First it was the SA, and then it turned into the Gestapo, a party police taking over hotels all over the major cities of Europe, and torturing people to death, breaking them so that they could tell on other people, so that they could execute them. This is the same kind of intimidation that went on down there, only to a lesser degree.

But I want to ask you a question, my friend from Missouri: The New York Times, in its closing paragraph, says, "Success in Managua will strengthen democracy elsewhere in Central America." Will it ever.

What is going to happen to the Faribundi Marti terrorist guerrillas up in the hills in the adjoining country of El Salvador or adjoining across the Gulf of Fonseca?

It says, "Whether United States pressure and the Contra war hastened or delayed the wonderful breakthrough in Managua is debatable." Good, I am debating it right now. Anybody who wants to come over and debate, fine. It says, "No matter what, democracy was the winner Sunday." But in the paragraph prior to that, it says that President Bush must act quickly to lift the sanctions—I kind of agree with that—and move finally to disband the Contras. Before she is sworn in? What would you think of going in there and trying to disarm the Contras right now and telling them to stand down when even the New York Times has just said it is going to be a treacherous transition? I am for going down, and I hope you will go with me. We will get a delegation of 15 people and we will go down and tell the Contras truly, "Men, she is your President now, lay down your arms and go back to your homes and go back to your farms and help this economy." But would you shut them down 1 day before April 25?

Mr. BUECHNER. No, I would not.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Nor would I.

Now, please hang around if the gentleman would.

Mr. BUECHNER. No. I just wanted to join the gentleman from California to recall that day when we marched down the streets with that little girl that had been beaten the week before, and she fainted and we were out in the sunlight.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Thrown down the steps of a church, a 22-year-old woman.

Mr. BUECHNER. I still recall all those brave people, the people that went to the polls. By the way, I would like to remind our American voters that people went to the polls who had to walk miles and miles to get there, who suffered the most severe types of deprivation to get there, who were threatened with the loss of their food, with their lodging, which is all controlled by the Government, their jobs. Literally, when they took that ballot and put it in that box, they were taking the chance of their lifetime.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Exactly.

Mr. BUECHNER. For Americans who cannot go to vote, who take democracy for granted, I would hope they would look at those brave people who besides marching down and fleshing out the Libertad, put it into action.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The gentleman reminded me of something else when he talked about police insignia.

I have used this example on college campuses to try to get it across to young people. They can understand it easier for some reason on high school campuses, what it means when the army, the navy, and the air force in Nicaragua is owned by a political party. I just thought of something for the first time in my life: When a political party took the insignia on the air force airplanes and their tanks and changed it. The World War II German aircraft used what they called a cocade, as opposed to the French and the British who then, and still, use a rondele, and Nicaragua used to use a rondele. That is a blue circle with a white circle inside and a blue bull's-eye in the middle of that. That was the insignia of their air force even under the corrupt tinpot dictator Somoza. They have taken out the white center and put in the Sandinista Party emblem, the way Hitler, who left the crosses on the wings but put a band around the fuselage of his planes on which he put the swastika. This was also put on most tanks, and navy ships. That was the party symbol, the swastika. I cringe when I see in South Africa the most extreme right, as the media calls them, the racists there, taking the German Nazi Party flag in a red field, white ball in the center, then breaking up the swastika into little separate crooked crosses; I cringed when I saw that in the streets of Cape Town a week ago after Mandela was released. I cringe at that. I also cringe when I see a Sandinista party symbol on a Hind helicopter.

Imagine Governor Dukakis campaigning in his own State right next to Boston Bay, talking to his crowd, and here comes the Blue Angels or the Air Force Thunderbirds over, dumping out pamphlets telling all the people in Boston what an absolute boob Dukakis is, that he owes his election to the Canadians or the Russians or something. And on the side of the Thunderbird airplane, instead of the white American star on a field of blue is the Republican elephant. I suppose the speaker might say, "Well, we want part of the air force and the army, because we control the legislature. Let us have a little Democratic donkey inside the insignia."

That is what the Sandinistas have as we talk right now.

One of the first things Chamorro will have to do as she takes control of the military 2 months from now is to take the party symbol of the losing party off all of the military equipment in that country, of which there is going to be a fire sale for a lot of the Soviet Hind helicopters and tanks, and replace it with the blue and white and blue rondele of the Nicaraguan Air Force.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUECHNER. I will let the gentleman go back to his time.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of us who would be happy to go down, put on some dungarees and paint off those Sandinista symbols.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Well, Mrs. Chamorro would probably be very happy, the Madam President, to have us do that.

Now I want to broaden this theme.

Now who are the Communists and what have they done since the day before I was born in April 1933, and what did they do since 1917 and all the years before that? The Communists are exactly what Ronald Reagan said, evil. And the Soviet Union is the head of the octopus, it truly was the Evil Empire.

When Time magazine made Mr. Gorbachev the man of the decade, even though he only came to power March 11 of 1985, a few months beyond the halfway point for the decade, they called the U.S.S.R. an empire twice, and evil once. They never put the two words together, though.

Communists have killed more people than Mussolini's Fascists, the warlords of Japan, or Adolf Hitler's Nazis. Put those three World War II Fascists together in their 12 years of what was supposed to be the Thousand-Year Reich, and they did not kill nearly as many human beings as have been killed in 72½ years of communism. We are still counting.

People are still dying in Afghanistan at this moment. People are dying in Angola with Soviet regimental commanders leading the attack against Jamba in the southeastern corner of Angola against the free forces of General Savimbi, who will someday be President Savimbi if they ever have a free election there.

What is my source for saying that Stalin killed more people than Adolf Hitler? Why, none other than Mikhail S. Gorbachev.

When I was in Moscow in August 1988, a television documentary had just run on television. I am sorry I did not see it first hand. I missed it by a few days. I was meeting with some Soviet Jewish dissidents and refusniks. They were saying, "Congressman, you cannot believe what was on television here last week. An hour documentary where Gorbachev himself says that Stalin killed more people than Hitler, in cold blood, and massacred millions more." If Gorbachev says that, can we not refer to Stalin as an evil person? Why does Hollywood, now dominated by the left, still keep making movies about Nazis, which is fine, but hardly ever a film, unless its almost a cartoon, Rambo-type film, independently done, against the evil that Gorbachev says killed more people than Adolf Hitler?

Listen to the great terror, a description of the great terror that is communism. They have used famine as a political weapon. Stalin did this against his own people in the Ukraine. The current Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist-Communist government of Mengistu in Ethiopia, and it has its apologists in this House, more people will apologize for that Communist government in Ethiopia than will apologize for the Communist government that is still in power in Nicaragua, the Mengistu government has used famine as the political weapon in Ethiopia. The Communists in Ethiopia may even do it again in order to cling to their power.

When I was in Ethiopia in May 1985 at a couple of the camps there, Ibnet, Ansokia, I looked at these people, 100,000 of them, and was shocked. Ten thousand of them were to die within weeks of my staring at them in these little hovel camps, all as a Government program to keep in power 60 thugs who came to power not by balloting but by the power of the gun.

Here is an article which I will submit as exhibit A in my remarks, from the Washington Times, September 13, 2 months before the Berlin Wall started to come down. Reuters' story out of Moscow, "Mine Contains 300,000 Stalin Victims, TV Says."

MINE CONTAINS 300,000 STALIN VICTIMS, TV SAYS

Moscow—Up to 300,000 people killed by Stalin's security police in the 1930s are buried in an abandoned gold mine near Chelyabinsk in the southern Ural mountains, Soviet TV said yesterday.

The grave was one of the biggest to be publicized since the Memorial movement, which commemorates purge victims, began pressing Soviet authorities last year to investigate repression under the late dictator.

The report said a ceremony was held last weekend in memory of the victims and a proper burial had been given to 350 of them whose skeletons had been found in the past year.

It showed human rights activist Andrei Sakharov, a member of Memorial, addressing the service on a hillside.

"This place was once called Golden Mountain. * * * Men, women, the elderly and even children were brought here at nightfall and shot down," a TV commentator said "There is no telling how many people were massacred, but some estimates say up to 300,000."

The report showed skulls with bullet holes.

Mass graves have been found near Kiev, where Memorial estimates up to 240,000 people are buried, and in a forest near Minsk where some accounts say 150,000 people were killed by Stalin's police.

Secret mass graves have been found in Moscow cemeteries.

Josef Stalin ruled the Soviet Union from the early 1920s until his death in 1953. From the early 1930s, waves of arrests swept the country, with thousands of people summarily tried and executed.

Before Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev launched a review of Stalin's role, the Soviet establishment hailed him as a hero and executions of innocent people were written off as "errors."

The description reminds me of the killing fields in Cambodia, when Khmer Rouge Communists slaughtered their own people, that sort of an autogenecide, killing a fourth or a fifth or a quarter of your own people.

Josef Stalin had 3 years of ruling where there was troika, until he finally killed off the opposition, and total power was his for 26 years, shared power for 29 years. Put that against Hitler's 12 years, and the Third Reich, and Members see the potential for mass slaughter and evil.

With my son, Mark, on the same trip I discussed a while ago, going to Moscow through Beijing, we flew on an old Soviet airplane, an Antivof 24, up to Ulan Bator, in Mongolia. I was the first Congressman to have been in Mongolia in 30 or 40 years. One Senator had been there, ALAN CRANSTON. We found a big statue of Stalin, because Mongolia was the first State conquered by Communists that was not made into one of the so-called independent republics. I hate to use that word "republic." Mark and I posed for pictures in front of the big statue of Stalin, and my son said, "When do you think that will come down?" And I said, "There is one in Georgia that will come down first." They are both down. The statue in Ulan Bator in Mongolia came down last week. I saw a film of it on a European news show, just over the weekend. It is down in Mongolia. They have resurrected Genghis Khan, one of their national heroes. He had been suppressed and written out of history as a nonperson by the Communists who took over with their brand of Mongolian Judas Iscariot traitors who took over Mongolia under the name of communism. I do not know if there is a statue left of Stalin anywhere in the world except maybe in a Marxist professor's room in some American college—or Albania.

The Communists, like Hitler, used concentration camps. But in Vietnam, they are called reeducation camps. But they had their concentration camps which Hitler copied. Solzhenitsyn, the first great writer, a captain in the army that moved into Lithuania as a fallout of the Hitler-Stalin pact of August 23, 1939 saw the incredible raping and pillaging of the conquering Russians. Within weeks, of course, Russian and German tanks are rolling into Poland, and World War II is on. Of course, the reward for Stalin's treachery was Operation Barbarossa, June 22, 1941, when Hitler finally turns against his fellow totalitarian dictator and ally in the infamous Hitler-Stalin pact. What did the Communist get out of the pact? Part of Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, Moldavia, and Bessarabia. Oddly enough, Lithuania just had an amazing free election where their party for independence, just won overwhelmingly. There is an article in yesterday's paper that the big question in Lithuania is one which resurrects the ghost of Senator Joseph McCarthy, famous or infamous, depending on your point of view. The question: "Have you ever been a Communist?" That is what they are asking in Lithuania of every person running for office, "Have you ever been a Communist?"

This is still a so-called republic of the Soviet Union, one of their 15 republics and they are asking "Have you ever been a Communist?" If yes, then "When?" Then they ask a question which never occurred to Joseph McCarthy. They ask, "Why, why would you ever have become a Communist?" If the answers are wrong, probably even to the first one, "Not fit to hold office."

Of course, we haven't asked those serious questions in this country in decades. It is any person's guess, but it is safe to say that at a minimum, at a minimum, Stalin and his followers have killed 70 million people in the name of communism. I have seen scholarly reports, for example, by the late Eugene Lyons, senior editor of Reader's Digest, where the figure gets up to 150 million, if we throw in China and all the satellite wars right down to Nicaragua and include those inhumane shootings like Arthur D. Nicholson, U.S. Army lieutenant colonel, shot to death doing his duty in East Germany. If you recall, he was shot in front of his sergeant, who was arrested and spread-eagled, and not allowed to help the superior officer, Colonel Nicholson, as he lay bleeding to death in front of his sergeant's eyes. That was a few years ago.

I looked at a friend of mine, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DARDEN], and I thought, does any Member on this side of the aisle ever remember we had a Member here who was proud to be called an anti-Communist? A doctor, commander in the Naval Reserve, he had served active duty as a doctor in the Navy, Larry Patton McDonald, was killed along with 269 people, 68 of them Americans, including little children, on Korean Flight 007. I remember one, big full-page picture in People magazine of "Little Sam," a Thai mother, Army father, killed on the airliner, Korean Flight 007, August 31. An American Congressman had died in the line of duty. I look at the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DARDEN] as a good Congressman, strong anti-Communist, strong prodefense, and I thought, "Buddy would not be here if the Soviets had not killed Larry along with 269 other people."

Did the Soviets ever apologize? Years later, but indirectly. At the time the commander of all military forces in the homeland, Victor Ogarkov, appeared on television with maps and pointers, explaining what happened. To this day liberals in the media keep making the case for the Soviets. What was the Soviets' response? "We shot it down. We will do it again." In fact, they promoted to a lieutenant colonel the pilot in his leather jacket, looking like a gangster, who flew the mission that shot down a jumbo jet 747.

The atrocities go on. Just try and absorb this quote by one of Britain's current living great historians, Paul Johnson, who has written one of the most exciting comprehensive books of this last decade, titled "Modern Times." Here is a quote from "Modern Times" under the chapter titled "Superpower and Genocide."

Mr. Johnson says:

In any case the confusion of moral issues by the end of the War was fundamentally compounded by the presence, in the ranks of the righteous, of the Soviet totalitarian power. There was scarcely a crime the Nazis or the Knights of Bushido had committed, or even imagined, which the Soviet regime had not also perpetuated, usually on an even larger scale. It ran precisely the type of system which had produced the war and its horrors. More specifically, the Nazi-Soviet pact of September 1939 and the Japanese-Soviet pact of April 1941 had made the Axis aggressions possible.

You may be asking yourself, who were the Knights of Bushido? They were an aberrant, vicious, offshoot of the Samurai Warrior code. Knights of Bushido, for example, took the young Marines that were kidnapped when Guadalcanal fell 2 days before Christmas in 1942, and after a few weeks put them on a prison ship, heading to either Formosa or Yokahama.

On the prison ship, the knights of bushido took three young Marine aircraft mechanics from that little handful of Grumman F-4-F Wildcats that had defended Wake Island down to the last plane in those horrible days of World War II. They blindfolded those men, made them kneel down on the deck before the whole ship's company of officers and Japanese sailors on the ship, and made them witness the beheading of three young Marines on the way to prison camp.

It was the knights of bushido who beheaded 4 of the Doolittle Raiders out of the 80 men who were on that raid. Three or four were beheaded by bushido warriors, just as a way of getting back at the United States because we had penetrated their defenses with 2-engine bombers and bombed the Japanese homeland as early as April 18 of 1942. The knights of bushido, just like the SS guards specialized in killing in some of the German camps; were the torture masters in many of the Japanese concentration camps, and they were patterned after Hitler's camps because they visited one another's camps.

The knights of bushido were the guards for the Japanese warlord's germ warfare experiments at Harbin in Manchuria. They committed unspeakable crimes so ghastly that it is amazing that most of the bushido criminals got away with those crimes, because everybody's focus was on Europe and the Nuremberg trials involving the Nazis. The bushido warriors were just as bad. Paul Johnson is saying that Stalin was just as bad, if not worse.

But some people refuse to see the bad in communism. I checked something during the debate on one of our bills here, the bill to protect Chinese students in this country from deportation. I want the Members to listen to this observation. I supported that bill to protect the Chinese students from their Communist government. Not once during the entire debate did my California colleagues, Congresswoman PELOSI or Congresswoman BOXER, ever use the term "Communist," to describe the Chinese Government.

How can that be? That has got to be a self-imposed discipline. We cannot discuss this killing without using the word "Communist." Mr. LAGOMARSINO used it freely, as he should. China is suffering today because of communism. My colleagues apparently see evil people who just happen to be Communists, although I doubt that I have ever heard one of them use the word "evil," applied to anything in public life today unless it was environmental issues.

They do not see people who are evil because they are Communists. I do not understand how they miss that connection.

Now, this is point 2 in this very short exposition tonight. I can hardly cover this subject in an hour. How have the Communists and communism managed to last so long? And they are going to be with us in pockets right to end of the century, even if the last Communist regime to fall is tiny Albania or Castro's Cuba sitting on a sinking island saying, "I'll be the last Communist in the world even if everyone else caves in." And he just may be.

Allow me to quote Jean Francois Revel.

> Indeed, one factor in the exceptional longevity of Communist systems has been, precisely, the credulity of the democracies, which seem to wake up each morning imagining these systems "cured" of totalitarianism. As a consequence, the Western nations obligingly assist them in getting around their difficulties and in withstanding the pressures that threaten them from within. According to normal criteria of political success, the Bolshevik regime, given the massive disasters it had brought about and its manifest incapacity to govern the country, or any country, should have foundered in 1921. That this emblem of failure has managed to drag itself along until nearly the end of the century says something not only about the resilience of Communism as a political system but also about the willingness, if not the desire, of the non-Communist and anti-Communist West to close its eyes to its own proper interests and values.

So, it is the gullibility and the connivance of the West, especially with Western liberals in Europe as that word is taken to mean in its modern post-World War II context, and certainly the liberals here in the United States.

The ultimate reason for this blind spot was the rise of moral relativism in Western culture. This was the acceptable political philosophy to my liberal colleagues and friends.

Now, this sort of led to this moral equivalence that I have heard debated so many times on the House floor since I was sworn in on January 4, 1977. This moral equivalence preached by liberals equates the free world or parts of the free world with the Communist world. Many liberals just do not believe in the justness of our own system. I don't know why. But it is obvious that we could never take the steps necessary in a bipartisan fashion to accomplish the end of communism as long as this blind spot exists.

So communism grew and grew and grew right through the 4 years of President Jimmy Carter. We remember what this Annapolis graduate of the class of 1953 was saying after the Soviet tanks rolled into the beleaguered little country of Afghanistan. We remember what Carter said in canceling the olympics and the wheat deal with the Soviet Union. He said, "I have learned more about communism in the last 10 days than I had learned in my whole life." I wondered if he learned down there in Nicaragua over the last few days that he was part of the cause of the Communist takeover of Nicaragua. We knew it was not a pure revolution, but Carter was completely fooled. The facts were there. I remember the late Larry McDonald, of whom I just spoke, standing at that very lectern over there talking about how the Sandinistas were not the pure Democrats that people in the Carter administration were portraying, that they would sell out their revolution to communism just as Castro had done and just as the Bolsheviks had crushed the Mensheviks and Kerensky's short 9-month regime in the Soviet Union in 1917.

The bipartisan coalition that we needed to shorten communism by 10 or 20 years never formed in this House, and I do not see it forming right now to get Castro, to get dos Santos in Angola or to get Mengistu in Ethiopia.

Nothing happened until our 40th president, Ronald Reagan, came along and decided to stage a competition. And he never even named it the Reagan Doctrine; those of us in the Congress named it the Reagan Doctrine for our President. He knew the Communists could not win economically, in the hills of Nicaragua, in the jungles of Angola, or on the desert plains of Afghanistan, if we pushed just a little bit. But even under President Reagan it took 4½-plus years to get Stinger missiles into Angola and into Afghanistan. We never did get them down there to the Contras or this whole thing might have been resolved a few years ago in Central America and Nicaragua.

Communism's own capacity for collapse was finally given the proper environment thanks to the 40th President of the United States and as a result of a lot of hard-fought battles in this House.

Now some people don't believe this. In fact, I was told today by a moderate standing in this aisle on the Democratic side, that our policy is really controlled by moderates. He said that moderates are the glue that take the extremists on both sides and make them come together.

What party leadership is controlled by a moderate philosophy or a moderate ideology? None that I know of. This is not the bible talking about things in moderation. This is, as I told this Member, talking about a wet finger in the air. They say, "Keep my voting tallies on all the ratings as close to 50 percent as possible." Blow this way, then blow that way. Keep that wet finger in the air. Margaret Thatcher called them "the wets" flopping all over the place, testing the winds to see how they could keep their own offices.

What has moderation accomplished? Well, it gave us the stalemate in Korea, where we still have over 40,000 troops. It gave us first a stalemate and then an eventual loss in Vietnam. That is what this moderate policy brought us in Vietnam. It brought us a stalemate in Europe for 40 years. No matter that there were food riots in Posnan, Poland, the horror of 50,000 people killed in Hungary, and in 1968 3,000 dead in the streets of that beautiful city of Prague.

No, this was a stalemate. This was our stalemate for 40 years, 4 decades after we crushed Hitler in 3 years, 5 months, and 1 day. He had already been dead a week when the German generals signed an unconditional surrender, and 99 days from Harry Truman's birthday, on May 8, we saw V-E Day, the day of victory in Europe. So 99 days later there was a cease-fire in mid-August, and we were rid of Tojo and his warlords. We were rid of the knights of bushido, and Tojo had been forced to resign the year before. Hitler had committed suicide, and Mussolini's body was hanging by his feet, his dead corpse was cut to ribbons by stone-throwing people in a Northern Italian village. His mistress was next to him.

All that was done in less than 3 years and 8½ months, and here we dragged out Central America for 10 years thanks to the moderates and liberals in this House.

We conservatives had the liberals beaten, and they knew it, but the moderates flopped back and forth and back and forth. Young Contra kids were coming in as teenagers with their Cruz y Emalas, the Cross of Emalas around their necks. They were out there fighting, giving their blood in order to force an election and bring about freedom. But the moderates would only give them enough to bleed and die, not win.

Now, Ronald Reagan and Pope John Paul II and Lech Walensa, those are truly the men of the decade, the people who were there during the entire decade, not the late comers like Mr. Gorbachev, who is being swept along by events. But bless his little Christian baptized heart, at least he has already unleashed the thugs with the shovels in Georgia and in Armenia, and the tanks are still around Opera Square, which the people call Freedom Square in Armenia. I saw that with my own eyes 13 months ago when they had those demonstrations all across the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, hundreds of thousands of people turned out in Moscow, and Kiev, and Novosibirsk, and Sverdlovsk and in Omsk; yes, even in Krasnoyarsk, where the big phased array radar sits now defunct because we conservatives finally got them to admit it was a violation of the SALT talk treaties. In Leningrad, only a few people were suppressed by the secret police still operating in the Soviet Union.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see if I have time to close without taking a special order tomorrow night on part three of my three part, broad ranging, little exposition on who won the Cold War.

Part three: Who won the Cold War? Well, the liberals did not win it, that is for sure. We hear them in the well trying to take credit for this ever since the House came back into session last month, such claims are ridiculous. Since the late 1970's the Democratic Party lost its sometime disposition to remain adamantly opposed, not only to the expansion of communism, but to its very being. All of that died when Scoop Jackson died, within 24 hours of the time the Russians killed Larry McDonald. A great conservative on defense, the Senator from the State of Washington, Scoop Jackson died. A big submarine was named after him, a nuclear missile submarine that is out there keeping the world safe for democracy at this very moment. That was when the Democratic Party lost its basic belief that, not only should communism be contained, a moderate policy brought about by a Foreign Service officer, George C. Kennan, during the Harry Truman years, but that communism's very existence was evil. All of that seemed to die in the liberal chambers of the Democratic leadership with the passing of Senator Jackson.

A few examples: How can House Speaker Tip O'Neill—I liked Tip—get away with saying, "History will judge that we should never have been at Grenada. We had no right to go to Grenada."

Well, Mr. Speaker, why are the big cruise ships, like Sovereign of the Seas, stopping at Grenada now? If the Communists, Maurice Bishop, brutally murdered by the psycho Communist, Hudson Austin, was still ruling Grenada, believe me there would not be any cruise ships stopping there now.

How can my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] get away with saying during his campaign, "I have no problem with a Marxist or a Communist government in Central America"? Well, that is because the young scion of the Kennedy clan does not have to live under Marxism or communism. I hope he has made great statements up there in Boston about how happy he is that Violeta Barrios de Chamorro has won and that again freedom has triumphed somewhere in the world.

And why is it that the Reverend Jesse Jackson can get away with saying, about the aftermath of the Communist horror, their victory in Southeast Asia.

"Unfortunate, unfortunate. Sometimes people struggling for freedom lose their way."

Mr. Speaker, that is what he called the genociding in Cambodia. They just lost their way a little bit, but they are still basically struggling for freedom. And he wants to be a Senator from a tiny little State called the State of Columbia?

Mr. Speaker, let me quote from a Warren Brooks column that I read during the break. Here is what Mr. Brooks said again in the Washington Times: He said.

Those who have endured the scorn of the dominant media culture, because they have relentlessly defended freedom and free market capitalism, are now expected to be quite and still while that dominant culture expropriates the triumph of their ideas, my ideas, our ideas, as if it were somehow their own.

Mr. Speaker, I hear it coming from this lecturn every day now.

It is reminiscent of Beverly Nichols' plaintive protest in "Green Grows the City" against his neighbor's gushing praise of a hard won, but suddenly flowering, garden. In his story, "Green Grows the Garden," the protagonist says, "How can you admire my flowers when I can see them, too?"; meaning: I planted them, and all you did was bitch, moan, and gripe.

What right do those, whose creed has always been the redistribution of the efforts of others, what right do they now have to celebrate the budding of freedom midst the ruins of the socialism they so long and gladly praised and sustained? If the so-called American liberal left had any real respect, they would be engaged in agonized reflection and collective head-hanging over the appalling errors of their own cowardly, pusillanimous predilections for the impoverishing hand of statism and their long contempt for freedom's economic agenda, not just their economic agenda, but their whole agenda.

Mr. Speaker, This article is so good I would like to submit it for the RECORD after my remarks.

Here is an unsigned editorial from a recent Wall Street Journal entitled "Who Really Won Eastern Europe?" It says:

"Liberals have been quick to credit Mikhail Gorbachev for having the vision to see he could no longer hold on to Eastern Europe, and deliberately choosing to let it go. Representing this view, Michael Kinsley"—of Crossfire fame, young Michael—"wrote in the New Republic that 'communism obviously deserves more credit than it has gotten for being able to produce its own collapse.'"

How is that? Give them credit for producing the terror state, and the economic deprivation and utter decay that brought about its own collapse? Kinsley claimed that the U.S. conservatives believe that communism was forever. I never did. Never. And that the best the West could hope for was an eternal standoff. Where does Michael Kinsley get this unadulterated garbage? According to Kinsley the collapse of the Soviet empire was a happy accident, neither anticipated or sought by conservatives.

This pipsqueak is the ultimate arrogant liberal sitting there on Crossfire telling conservatives what they think. A few conservative straw men may have felt that way; but the preeminent figure on the right for the past two decades did not, says the journal.

Ronald Reagan in a 1981 state dinner honoring Margaret Thatcher said, "We will not merely contain communism. We will transcend it." I remember that vividly. I put it in newsletters. I used it in speeches for a year. Ronald Reagan said, "We are going to transcend and conquer communism."

Do not think he is not enjoying his retirement in Bell Air. I know he is thinking, "Way to go, Contras, you brought about an election. Another Communist down the tubes."

Mr. Speaker, Ronald Reagan ought to have a little Communist upside-down on the side of his car the way people put Nazi swastikas on airplanes in World War II, and little rising suns, when they shot down some of Tojo's pilots.

Reagan said that we will transcend it. President Reagan said that it was time for the West to prepare; this is in 1981, folks; to prepare for the post-Soviet world, and he dismissed communism. Listen to these words. I do not catch the timber of his voice to mock him, but to honor him: "a sad, bizarre chapter in history whose last pages are being written even now." That is Ronald Reagan, folks, 9 years ago. Beautiful prophesying, my good friend, Mr. Reagan. Excellent.

But events just do not happen, the Wall Street Journal says. Yes, the freeing of Eastern Europe was helped by communism's inherent flaws. But why did it happen now? Why in 1989 and the continuing collapse in 1990? "Mikhail Gorbachev did not come to power to preside over the loss of Eastern Europe." What persuaded this smart man to accept it?

Mr. Speaker, the answer is twofold. In the 1980's the West, especially the United States, began to both promote policies of economic growth and to rebuild the military capability lost in the preceding year where we dragged some of our liberal colleagues on the majority side of this aisle, dragged them kicking and screaming for the rebuilding of America's defenses. I felt like some of them were hanging around my legs, an albatross around my neck, every time I tried to defend the B-1 strategic advanced modernization or any other defense system on this House floor. Oil deregulation ended the energy crisis, tax cuts spurred the economy, inflation was tamed, and the explosion of new capital fueled the computer and biotechnology industries that drove Western technology forward, and there is so much more good stuff, but I do want to get to the close.

The Wall Street Journal article referred to follows:

WHO WON EASTERN EUROPE?

Vaclav Havel, in his address to a joint session of Congress Wednesday, talked of the forces that kept hope alive in Eastern Europe the past 40 years:

"All of this taught us to see the world in bipolar terms as two enormous forces—one, a defender of freedom, the other, a source of nightmares. Europe became the point of friction between these two powers, and thus, it turned into a single enormous arsenal divided into two parts.

"In this process, one-half of the arsenal became part of that nightmarish power, while the other, the free part, bordering on the ocean and having no wish to be driven into it, was compelled, together with you, to build a complicated security system to which we probably owe the fact that we still exist."

The sledgehammers flung at the Berlin Wall last November had barely been put down before the debate in the West began over who deserved the immediate credit for freeing Eastern Europe. The lion's share goes to the people who bravely took to the streets and forced their jailers to cry uncle. But the two main contenders for second place are Mikhail Gorbachev and Ronald Reagan. Which one deserves the greater thanks?

Liberals have been quick to credit Mikhail Gorbachev for having the vision to see he could no longer hold on to Eastern Europe, and deliberately choosing to let it go. Representing this view, Michael Kinsley wrote in the New Republic that "communism obviously deserves more credit than it has gotten for being able to produce its own collapse." He claimed U.S. conservatives believed that communism was forever and that the best the West could hope for was an eternal standoff. The collapse of the Soviet Empire was a happy accident, neither anticipated or sought by conservatives.

A few conservative straw men may have felt that way, but the pre-eminent figure on the right for the past two decades did not. Ronald Reagan, at a 1981 state dinner honoring Margaret Thatcher, said, "We will not merely contain communism, we well transcend it." He said it was time for the West to prepare for the post-Soviet world, and dismissed communism as "a sad bizarre chapter in history whose last pages are being written even now."

But events don't just happen. Yes, the freeing of Eastern Europe was helped by communism's inherent flaws. But why now? Mikhail Gorbachev didn't come to power to preside over the loss of Eastern Europe. What persuaded him to accept it?

The answer is twofold. In the 1980s, the West, especially the U.S., began to both promote policies of economic growth and to rebuild the military capability lost in the preceding years.

Oil deregulation ended the energy crisis, tax cuts spurred the economy, inflation was tamed and an explosion of new capital fueled the computer and biotechnology industries that drove Western technology forward. In their 1987 book, "Blood in the Streets," James Davidson and Sir William Rees-Mogg predicted a communist crackup by noting that while the Soviet Union could turn in respectable rates of economic growth so long as it was industralizing, it was doomed once the world economy shifted from making slabs of steel to producing complex silicon chips.

Back in 1984, economists Henry Rowen and Charles Wolf predicted on these pages that the failure of the Soviets to compete on the world stage would threaten their empire. In his recent book, "The Democratic Imperative," Gregory Fossedal shows how Western radio broadcasts fueled discontent within the Soviet Union by explaining why socialism couldn't deliver the goods.

The economically stagnant Soviets could have used their military might in a last-ditch effort to secure their geopolitical status. But thanks to the Reagan defense policies, courageously supported by West European governments, they never got the chance.

In the new edition of his book "Revolution," Reagan adviser Martin Anderson reports that Mr. Reagan decided early on he would inform Mikhail Gorbachev that the U.S. intended to win the Cold War. At their first summit in Geneva, Mr. Anderson says President Reagan told the Soviet leader, "We can continue to disarm or we can continue the arms race. And I'll tell you now, you can't win the arms race. There is no way."

By coincidence, the Wednesday evening of Czech President Havel's speech to Congress, a cable-TV network broadcast a World War II documentary about Munich. Toward the end, after the British and French had signed away the Sudetenland, after Chamberlain had announced "peace with honor," the program noted the Czechs' bitterness toward their nominal allies. The Czechs had been ready to fight for freedom but instead got four decades of totalitarianism.

We do not know whether the Havels and Walesas supported the deployment in the West of Pershing missiles, or even the U.S. decision to send Stingers to the Afghan mujahedeen. What is clear is that in the fourth decade of the East's imprisonment, the U.S. and its allies determined to stand up more firmly than ever to the "other force," and that the Soviet Union decided to stand down.

Mr. Speaker, the best paragraph in this Wall Street editorial says:

In the new edition of his book "Revolution," Reagan adviser Martin Anderson reports that Mr. Reagan decided early on he would inform Mikhail Gorbachev that the U.S. intended to win the Cold War.

Now we are up to 1985. Reagan is telling Martin Anderson, his good friend, great adviser to President Reagan, that he is going to tell Mr. Gorbachev, "We are going to win the cold war, my friend Mikhail."

At their first summit in Geneva, Mr. Anderson says President Reagan told the Soviet leader, "We can continue to disarm or we can continue the arms race. And I'll tell you now, "you can't win the arms race. There is no way."

Now, in closing, I just would like to point out again the stunning things of this last decade of the 1980's that I think brought about this amazing, unparalleled rollback of raw totalitarian evil.

Pope John Paul II, remember Stalin asked once contemptuously, "How many divisions does the Pope have?" Well, when the Pope visited Poland and visited his now good friend, Lech Walesa, and talked to those people in his native homeland about freedom, the spark of freedom turned into a forest fire and it continues burning brightly to this day and spread south and even spread west into East Germany right up to the Berlin Wall itself.

Ronald Reagan I have talked about.

The final factor was the technological revolution which found its voice through the Voice of America. Indeed Mr. Havel when he was here last week actually made a visit, a house call, to Radio Liberty and the Voice of America to thank them for pumping the truth through the airwaves to all those countries.

What were the young people in Romania saying after Ceausescu and the wicked witch had been killed? What were they saying in the week between Christmas and New Year's? They were yelling in broken English to any American reporter, some of them flaming liberals of the dominant media culture, "Thank you for the Voice of America. We listened all these years to Voice of America and Radio Liberty."

And how many people did I hear in this Chamber suggest that we cut that budget all the time because it was provocative? How many liberals in this Chamber followed the words of their once and now much derided Presidential candidate of 1972, George McGovern, who said not 2½ years ago, this is McGovern speaking, "What right do we have to tell these Governments in Eastern Europe what type or form of Government they should have," as though those people voted for communism or wanted to live with its economic stagnation and Russian troops hidden in every little wooded area and glen up and down everything from the Baltic to the Adriatic. They wanted that, according to McGovern. How is history going to treat him?

If you do accept the premise that the cold war is over or ending and that the good guys—I read that, the conservatives—have won, then how can Time magazine possibly make the loser of the cold war the man of the decade, or even the half-decade, and call his empire evil in the same endorsement of his new media status?

But let me sum up my final thoughts, Mr. Speaker. If Mikhail Gorbachev is the man of the decade, then Ronald Reagan is the man of the century. I think that a lot of people who unmercifully criticized Ronald Reagan owe him a profound apology, especially for ridiculing his evil empire remark. If there is anybody in this Chamber who still doubts that the Soviet Union is an evil empire, I suggest they take the grand tour that many of us are taking of the Eastern European capitals and ask the people there, particularly the ones who saw bloodshed in Bucharest, Romania, for freedom.

WHY IS THE LEFT JUBILANT?

(By Warren T. Brookes)

Those who long endured the scorn of the Dominant Media Culture because they relentlessly defended free market capitalism now are expected to be still while that culture expropriates the triumph of their idea as if they were its own.

It is reminiscent of Beverly Nichol's plaintive protest in "Green Grows the City" against his neighbor's gushing praise of his hard won, but suddenly flowering garden.

"How can you admire my petunias," he demanded, "When I can see them too?" How can you who regularly mocked me for my dogged toil, now take such pleasure in its fruits, as if they were some cosmic surprise in which you somehow shared authorship?

What right do those, whose creed was always the redistribution of the efforts of others, now have to celebrate the budding of freedom midst the ruins of the socialism they so long and gladly sustained?

If the so-called American "liberal" left had any real self-respect they would now be engaged in agonized reflection and collective head-hanging over the appalling errors of their own pusillanimous predilections for the improverishing hand of statism, and their long contempt for freedom's economic agenda.

In Poland and Eastern Europe today, they are not reading the smirking socialism of John Kenneth Galbraith who in 1984 wrote "the Russian system succeeds because in contrast to the Western industrial economy it makes full use of its manpower;" or the macro-statism of Paul Samuelson, who once wrote "it is a vulgar mistake to think that most people in Eastern Europe are miserable."

Well, "les ex-miserables" are now studying "The Road to Serfdom" by Nobel economist Friedrich A. Hayek who was ostracized by most of the U.S. ivy academe precisely because he wrote that devastating 1944 indictment of socialism's awful enslaving fraud on humanity and its blood-relationship to Nazi (National Socialist) fascism.

Mr. Hayek's intellectual descendant, 1987 Nobelist James Buchanan was once driven off the University of Virginia faculty because he developed "Public Choice" theory that explains why government bureaucracies always get things wrong and make us less free.

In Budapest and Prague they are now reading "Capitalism, Freedom and Democracy" by Mr. Hayek's scholarly offspring, Nobelist Milton Friedman who is still subjected to total opprobrium by the same U.S. academics whom broacasters now call upon to grade the '80s, and who always issue failing marks to Mr. Friedman's theories.

Mr. Friedman's genius never was much welcomed beyond his tenured place at the University of Chicago, until he joined the Hoover Institution, which itself now is under vicious attack by Stanford "liberals" who cannot stand its unapologetic market capitalism.

Today, some liberal pundits even suggest communism never was much of a threat, that it no longer lives anywhere but in Cuba and Albania, hopping we'll ignore the muddled Marxism that still dominates the U.S. universities milieus. In "The Closing Of the American Mind" Allan Bloom courageously traced the statist antecedents of that lockstep-left thought control of today's U.S. academe:

"What happened to the universities in Germany in the thirties is what . . . is happening everywhere. The New Left in America was a Nietzscheanized . . . Left. A distinguished professor of political science proved this when he read to his radical students some speeches' about what was to be done. They were enthusiastic until he informed them that the speeches were made by Mussolini."

That ugly socialist/fascist axis was played out in the brilliant but systematically unheralded life of the real godfather of communism's European creakup: The greatest Austrian economist, Ludwig von Mises, whose penetrating mind gave intellectual birth to Messrs, Hayek, Friedman and Buchanan, and rebirth to Adam Smith.

Yet von Mises was completely shut out of the socialist/fascistminded Austrian and German universities in the 1920s and 1930s and was never offered any American post after exile by Nazism. Why? He wrote a book titled "Socialism" in 1922 in which he coined the phrase "statolotry" for the new Western irreligion, and showed with precise logic why socialism could never work.

"How can economic action that always consists of preferring [choosing] and setting aside saving, that is, of making unequal valuations, be transformed into equal valuations, by the use of equations?" How can economic growth that depends on unequal individual effort always be made to produce an equal result?

Von Mises' book, as Murray Rothbard writes' had an enormous influence during the 1920s and 1930s not only in raising profound questions of socialists. But also in converting countless young socialist intellectuals to the cause of freedom and free markets." Among them; former socialist Mr. Hayek, himself.

Though von Mises' "Money and Credit" stands today as one of the classics of economic literature, Mr. Rothbard writes, "It is truly shameful that at a time when every third-rate Marxoid refugee was able to find a prestigious berth in academia, one of the great minds of the twentieth century could not find an academic post."

Today, in the devilish doublespeak of the Dominant Media Culture, the demise of communism is pronounced the death knell for anticommunists; market capitalism's triumph seen as defeat for market capitalists.

It is time to tell these "front-runners" for democracy to stop admiring the flowers in our garden, because, while we were digging deep in the hard but fruitful soil of liberty, sowing the seeds of freedom, they were nourishing the tares of totalitarianism.

Now it is harvest time. Hopefully, those seedlings are strong enough to endure the tares uprooting. But freedom's fair-weather friends have earned no place at this salad bar. They are gate-crashers in the great garden party of democratic capitalism.

As Americans listen to these flower-admiring children now romancing the crumbling stones of the evil empire, they should note how often they mock those who really undressed the emperor.

CRIMES WITHOUT JUST PUNISHMENT

(By Arnold Beichman)

As I watched the CBS "60 Minutes" film production several Sundays ago of the inside of the Soviet Perm labor camp for political prisoners, I felt the same horror as I did seeing the newsreels of Auschwitz and Buchenwald 44 years ago, the mounds of corpses produced in the name of Adolf Hitler. Far more corpses were produced in the name of Josef Stalin.

I recalled Alexander Solzhenitsyn's descriptions in his multivolumed "Gulag Archipelago" of Soviet slave labor camps. I remembered the sufferings of Natan Sharansky, Eleanor Lipper, Vladimir Bukovsky among the handful who survived and the millions and millions of Soviet citizens who did not.

I recalled the time as described by Yelena Bonner, widow of Andrei Sakharov, when so-called doctors descended upon her martyred husband, then exiled in Gorki and under house arrest. The doctors tried forced-feeding him during his hunger strike. One doctor, whose name is publicly known, said to Sakharov, "We won't kill you, but we will make you an invalid for life." The Soviet doctors finally won their war against Sakharov. Are those doctors still practicing their brutish medicine?

What made the Holocaust not understandable but finally bearable was the Nuremberg war trials and that some of the Nazi human monsters were either executed or jailed for long terms. Somebody paid for the crimes of Adolf Hitler and his genocide apparatus.

Will anyone pay for the crimes of Stalin and his successors against the Soviet peoples?

Millions of Ukrainians, Chechen-Irgush, Bvelo-Russians, and Russians, Crimean Tatars, Balts, Georgians, the peoples of Central Asia and so many others were exterminated during the three decades of Stalin's bloody reign. Stalin and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union turned the country into a vast slaughterhouse. At the Perm prison camp, three Ukrainian rights-activists, members of the Ukrainian Helsinki committee, died as political prisoners between 1984 and 1985.

Who, then, will pay for the crimes of Stalin and his successors against the Soviet peoples and for the post-Stalin deaths of three Ukrainian human-rights activists?

Such monstrous massacres could not have been inflicted and planned by one man alone. The killing fields needed a killing machine which the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, its central committee, its Politburo, its presidium, its party-controlled media, its nomenklatura and its secret police supplied.

Who will pay for the crimes of Stalin and his successors against the Soviet peoples?

The alibi for the Nazi war criminals is that they had merely been following orders. The Allied jurists, including the Soviet judge, ignored that plea and the war criminals were punished. Are the Soviet prison-keepers, the Soviet torturers and executioners, the terror apparatchiks, who participated in the longest blood bath in human history immune from punishment? And will those Soviet leaders who gave the orders also be forgiven in the era of Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev the Good?

Who will pay for the crimes of Stalin and his successors against the Soviet peoples?

So long as these crimes go unpunished, so long can it be said that there is no rule of law in the Soviet Union. So long as no Soviet leader is prepared to try under a recognized rule of law the terror apparatchiks, there can be no confidence in those who today hold the reins of power in the Soviet Union.

In Britain, the House of Commons voted overwhelmingly Dec. 12 for a recommendation to change the law so that Nazi war criminals living in Britain could be prosecuted. Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and Neal Kinnock, Labor opposition leader, voted for the recommendation. Shouldn't Soviet criminals who warred against their own citizens also be prosecuted?

Countering my thesis is a prudential argument:

If we seek a peaceful transition from communism to freedom, then we must assure the terror apparatachiks and their superiors, however great their guilt, that no reprisals are planned—in other words that the past will be forgiven. Not to announce such an amnesty in advance, goes the argument, would ensure a blood bath as seen in the desperate resistance by the Romanian Securitate, a resistance born not out of loyalty to Nicolae Ceausescu, but to a will to survive the December revolution.

Such an amnesty offer, however, was not granted the Nuremberg defendants, any more than immunity-for-surrender was offered Gen. Manuel Antonio Noriega and his Panamanian Defense Forces. Well, goes the argument, the Nuremberg defendants had been defeated in battle as had Gen. Noriega. Therefore the prudential argument need not apply.

My answer to that contention is that the crimes of the Soviet state and of the Soviet Communist Party are so damnable—according to Zbigniew Brzezinski: "It has been openly admitted that 60 out of its [the Soviet Union's] 70 years involved sustained criminality"—so monstrous and so unprecedented that to forgive is to forget what communism did to some 40 million human beings in one country alone. How did the Soviet killing machine manage to operate so efficiently for at least six decades? Even with all the research by Western scholars of the Soviet past, do we really know the full extent of the barbarousness of the Soviet regime?

Even accepting the prudential argument for amnesty, shouldn't at the very least the secret party dossiers be made public or made available to scholars so that the world can learn what happens in a society when the rule of law disappears? If the present Soviet regime seeks legitimacy by a selective rehabilitation of the innocent dead, shouldn't the world and the Soviet peoples learn the names of the terror apparatchiks and what they did?

Politburo member Alexander Yakovlev advocates the blanket rehabilitation of all past political prisoners, even if they actually committed some crime. Mr. Yakovlev is chairman of the Politburo commission on the rehabilitation of Stalin's victims. In a Moscow News interview reported by Tass, Mr. Yakovlev called for the establishment in the Soviet Union of an "ethical democracy." How ethical can a Soviet "democracy" be when the victms are "rehabilitated" and the criminals exonerated?

Perhaps the entire question of Soviet Party guilt may be moot. President Nixon has written: "To a man [Stalin] who killed tens of millions of Soviet citizens, Gorbachev gave a pat on the back and a slap on the wrist." When Mr. Gorbachev was asked two years ago by l'Humanite, the French communist daily, whether the vestiges of Stalinism had been overcome in the Soviet Union, he replied:

"Stalinism is a concept thought up by the enemies of communism to discredit socialism as a whole."

So, the answer to my question is this:

No one will pay for the crimes of Stalin and his successors against the Soviet peoples.

AMERICAN-JAPANESE PATENT PROCESS DOES NOT WORK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I first want to commend my colleague, the gentleman from California, for his very excellent capsulized history of the horrors of communism in the 20th century and the treacherous crimes of the Axis in World War II, and also for his pointing out the contribution of President Reagan to enforcing the collapse of these totalitarian walls and the leaders, and now I hope the gentleman will give the same interest with me in understanding the economic war that we are fighting today. The talk that I am going to give today, Mr. Speaker, concerns the patent process and how unfair our colleague in the Far East, Japan, is, in dealing with patents of American companies.

We might start out by saying, Mr. Speaker, that regardless of all the niceties that are exchanged in our trade talks it remains painfully clear that the Japanese are not mending their ways with American companies.

Yesterday's Outlook column by Peter Truell in the Wall Street Journal compared the Japanese and why reactions differ to them. It brought up and discounted the fact that the Japanese claim the attention they receive is because of racial and cultural prejudice. The story pointed out "there are other explanations for the disporportionate attention paid Japan."

Among other factors it pointed out that the Japanese market is not open, there is a lack of foreign investment in Japan and it does not have the propensity to import foreign goods. One area that is not mentioned is that of patents.

I have a special interest in the patent process in Japan because of friends and what has happened to them—and because I am hearing stories like the one I am going to relate today. The latest story to come to my attention is what the Japanese have done to a company that does substantial engineering and manufacturing in my district, as well as elsewhere in the United States of America. The company is Allied-Signal Inc.

This is not a small company. Allied-Signal was founded in 1920 and its main area of business is aerospace, automotive products, and engineered materials. Allied-Signal was chosen by the Air Force last year to joint venture with Raytheon, the IFF system for all of NATO—a $4.2 billion project if it survives the budget process.

Allied is the 28th largest company on the Fortune 500 list of companies and is one of 30 companies used to make up the Dow Jones industrial average. It has $12 billion in revenue.

The company employes 110,000 people worldwide and operates in 40 countries.

In no other country has Allied-Signal had the trouble that it has had in Japan.

Now Allied-Signal has requested the U.S. Trade Representative "to aid them in opening the Japanese market for new materials."

The company responded to a call from the U.S. Trade Representative for comments on major foreign trade barriers under the super 301 provision of the U.S. Trade Act of 1974. The Trade Representative can take action to open those markets and I am urging that the U.S. Trade Representative pushes hard on this one.

The Allied-Signal press release which was faxed to my office states succinctly what the problem with the Japanese is:

"The Japanese actions to preclude American companies from these advanced materials markets are a textbook example of Japanese industrial targeting of cutting-edge technology,"said Edward L. Hennessy, Jr., Allied-Signal chairman and CEO.

"If they are successful in keeping us out of Japan and continue to discourage our sales in third countries until our patents expire, they will then drive us out of business. What has happened to so many other American products will happen to us. We do not intend to let that happen," Hennessy said.

Allied-Signal said Japanese government agencies and businesses working in concert have successfully taken steps to keep the company out of the Japanese market for amorphous metal alloys, a material invented by Allied-Signal and for which it holds hundreds of U.S., European and Japanese patents. Specifically, the company said the Japanese took the following actions:

"Organized and funded a 34-company "Amorphous Metals Group" under the Japan Research and Development Corporation to speed development of a Japanese product to compete with Allied-Signal.

"Manipulated the Japanese patent system so that it took 11 years for Allied-Signal's basic patent to issue. During this time, Japanese companies worked to duplicate Allied-Signal's technology. The Allied-Signal patent has just three years of effective life remaining.

"Pressured Japanese utilities not to buy transformers containing Allied-Signal's product, despite their clear superiority in conserving energy, a national priority in Japan.

"Discouraged the purchase of Allied-Signal's amorphous alloys in Japan until Japanese companies could develop their own products.

"Pressured Allied-Signal to license its proprietary technology to Japanese companies on unreasonable terms, backed by the threat of government aid to help evade the company's patents."

Allied-Signal's amorphous metal alloys, marketed under the name Metglas®, are used in the cores of electric transformers, where they cut energy losses by 70 percent. In Japan, the use of such transformers would result in savings of $625 million per year in oil expenditures or would eliminate the need to build two 750 megawatt nuclear power plants.

Allied-Signal has built the world's first commercial plant to manufacture amorphous metal alloys and has been successful in selling the material in the United States and other countries. It has been stymied in Japan, however, despite more than a decade of marketing efforts through a joint venture with the Mitsui group. The potential world market for amorphous alloys in transformers is $1 billion a year and more than $2.5 billion per year for other applications. In addition, the technology upon which the material is based, also patented by Allied-Signal, is expected to have broad application in the development of additional new materials including those for aerospace and superconductor applications.

Remember, Allied-Signal has only 3 years left on this patent. The clock started ticking for the firm when it first applied for a patent and as soon as the paper was filed and became available to the Japanese business world 1½ years later—without granting the patent. Japanese companies have worked ever since to duplicate the Allied-Signal patent and now, the company has only 3 years left on the patent.

This is very close to what the Japanese have done to another company Go-Video of Scottsdale, AZ. That small company developed a double deck VCR, which is scheduled to come on the market this spring. The Japanese refused to sell parts to Go-Video and tried to market a double deck VCR but were stopped by Joe Alioto, the attorney for Go-Video.

The next best step for the Japanese interests was to go to other countries and ask those countries not to sell to Go-Video in an effort to squeeze it out.

Go-Video retaliated by suing the Japanese trading companies. They are now in court, and their case promises to shed some important light for American business on just what the Japanese are doing.

The reason the Japanese wanted to stop Go-Video is that the VCR is 50 percent of the electronics export from Japan and electronics compose one-third of Japan's exports. Go-Video holds the patent on the next two generations of the VCR and Japan wants to stifle the possibility of anyone else entering the market.

These two cases are very similar in that the Japanese were not honoring a patent process for the Americans until the Japanese interest could controll all of the technology. In one case they stalled the patent. In another they tried the strong arm method through other countries.

There is one significant difference in the Allied-Signal case and that is that Allied-Signal was in a joint venture with the Mitsui group. So even a joint venture is no guarantee.

This outrageous conduct by the Japanese must be changed. I urge the United States Trade Representative to go full speed on changing what has happened to Allied-Signal. How many other companies have run into this difficulty? What does this mean to the overall well being of American industry and the health of our economy?

Surely the Japanese know what they are doing. The "Japanese Conspiracy" by Marvin Wolf points out how they have targeted American business.

These two vital manufacturing companies are important to the United States. Allied-Signal must have some redress from this egregious wrong. The well-being for all of us is at stake.

If Japan, Inc. can stall and coerce a company the size of Allied-Signal, the 28th largest on the Fortune 500 index, about the use of its proprietary licensing, then what will that nation do to a smaller company.

All of us must be concerned about such activities. The administration must take strong action to stop such unfairness and targetting U.S. industries. Our Government must ensure a fair playing field for American business. Enough is enough. I certainly intend to follow through with these objections to such deliberate destruction of American industry.

CONTINUATION OF FUNDING FOR CHINESE MBA PROGRAM IS A POSITIVE STEP

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAXON] for 5 minutes.

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, we all have clear vision in our memory of those valiant men and women in China, many of them students, who stood in Tiananmen Square in front of those tanks and in front of those troops to stand up for freedom and democracy and basic human rights. In my view, my colleagues, there is nothing more important than this Congress, than this country, standing with those valiant men and women in their fight for basic human rights and the opportunity to move that country in a new direction.

As a result, today I am very pleased to tell my colleagues and announce that we are going to do just that. We are going to stand with these men and women in China who seek change in their country.

I have just received the assurance from the Department of Commerce that funding for a very successful MBA Program run in China by the University of Buffalo in my district will be continued.

Just 2 short weeks ago we had been concerned that the funding for this program was going to be ended and there were about 83 students in that program whose education was going to be terminated April 1.

I think this would have been a great tragedy, because these men and women literally risked their very lives to attend those programs, to get this education, and to prepare to begin to build China in a new direction, new free markets, freedom, and democracy for their people.

The decision this afternoon by the Department of Commerce to continue this program, to continue the funding coming to the University of Buffalo, is a tremendous step forward.

In addition, I am extremely pleased the Department is going a step further. Not only will they continue the funding for the ongoing students' educations, but the Department and the administration are going to try to identify funds, both public and private, to continue this program in the years to come for additional classes and for more students.

My friends, for those men and women who stood up and in many cases lost their lives in China in Tiananmen Square to change the direction of China, I think the decision today by the Department of Commerce and by the administration is a very positive one. It means we will be standing with these men and women in China, as we have with the people in Eastern Europe and Central America and all other parts of the world, who are looking for a new dawn and a new era in their lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. HOYER (at the request of Mr. GEPHARDT) for today on account of illness in the family.

Mr. MANTON (at the request of Mr. GEPHARDT) on February 27 and February 28 on account of a death in family.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. GINGRICH, for 60 minutes each, on today, February 28, and March 1.

Mr. PARRIS, for 5 minutes, today.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. OWENS of Utah) and to include extraneous material:)

Mr. BRUCE, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. ENGEL, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. GAYDOS, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. GAYDOS, for 30 minutes, on February 28.

Mr. BRUCE, for 60 minutes, on February 28.

Mr. PARRIS, for 5 minutes, on February 28.

Mr. DREIER of California, for 60 minutes, today.

Mr. PANETTA, for 5 minutes, today.

Mr. PAXON, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

Mr. OWENS of Utah, on House Concurrent Resolution 226, during debate in the House today.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. GILLMOR) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. GRANDY.

Mr. BROOMFIELD in two instances.

Mr. IRELAND.

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN in three instances.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

Joint Resolutions of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S.J. Res. 190. Joint Resolution designating April 9, 1990, as "National Former Prisoners of War Recognition Day;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 226. Joint Resolution to designate the year 1990 as the "Bicentennial Anniversary of the Legacy of Benjamin Franklin;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 227. Joint Resolution to designate March 11 through March 17, 1990, as "Deaf Awareness Week;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 229. Joint Resolution to designate April 1990 as "National Prevent-A-Litter Month;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 230. Joint Resolution to designate the period commencing on May 6, 1990, and ending on May 12, 1990, as "National Drinking Water Week;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 231. Joint Resolution to designate the week of June 10, 1990 through June 16, 1990, as "State-Supported Homes for Veterans Week;" to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 236. Joint resolution designating May 6 through 12, 1990, as "Be Kind to Animals and National Pet Week"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 241. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 6, 1990 through May 13, 1990, as "Jewish Heritage Week"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 243. Joint resolution to designate March 25, 1990, as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 245. Joint resolution designating July 3, 1990, as "Idaho Centennial Day"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 250. Joint resolution designating April 1990 as "National Recycling Month"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 251. Joint resolution designating "Baltic Freedom Day"; to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 252. Joint resolution designating the week of April 15, 1990, through April 21, 1990, as "National Minority Cancer Awareness Week"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S.J. Res. 258. Joint resolution to authorize the President to proclaim the last Friday of April 1990 as "National Arbor Day"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.) under its previous order, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 28, 1990, at 12 noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

2578. A letter from the General Counsel, Department of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1991 for military functions of the Department of Defense and to prescribe military personnel levels for fiscal year 1991, and for other purposes, pursuant to 31 U.S.C. 1110; to the Committee on Armed Services.

2579. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of D.C. Act 8-154, "Closing of a Public Alley in Square 452, S.O. 87-405, Act of 1990", and report, pursuant to D.C. Code section 1-233(c)(1); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

2580. A letter from the Chairman, Council of the District of Columbia, transmitting a copy of D.C. Act 8-156, "District of Columbia Statutory Savings Provision Temporary Act of 1990", pursuant to D.C. Code section 1-233(c)(1); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

2581. A letter from the Associate Director, ACTION, transmitting a report on activities under the Freedom of Information Act for the calendar year 1989, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552(d); to the Committee on Government Operations.

2582. A letter from the Acting Director, Federal Emergency Management Agency, transmitting a report on activities under the Freedom of Information Act for the calendar year 1989, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552(d); to the Committee on Government Operations.

2583. A letter from the Chairman, Tennessee Valley Authority, transmitting a copy of the annual report in compliance with the Government in the Sunshine Act for calendar year 1989, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552b(j); to the Committee on Government Operations.

2584. A letter from the Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives, transmitting the quarterly report of receipts and expenditures of appropriations and other funds for the period October 1, 1989 through December 31, 1989, pursuant to 2 U.S.C. 104a (H. Doc. No. 101-153) to the Committee on House Administration and ordered to be printed.

2585. A letter from the Acting Assistant Attorney General for Legislative Affairs, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for the recovery by the United States of the costs of hospital and medical care and treatment furnished by the United States in certain circumstances, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2586. A letter from the President, Little League Baseball, Inc., transmitting the organization's annual report for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989, pursuant to 36 U.S.C. 1084(b); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2587. A letter from the Attorney General, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend 42 U.S.C. 1981 in regard to the formation and implementation of contracts, and title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to protect against discrimination in employment, and for other purposes; jointly to the Committees on Education and Labor and the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. HAWKINS: Committee of Conference. Conference report on H.R. 2742 (Rept. 101-407). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. DE LA GARZA: Committee on Agriculture. H.R. 4010. A bill to provide the Secretary of Agriculture authority regarding the sale of sterile screwworns. (Rept. 101-408). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. DE LA GARZA: Committee on Agriculture. Report on allocation of budget totals for fiscal year 1990 submitted pursuant to section 302 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Rept. 101-409). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLILEY (for himself, Mr. BATEMAN, Mr. PARRIS, Mr. PICKETT, and Mr. SISISKY):

H.R. 4107. A bill to direct the Secretary of the Interior to permit certain uses of lands within Richmond National Battlefield Park and Colonial National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Virginia; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. CAMPBELL of Colorado:

H.R. 4108. A bill to permit Telluride Regional Airport to receive assistance under the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982; to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

By Mr. CHANDLER (for himself and Mr. SCHULZE):

H.R. 4109. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for coverage of screening mammography and colonrectal screening examinations under part B of the Medicare Program; jointly, to the Committees on Ways and Means and Energy and Commerce.

By Mr. PANETTA (for himself, Mr. EMERSON, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Mr. HATCHER, Mr. HALL of Ohio, Mr. GLICKMAN, Mr. STAGGERS, Mr. ESPY, Mr. SARPALIUS, Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA, Mr. MORRISON of Washington, and Mr. MILLER of Califorina):

H.R. 4110. A bill to amend the Food Stamp Act of 1977 to respond to the hunger emergency afflicting American families and children, to attack the causes of hunger among all Americans, to ensure an adequate diet for low-income people who are homeless or at risk of homelessness because of the shortage of affordable housing, to promote self-sufficiency among food stamp recipients, to simplify the food stamp program's administration, to reauthorize the food stamp and temporary emergency food assistance programs, to codify and reauthorize other nutrition programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. CRAIG (for himself and Mr. RAHALL):

H.R. 4111. A bill to amend the Mining and Mineral Resources Research Institute Act of 1984, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. GEJDENSON (for himself, Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut, Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut, Mrs. KENNELLY, Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut, and Mr. SHAYS):

H.R. 4112. A bill to establish the Weir Farm National Historic Site in the State of Connecticut; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. GRADISON:

H.R. 4113. A bill to suspend temporarily the duty on certain chemicals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAYES of Louisiana:

H.R. 4114. A bill to amend the Disaster Assistance Act of 1989 to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to take into account the verified planting intentions of soybean producers in determining prevented planting credit; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HERTEL (for himself, Mr. JONES of North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. SHUMWAY, Mr. SAXTON, Mr. CLEMENT, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. STUDDS, Mrs. SAIKI, Mr. MANTON, Mr. BORSKI, Mr. BRENNAN, Mr. HERGER, Mrs. LOWEY of New York, and Ms. SCHNEIDER):

H.R. 4115. A bill to authorize appropriations for certain ocean and coastal programs of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. KOLBE:

H.R. 4116. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to make certain positions on the U.S. Sentencing Commission part time beginning October 1, 1990; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KOLBE (for himself, Mr. UDALL, Mr. STUMP, Mr. RHODES, and Mr. KYL):

H.R. 4117. A bill to provide for the divestiture of certain properties of the San Carlos Indian irrigation project in the State of Arizona, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MACHTLEY (for himself, Ms. SCHNEIDER, Mr. FRANK, Mr. MRAZEK, Mr. PENNY, and Mr. TOWNS):

SENATE—Tuesday, February 27, 1990

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1990)

The Senate met at 10:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

For promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south. But God is the judge: he putteth down one, and setteth up another.—Psalm 75:6, 7.

* * * For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God.—Romans 13:1.

Almighty God, omnipotent, omnicient, and omnipresent, at this incredible moment of history help us to comprehend what is really happening. In China, Eastern Europe, Central America, and the Soviet Union people are laying down their lives in their demands for freedom—a freedom which we have enjoyed for 200 years and now tend to take for granted. Awaken us to the awful contradiction that while many put their convictions on the line at great risk, many in America, where freedom is understood as our birthright, are avoiding risk, covering their bets, so to speak, unwilling to take a stand against popular trends, however destructive, turning freedom into moral anarchy. Revive us, Lord, to the high ground of responsibility, the indispensable corollary of freedom. In Jesus' name. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, February 27, 1990.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBB thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business until 11 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. At 11 a.m. the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1430, the national and community service bill.

Today, from 12:30 to 2:15 p.m., the Senate will stand in recess for the party conferences. When the Senate reconvenes at 2:15 p.m., there will be 2 hours for debate on the motion to invoke cloture on the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenian genocide resolution, with a vote occurring on that motion at 4:15 p.m.

Following that vote the Senate will return to the consideration of the national and community service bill. Rollcall votes are likely today with respect to that bill.

RESERVATION OF LEADERS' TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time and I reserve all of the leader time of the distinguished Republican leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, all time of the leaders is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER].

THE NICARAGUAN ELECTION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to report to the Senate on a trip to Nicaragua I made this past weekend as a member of President Carter's observer team.

This was a very inspirational experience for me. In fact, an old man voting in Nicaragua told me that he was voting because all his life he had never had a chance to vote in what he considered a fair and a free election, and he was 80-some years old and wanted to do it once before he died. That was the attitude in Nicaragua this weekend. I was privileged to be one of 40 official observers of the Nicaraguan election. We had Carter identification tags and could go into any polling place, participate in the counting, and so forth. There were over 1,000 other observers, but the presence of former President Jimmy Carter, I think, had a great impact on the fairness of this election.

I would say, as a Republican on the floor of this Senate, that our country owes President Carter a debt of gratitude for organizing his election observer team and being a moral force there. During the week before the election, 25 election officials were arrested by the Sandinista government or detained or harassed, and it was President Carter's moral force and ability to speak to the media that forced those people to be released. So, I think that former President Carter deserves a tip of the hat for organizing and standing for a fair and free election in Nicaragua. He was very instrumental in protecting the electoral process—and I say that as a Republican, as one who at certain times in the past may have been critical of some of his policies. He truly demonstrated great leadership in this operation. Without Jimmy Carter the election might not have been perceived to be fair and free, and probably it would not have been as fair and free as it was.

Mr. President, my trip was sponsored, as I mentioned, by the President Carter group known as the Council of Freely Elected Heads of Government, Nicaraguan Election Observation Group. We flew to Nicaragua Friday afternoon, and in this group were 12 Members of Congress, 12 former heads of state from Latin America, or other leaders, and 12 other distinguished Americans.

On Saturday morning, at 6:30 a.m., I was privileged to take a 2-mile run with former President Carter and had a chance to discuss our mission to try to force a free election. Of course, he had been there on several previous visits regarding the registration and all the other activities that led up to the election. Saturday at noon we deployed to different regions. My group went to Matagalpa, a rural state, where there has been a lot of Contra activity. Our team, the team I was with, consisted of former Gov. Bruce Babbitt, of Arizona; the former President of Costa Rica, Daniel Oduber Quiros; New York businessman John Whitehead, a former Under Secretary of State; distinguished election expert and myself. We traveled in a four-wheel vehicle to Matagalpa where we prepared to observe the elections.

On election morning Sunday, February 25, we arose at 5 a.m. so we could arrive unannounced at a polling place as it opened. We chose a village polling place for our first shift. Amazement was next—nearly 150 voters were lined up in the rain at 6 a.m. waiting to vote. We interviewed some of them. Some had arrived at 3 a.m. Officials were opening the ballot boxes getting prepared and they were really proud of what they were doing. There were opposition party representatives, the UNO Party, and Sandinista party officials also were there observing the process.

Everyone seemed very determined to vote and the determination showed on their faces. They thirsted for a chance to vote in a free election, and, as a Senator who lives in the world of votes, quorum calls, and elections, I was absolutely amazed at this thirsting of people to vote in a fair and free election. Their determination made me a little worried about our own 50-percent turnout in Presidential elections because, before the day was over, 80 percent of the eligible voters had voted and not all of the statistics were yet in.

Next we drove to a remote polling place in the country. Coming from South Dakota, I asked to see a real rural precinct. We did this at my insistence. We took the four-wheeler and drove for nearly an hour and a half to an agricultural area in the mountains. It is all agricultural land around Matagalpa, but it is very mountainous. We came to a polling place that we had to walk to because the roads were not really roads. They were just rough cuts. Everyone else had gotten there by walking or riding horses. No motorized vehicles, no motor bikes. There were 150 people standing in line slowly voting. This was about 11 o'clock in the morning.

I say this because I think history was being made. I consider what happened in Nicaragua this past weekend to be as significant for Central America as the Berlin Wall coming down has been to the Eastern European region.

But there were 150 people standing in line in this rural precinct; horses tied to a fenceposts by people who had ridden there; not a motorized vehicle in sight. They were voting for President of their country and for members of their National Assembly and municipal officials, in what they perceived to be the first fair and open election ever held in Nicaragua, or at least in the memory of anyone living. Indeed, according to election experts, it was the only fair, free election ever held in that country.

We were in Contra country, guerrilla territory. We were told it was somewhat dangerous, but it was broad daylight and we doubted the Contras would do anything at this point. So we traveled through this rugged terrain to see that polling place in the midst of a pasture in an old schoolhouse building. We saw those volunteers going through the line. Some of the people arrived at the polling place at 2 or 3 in the morning because they just somehow did not believe that the election would occur, or they thought there would be long lines.

Everybody there, as I said, had arrived on foot or horseback. Some people had walked 5 to 10 miles to vote. Mothers carried their babies. People brought food anticipating an all-day wait. My heart went out to these poor people who wanted the precious right to vote.

Later in the day, we continued to visit other precincts unannounced. At the end of the day, we visited a precinct further up the mountains where it was quite cool and again the voters were lined up. The 6 o'clock closing time was extended for people who were in the line, so they got to vote.

Then there was the ceremony of counting the votes. This particular precinct only had one light. The votes were counted by flashlight. There was a system for double-checking. All the unused ballots were counted. This was the first time these people had ever engaged in an election. There were envelopes for the unused ballots. Then they were sealed, and the envelopes were signed by the observers from each side in a ceremony.

We checked to be sure there were opposition party observers at each place. We asked about incidents throughout the day. We had reports in our area in the afternoon of a shortage of ballots. We went to those precincts. It was usually an administrative mixup.

I went to Nicaragua skeptically thinking the Sandinistas were going to rig the election. But I think the presence of Jimmy Carter and his group did the preliminary work so well that this did not occur. I was emotionally moved, in my jaded state, by what I saw there. It surprised me.

Now there were reports from the UNO people. Mrs. Chamorro's party kept bringing up reports of people being intimidated and detained, and indeed they were true. There was almost no advertising for Mrs. Chamorro in the countryside. In the city the advertising was all of Daniel Ortega and the state-owned media was all Daniel Ortega.

I do not know how people knew Mrs. Chamorro was running, except she had rallies around the country and perhaps used radio broadcasts. But it was amazing to me that she won the election. If you had been down there before, you would not have seen any presence of her on the street or on signs and posters and so forth.

There was a real message here in that people felt strongly enough about voting that they walked to those polls and they exercised their right to vote.

I would also say this about Daniel Ortega, of whom I have been a great critic, and I have voted for Contra aid. I thought his concession speech was excellent. If he goes through with giving up the Ministry of Defense and the Ministry of Interior, there will be a smooth transition.

Mrs. Chamorro is supposed to be inaugurated in April. Some people are suspicious that the Sandinistas will try to keep Humberto Ortega as Minister of Defense and keep Tomas Borge as Minister of Interior and let all the economic problems fall on Mrs. Chamorro's shoulders. But, from the looks of it, Daniel Ortega is very wisely behaving in a very responsible way. He has congratulated Mrs. Chamorro.

It is amazing when you think about it. The nine cosmandantes have stayed together for 10 years without being assassinated or quitting or going off to do something else. But, Ortega said they had given the best leadership they could to the country, had obviously lost the election and they were turning the power over. And for him to say that that is as significant as the Berlin Wall coming down in terms of that region.

President Carter influenced Ortega's speech. At 2 a.m., he went to see Ortega. He also talked to our Secretary of State on the phone; woke him up at 4 in the morning and coordinated the statements of all three, also Mrs. Chamorro's. He talked to her and told her not to overstate her claim too much. The presence of Jimmy Carter there was just absolutely essential. The ingredient he brought to the statements after the election were important. I know that there are a lot of problems ahead for Nicaragua; the enormous economic problems that exist there must now be faced.

In any event, we concluded our visit to various polling sites, reported and demanded corrections when we saw irregularities, and finally returned to Managua.

On Monday we flew back to Washington, DC, and back to work; regular work, that is. So, thus ends my tale to the Senate of this trip. I shall never forget, even if I live to be 100, the looks on the faces of those determined peasants, who stood in the rain, the broiling Sun later in the day, and the mountains in the chilly darkness to vote. I shall never take our rights and privileges in our great country for granted again.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, are we still in morning business?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

PRESIDENT REAGAN AND THE NICARAGUAN ELECTION

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I rise this morning to bring my congratulations to President Reagan. The events in Nicaragua have been variously characterized by people of varying persuasions. The majority leader said yesterday that it was a triumph of the peace process. And I would say that, while recognizing this, there would have been no peace process had there not been a willingness to confront that Communist government and to sustain that effort all during the decade that preceded the election.

The events of the world this year have been extraordinary, by anybody's measure. I reckon that the last 12 months have been the most spontaneous year in history. As I look back on the achievements of President Reagan, I recall that it was he who characterized the Soviet Union as the Evil Empire. It was he who forecast the decline and collapse of the Soviet empire, in a speech in London, early in the last decade. I believe it was 1982.

It was he who had the courage to push forward the deployment of the INF, the Pershing II missile. It was he who had the courage to call attention to the strategic imbalance between ourselves and the Soviet Union. It was he who brought along SDI. It was he who sustained the pressure on the Soviet Union until, recognizing that change was at hand, he embraced and made possible some of the things which we now welcome as the events of the last several months—the changes in Eastern Europe, the change now in our own hemisphere.

So, while many of the liberal media would be quite comfortable in saying, as I have noticed Mr. William Sloane Coffin, who is not the liberal media but certainly of the liberal persuasion, this morning said, the Sandinistas would have never lost, and that theirs was a most promising revolution had it not been for the presence of the United States in that election.

I would say to Mr. Coffin, and those who are of the same persuasion, that the Nicaraguan people spoke at the first opportunity they had to speak. And when they spoke they rejected communism, as have people all over the world, every single time they were given the opportunity.

So, when President Reagan recognized what was taking place down there and confronted the Sandinista government with American purpose, and with the Contras, and with the sometimes cooperation of the Congress, it was an act that brought into place that which culminated in the election, freely participated in by the people of Nicaragua. To the great and welcome consequence of that vote, the Nicaraguan people spoke. Their choice was not to live a life of tyranny. Their choice was for the promise of democracy.

They now have it. It is incumbent upon the United States to give them the support they need in a very troubled country to move and progress, as other peoples in this hemisphere have been able to move and progress, toward democracy.

Surely the people of El Salvador would welcome it because it means, one would hope, a much lessened contribution to the FMLN by the Sandinista government. Surely the people of the region are now welcoming the dawn of democracy in yet another country down there.

Mr. President, that concludes my remarks. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE WILL FOR FREEDOM

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, we are the most fortunate of American generations. We are the Americans who have lived to see the values of our revolution reaffirmed in some of the bleakest, most oppressed societies on Earth. As recent events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have so vividly demonstrated, the aspirations of any nation cannot be overlooked, dismissed or resisted. The will for freedom is eternal. Eventually, the people will have their say.

On February 25, the people of Nicaragua had their say.

On that day, Nicaraguans made clear to the world that they would not relinquish the promise of the 1979 revolution. The betrayal of their aspirations, the theft of their revolution, created the conditions that so cruelly affected Nicaraguans for 11 years. Violence and misery were daily reminders of their betrayal.

But last Sunday, Mr. President, Nicaragua reaffirmed the hopeful creed of the great American writer, William Faulkner: "man will not merely endure: he will prevail." In their determination that Nicaragua should take its rightful place within the community of free nations, Violeta Chamorro, UNO, and the courageous people of Nicaragua have prevailed against extreme hardships and formidable disadvantages. As a free man, I welcome Nicaragua to the free world. As a legatee of an enduring democratic revolution, I rejoice in the ultimate success of Nicaragua's revolution.

Mr. President, I also commend the decision of the Government of Nicaragua to accept the verdict of the people. I pray their decision is an indication that the Sandinistas will accept Violeta Chamorro's pledge to seek national reconciliation between all parties to the Nicaraguan tragedy of the last decade. I know this good, generous, and intrepid woman is sincere in her determination to heal the wounds and alleviate the suffering of Nicaraguan society. I urge President Ortega to cooperate with her in the great task of reconciliation and reconstruction.

I urge Sandinista activists to adapt to democratic modes of behavior. The popular will is decided. Violence is no longer an acceptable form of political expression. And those Nicaraguans who are not happy with the result may appeal the decision in the next election. President Ortega can best serve his country by impressing upon his supporters the importance of abiding by democratic rules.

He can also impress upon his fellow Sandinistas that the huge and costly Nicaraguan Army, constituted only to serve the interests of the FSLN and not the nation, must be vastly reduced and depoliticized. Likewise, the Interior Ministry will have to make do without the services of Tomas Borge's goon squads. Separating political parties from the instruments of state security is essential to the success of Nicaragua's democratic experiment.

With this election come great opportunities. They are the opportunities that always accompany freedom—opportunities for peace, prosperity, and justice. Free a people from oppression, give them control of their lives and you free their hearts, their imagination, their creativity. In the exercise of their God-given rights, people will struggle to conquer natural obstacles, overcome accidents of geography and birth, feed the hungry, heal the sick, live in peace and prosperity.

The United States has sought the success of liberty in Nicaragua through very difficult times and often at the expense of a national consensus. We should now assure Mrs. Chamorro of our generous assistance as the process of social and economic reconstruction begins in Nicaragua. It will not be an easy process, but Nicaraguans have demonstrated with this election how formidable a force for reconstruction they are. They risked their welfare for an opportunity to advance their society. Let America keep faith with them.

Mr. President, let me again stress my admiration for the courage of all those Nicaraguans involved in moving their nation so dramatically forward. But let me also remind the Senate of the courage of the armed Nicaraguan resistance who contributed so importantly to this glorious moment's arrival. If the people's verdict is heeded, and I believe it will be heeded, Mr. President, their long and noble struggle will have succeeded.

We should also take pride in two American Presidents and their administrations who, with others, helped to keep the flame of liberty from being extinguished in Nicaragua. It was a moment in our history of which we can rightfully be proud. Once again, America helped another people to take up the example we have always provided the world: the example of a just government derived from the consent of the governed. And it is America's honor to now have the company of Mrs. Chamorro and her brave countrymen as we support the further progress of freedom in the world.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

DERRIKE COPE—WINNER OF THE 1990 DAYTONA 500

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, on Sunday, February 18, 1990, the stock car racing world focused its attention on the Pacific Northwest as a 31-year-old from Spanaway, WA, Derrike Cope, won the Daytona 500. He scored an exciting, if improbable, victory at one of racing's premier events with a combination of skill, durability and a little bit of timely luck.

Cope ran with the leaders throughout the race, but like the rest of the field, trailed Dale Earnhardt by an increasing margin as the race proceeded. With only a few laps to go, officials raised the yellow caution flag. The field bunched behind the pace car, eliminating the 30-second gap between the leaders.

Cope kept running while Earnhardt stopped for fresh tires and a shot of gasoline. When the green flag came out moments later, Earnhardt effortlessly passed Cope and another driver to regain the lead.

On the final lap, Earnhardt's car suddenly blew its right rear tire. Cope swerved his Chevrolet Lumina past the rapidly decelerating Earnhardt, and sped to the checkered flag.

The sweet trip to victory lane capped Cope's first NASCAR Winston Cup victory. The rewards of a fine performance awaited his arrival as Cope asked for directions on how to get to the unfamiliar territory.

Derrike Cope is a relative newcomer to stock car racing. His first love was baseball, which he played at Bethel High School in Spanaway and Fort Steilacoom Community College—now known as Pierce College—in Tacoma, WA. An injury forced him from that sport while playing for Whitman College in Walla Walla, WA, in 1979. His father, Don, and his late mother, Delores, encouraged him to take up stock car racing to fill the void.

Derrike Cope's exciting win at Daytona is a great victory, not only for himself, but also for the State of Washington and for stock car racing in the Pacific Northwest. I extend my heartiest congratulations to him, his pit crew and his sponsors on a tremendous race.

FRANK KEPPEL—OUTSTANDING COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, early last week, Frank Keppel, one of America's greatest educators, died after a long illness. Mr. Keppel was appointed Commissioner of Education in 1962 by President Kennedy and held that position until 1966. During his tenure, the Federal Government launched the Vocational Education Act of 1963, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, and the Higher Education Act of 1965. A quarter century later, these landmark measures remain the centerpiece of the Federal commitment to education and are an enduring monument to the vision of Frank Keppel.

After graduating Phi Beta Kappa from Harvard, Frank went to the American Academy in Rome to study sculpture. Sculpture's loss was education's gain when he returned to Harvard as an assistant dean. In 1948, at the age of 32, he was appointed dean of Harvard's prestigious Graduate School of Education. Under his leadership, the school undertook pathbreaking work on team teaching and programmed learning. He also designed the Master of Arts in Teaching Program, in an effort to improve the quality of school teachers.

In 1962, President Kennedy, with education as one of the priorities of his New Frontier, named Frank Keppel as U.S. Commissioner of Education, and he continued to serve with great distinction in the early years of the Johnson administration.

At that time, the Federal Government was attempting to devise an appropriate Federal role in elementary and secondary education. But the debate was stuck on three questions: Whether Federal aid should go to parochial schools, whether it should go to segregated schools, and whether it would mean Federal control of local schools.

Frank Keppel spent long hours working out a compromise on these complex and controversial issues—he did an outstanding job. The agreement he hammered out was so complete and so convincing that Congress enacted the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 less than 90 days after it was proposed. Later that year, Congress also enacted the Higher Education Act of 1965, which established the principle of need-based aid to students—grants, loans, and work study jobs—that have been the heart of Federal aid to college students ever since. Neither of these initiatives would have been possible without Frank Keppel's tireless work and skillful compromises.

After he left the Commissioner's post, Mr. Keppel returned to Massachusetts and remained an active and important participant in education policy matters. He last testified before the Senate Labor Committee in October 1987, discussing the impending teacher shortage and what we should do to alleviate it. He worked closely with many of us on the expansion of the National Assessment of Educational Progress [NAEP] that Congress approved in 1988. His advice was valuable and made its mark on both areas.

Frank Keppel's commitment to education was broad and deep. In addition to his efforts in American education policy, he advised many developing countries about education, worked on education issues for the World Bank, and lent his skills to the worldwide effort to prevent the deterioration of libraries. He was also committed to the performing arts and he advised the Lincoln Center about its program for the arts in education.

Frank Keppel brought dedication and wisdom to everything he did. Millions of disadvantaged schoolchildren have received a better education because of his efforts, and millions more will do so in the years ahead. Every day in schools and colleges across America, a new chapter is being written in the enduring legacy of Frank Keppel and his legendary commitment to excellent education.

I extend my deepest sympathies to his wife Deedie and his daughters Edith Drury and Susan Keller. The country has lost a true giant in education, and many of us in Congress have lost one of our most respected friends.

FRANK KEPPEL, A VOICE FOR REFORM

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, it was with deep sorrow that I learned of the death of Francis Keppel, the former U.S. Commissioner of Education. Frank Keppel was truly a man who left an indelible mark upon educational policy. It is rarely the case that one person makes a large contribution through both his work and his vision. Frank Keppel was such a person. He proposed ideas that were far ahead of their time. He stood squarely above the fray in matters of innovation and reform. And he worked diligently to see that vision become a reality.

His stewardship as dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Education between 1940 and 1962 made that school the teacher training institution by which all other schools set their pace. He advanced the role of higher education institutions in educational reform by strengthening the linkages between teacher training programs and classroom experience. His imagination led to the practice of using local elementary and secondary schools as laboratories of educational improvement and research.

In 1962 he was called to Washington to serve as the U.S. Commissioner of Education, a post he held until 1966. During that time, he played a central role in the creation and implementation of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and the Higher Education Act of 1965, the first two major acts which provide Federal assistance in education. He was a staunch proponent of using education as the avenue out of poverty, and directed the majority of his efforts to seeing that children in need received targeted educational services.

He was a welcome witness at hearings before our Education Subcommittee, and testified as well on the creation of the National Endowment of the Humanities, and National Endowment of the Arts. He also played a major role in the creation of the National Assessment of Educational Progress [NAEP]. It is the NAEP study which has given us critical information on educational achievement in this country, and which provides a data base for comparisons with other countries. After his service in Washington, he was the chairman of the board of the General Learning Corp., and in 1974 became the director of the educational policy program of the Aspen Institute.

His prescience and energy in the education enterprise continued throughout his life. A recent example of his foresight was his initiative on national goals. Early last year, he formed a coalition to determine the viability of developing national goals and a strategy for meeting those goals. His concern for building a world-class education—one that would carry this Nation forward into the next century—was the impetus behind his initiative. At the time, the subject of national goals was not welcome. Yet today, just a few months later, many have come to appreciate the impact that national goals might have upon improving educational quality.

That was Frank Keppel—interested in ideas, and committed to reform, pushing us until the end. We will sorely miss that voice which championed educational equity and educational quality. His work, however, will live on through the generations of students, teachers, and administrators who have had the great fortune to be touched by his life and by his efforts.

FRANCIS KEPPEL

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, the death of Francis Keppel last Tuesday marks the loss of a great pioneer in the area of education. I was personally saddened by this loss and extend my deepest sympathies to the Keppel family.

Francis Keppel was a tireless advocate of improved education for all Americans. He instituted educational reform through his work in academia, Government, and the private sector.

Mr. Keppel began his career in Massachusetts at Harvard University, where at age 32 he was appointed dean of Harvard's Graduate School of Education. In his 14 years at Harvard, he quadrupled enrollment in the Graduate School of Education and designed a program for teacher training which was unequaled at the time.

In 1962, Francis Keppel was appointed by President Kennedy to be U.S. Commissioner of Education, a post in which he served with distinction and vigor. During the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, Commissioner Keppel effectively designed and executed important new programs which improved the quality and accessibility of public schooling for poor children. He used his position to urge vigorous enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to ensure equal access to public education and he created the National Assessment of Educational Progress.

From 1966 to 1974, Francis Keppel was chairman of the board of the General Learning Corp., a joint venture between the General Electric Corp., and Time Inc. During these years he also served as vice chairman of New York City's Board of Higher Education and was an overseer of Harvard, where he remained a senior lecturer until his death.

Mr. President, it is striking to me that this man not only devoted his life to the improvement of education, but that he did so in so many different ways. Francis Keppel worked to improve educational opportunities for children and graduate students. He administered at Harvard and at New York's public City University. He served with distinction at the highest levels of Federal and city government, academia, and corporate America.

Francis Keppel's reach was felt by many. His legacy is great. I think we can best remember Francis Keppel, and honor his service to this country, by simply continuing his work.

The United States is facing critical needs in the area of education. We have enough rhetoric. Let's follow the example of Francis Keppel and work to make a truly first rate education the right of all Americans. This goal must be a top priority at all levels of Government, academia, and business.

Because of Francis Keppel, the tools with which to implement this task are in place. It remains up to all of us to continue his work.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,809th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE JEAN G. BISSELL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to mark the passing of a distinguished jurist and South Carolinian, Judge Jean Galloway Bissell of the U.S. Court of Appeals. Judge Bissell was the first female South Carolinian to be appointed to a Federal judgeship. In this and many other ways, she made great contributions to our State and Nation, and I therefore take this time to pay her a brief tribute.

Jean Galloway Bissell was a native of Due West, SC, and received her bachelor of science degree from the University of South Carolina in 1956, graduating magna cum laude. Two years later, she graduated first in her class from the law school at the University of South Carolina. Her early academic excellence was a harbinger of the great success to come.

Upon completion of law school, she joined the law firm of Haynsworth, Perry, Bryant, Marion & Townsend, of Greenville, SC, where she worked as a partner from 1965 until 1971. In 1971, she affiliated herself with the Columbia, SC, firm of McKay, Sherrill, Walker, Townsend & Wilkins.

With characteristic determination, Judge Bissell launched a new career in banking and accepted a post as senior vice president and general counsel of South Carolina National Bank. Then, in 1984, she was nominated by President Reagan to the U.S. Court of Appeals. She was the first woman from South Carolina to have been so honored.

It was my pleasure at that time to wholeheartedly support her nomination to this prestigious court. Her decisions as a member of the court of appeals were superbly judicious and sound, and she distinguished herself with grace and dignity on the bench.

Our State, Nation and Federal justice system, to which she rendered great service, have suffered a tremendous loss in the death of Judge Bissell. Though we will miss her sorely, the outstanding judicial legacy which she leaves behind will serve as a model of excellence for generations of upcoming young attorneys.

My wife Nancy joins me in extending our most sincere condolences to Judge Bissell's family, including her husband, Gregg C. Bissell; her stepson, Gregg C. Bissell, Jr.; her stepmother, Thelma Galloway; her brother, Robert S. Galloway, Jr.; and her sister, Lila G. McMillan.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles regarding Judge Bissell be printed in full following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Abbeville Press and Banner, Feb. 14, 1990]

JEAN GALLOWAY BISSELL

Jean Galloway Bissell died in Washington on February 4, 1990 and was buried in Due West on Wednesday, February 7 in the Due West Associate Reformed Presbyterian Cemetery. At the age of 53 she had already earned considerable fame and distinction.

Until struck by a terminal cancer a few months prior to her death Jean Galloway was in a prime position to become one of this county's most famed citizens; for several years there had been serious conjecture that she would be named to the United States Supreme Court. She was recognized as a lady with the capacity for such high office.

This native of Due West, the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Galloway, Sr., attended Erskine College, graduated from the University of South Carolina and received her law degree from that institution at the age of 20. She held several highly responsible positions and served, too, on the Erskine College Board of Trustees and Presidential Search Committee of the college.

It was in 1984 that she was appointed by President Ronald Reagan to the U.S. Court of Appeals, becoming the first South Carolina woman to be appointed a federal judge. U.S. Senator Strom Thurmond hailed her as an "able lawyer and a capable member of the federal court on which she served." . . . She distinguished herself with the fair and superb decisions she handed down as judge. She rendered our nation outstanding service, and I deeply regret her loss to the federal court system."

Judge Jean Galloway Bissell's death is a loss to the nation, to South Carolina, to Abbeville County and to Due West. Erskine College has lost a highly distinguished alumna and a true friend, a friend who continued to serve until her untimely death.

JUDGE JEAN G. BISSELL DIES OF CANCER AT 53

(By Bill Higgins)

Judge Jean Galloway Bissell of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit died of cancer Sunday in Washington, D.C., after a distinguished career as a lawyer, banking executive and jurist.

In her post in Washington, the 53-year-old judge heard cases involving patents, copyrights, the environment and civil tax appeals. Congress created the court in 1982 to hear appeals from federal courts in the Washington area. President Ronald Reagan named her to the court in 1984.

U.S. Sen. Strom Thurmond on Sunday called Judge Bissell "an able lawyer." Thurmond also said she was "a capable member of the federal court on which she served and distinguished herself with the fair and superb decisions she handed down as a judge. She rendered our nation outstanding service, and I deeply regret her loss to the federal court system.

"Mrs. Thurmond and I extend to her husband and the entire Galloway and Bissell families our deepest sympathy."

When appointed to the bench in 1984, Judge Bissell said, "When I got out of law school I thought that to sit on the U.S. Court of Appeals was the ultimate." The next year, she told a meeting of the South Carolina Bar that she missed South Carolina, but had tried to take a piece of it with her by filling her staff with law clerks who were University of South Carolina Law School graduates.

Before her appointment to the federal bench, she had been vice chairman and chief administrative officer of the South Carolina National Corp. and senior vice president and general counsel for South Carolina National Corp., and from 1982 to 1984 she was a director of South Carolina National Corp.

She had been chairman of the Corporate Counsel Committee of the American Bar Association and secretary to the South Carolina Commission on Continuing Lawyer Competence. She also had belonged to the Richard County, South Carolina and American bar associations.

She had served on the Columbia Philharmonic Orchestra Board, the Greater Columbia Community Relations Board, the state Chamber of Commerce executive committee and the S.C. Public Service Merit Selection Panel. She had been a trustee of Erskine College, the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church's General Synod, the Daniel Foundation, the S.C. Foundation of Independent Colleges, Heathwood Hall Episcopal School and the Governor's Mansion Foundation. She also had served on advisory councils at Furman University and Columbia College.

She had been a member of the S.C. State Library Advisory Council and the S.C. State Library Board, a trustee of the Greenville County Public Library and a trustee, treasurer and board chairman of the Richland County Public Library. She chaired the first Governor's Conference on Public Libraries, was chairman of the S.C. Library Association trustee section, received the association's Award for Distinguished Service in 1973 and received its first Friend of Libraries Award in 1976.

In Washington, she and her husband belonged to The City Tavern Club and she was a member of the Cosmos Club. They also were members of the Poinsett and Palmetto clubs in South Carolina.

Surviving are her husband, Gregg C. Bissell of Washington; and his son, Gregg C. Bissell Jr. of Columbia; a sister, Lila G. McMillan of Davidson, N.C.; and a brother, Robert S. Galloway Jr. of Greenville.

She was a member of Phi Beta Kappa and the Order of Wig and Robe and was associate editor and business manager of the South Carolina Law Review. She later received honorary degrees from Furman University and Converse College, and in 1985 she received USC's Algernon Sidney Sullivan Award.

In a 1985 alumna profile, she said, "Teaching, medicine and law were the three professions open to women when I entered college. I didn't want to be a teacher, but enjoyed my years as lecturer-in-law at the USC Law School (1971-78 and 1980-84) almost more than anything else I've done. I didn't like science enough to consider medicine, but my judgeship requires me to deal with scientific matters now, and I find them fascinating. My father (Robert S.) Galloway was in the Legislature, and my brother was a lawyer, so I decided law was the place for me."

Practicing corporate law from 1958 to 1971, she was an associate and later a partner in the firm of Haynsworth, Perry, Bryant, Marion & Johnstone in Greenville and from 1971 to 1976 was a partner in the firm of McKay, Sherrill, Walker, Townsend and Wilkins in Columbia.

In 1976, she became general counsel to the South Carolina National Bank and South Carolina National Bank. She was then the hghest-ranking female executive among the one hundred largest bank holding companies in the United States.

A Due West native, she attended Erskine College for two years. In 1956, she graduated magna cum laude with a bachelor's degree in business from the University of South Carolina. Two years later, she graduated first in her class and magna cum laude from the USC Law School.

Harris Funeral Home of Abbeville is in charge of the graveside service at 11 a.m. Wednesday in Due West Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church cemetery. Memorials may be made to Erskine College in Due West.

TRIBUTE TO H. CHAPMAN ROSE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to pay brief tribute to Mr. H. Chapman Rose, of Washington, DC, who died on February 17, 1990. Mr. Rose was a fine man and an able lawyer who served his nation with dedication in several capacities, and all those fortunate enough to have known and worked with Mr. Rose will mourn his passing. I valued highly the friendship of Mr. Rose, and I feel his loss personally.

Mr. Rose was a former national managing partner of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue in their Washington, DC office, and a former Assistant Secretary and Under Secretary of Treasury in the Eisenhower administration. His life and impressive accomplishments are examples of that which can be achieved when an exceptional individual's potential is tapped and fully applied. We will remember his many contributions for years to come.

My wife Nancy joins me in extending our deepest sympathy to the entire Rose family, including his wife, Katherine Cast Rose, and his fine son, Jonathan Chapman Rose, who I have had the pleasure of knowing and whose dedication, ability and public service I have greatly admired.

Mr. President, I ask that the following articles regarding Mr. Rose be printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

[From the Columbus Dispatch, Feb. 20, 1990]

NOTED OHIO LAWYER, EX-U.S. OFFICIAL DIES

H. Chapman Rose, a former Columbus resident who was undersecretary of the U.S. Treasury in the Eisenhower administration and founded the Washington office of an international law firm, died Saturday in Washington of respiratory failure. He was 83.

His professional life included assignments under a U.S. Supreme Court justice, a four-year Army career in which he served the undersecretary of war, and a lengthy private law practice with Jones, Day, Reavis and Pogue.

Rose, who was nicknamed "Chappie," is survived by his wife, Katherine Cast Rose, 82; a son, Jonathan Chapman Rose, 47; and a grandson, Benjamin Chapman Rose, 7, all of Washington.

After graduating from Princeton University, he received his law degree magna cum laude from Harvard University in 1931. He was the last law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes while Holmes was an active justice.

A year later, Rose placed first on the Ohio bar exam and became an associate with Tolles, Hogsett and Ginn, the predecessor of Jones, Day, Reavis and Pogue. He later became a partner and stayed with the firm until his commission into the Army in 1942.

He was first assigned to the office of the undersecretary of war and then to Army Service Forces in Washington. There he served with a group of 25 lawyers to assist the Army with the rapid defense mobilization necessary for World War II.

Rose was discharged from the Army as a colonel in 1946 and was awarded the Legion of Merit.

President Harry S. Truman appointed Rose director of the Office of Contract Settlement, where he served for one year before returning to private practice in 1947, founding the Washington office of Jones Day.

In 1953, Rose joined President Dwight D. Eisenhower's adminstration as assistant secretary of the Treasury for the Coast Guard, Customs and Secret Service under then Secretary George M. Humphrey. Rose was subsequently named undersecretary of the Treasury before resigning in 1956 to resume his partnership with Jones Day in Cleveland.

For the next two decades, Rose was active in Cleveland civic life and politics, including posts as president of the Cuyahoga County Bar Association, member of the Cuyahoga County Republican Finance Committee and former president of the 50 Club, an association of 50 Cleveland-area community leaders.

Rose increasingly centered his own practice in Washington, between 1976 and his retirement in 1983, and from 1974 to 1976 he was national managing partner of the firm. By 1990, Jones Day had grown to a firm with 17 offices around the world, including one in Columbus.

A memorial service will be held at St. John's Church in Washington on Friday, and another is being scheduled for Cleveland.

A private interment will be held at Greenlawn Cemetery in Columbus.

Memorial contributions may be made to the H. Chapman Rose Memorial Fund, c/o The Recording Secretary, Princeton University, Princeton, N.J., or to The Barbara Bush Foundation for Family Literacy in Washington.

FORMER TREASURY OFFICIAL H. CHAPMAN ROSE DIES AT 83

(By Richard Pearson)

H. Chapman Rose, 83, a former national managing partner of the law firm of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue who was a former assistant secretary and undersecretary of the Treasury in the Eisenhower administration, died Feb. 17 at Sibley Memorial Hospital. He had emphysema.

In 1932, Mr. Rose became as associate in a predecessor firm of Jones Day in Cleveland. Except for his years in government service, he practiced law there until 1976. From 1974 to 1976, he was national managing partner of Jones Day. He then returned to Washington, became a counsel to the firm, and retired altogether in 1983. The firm now has 17 offices in this country, Europe, the Far East, and the Middle East.

Mr. Rose first came to Washington in 1931 and spent a year as law clerk and secretary to Supreme Court Associate Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. He returned again during World War II, when he was an Army lawyer. He attained the rank of colonel and earned the Legion of Merit.

From 1946 to 1947, he was director of the Office of Contract Settlement. In that post, he helped coordinate and direct the policies of the various military services in winding up canceled was contracts. After that, he helped found Jones Day's Washington offices, then returned to Cleveland in 1949 as a partner.

During his years in Cleveland, he advised numerous corporate clients and served as counsel to the M.A. Hanna Co. Its chief, George M. Humphrey, became Dwight D. Eisenhower's first secretary of the Treasury.

The beginning of the Eisenhower administration, in 1953, saw Mr. Rose return to Washington as an assistant secretary of the Treasury. He did administrative work and supervised the Coast Guard, Customs Service, and Secret Service. In 1955, he was named Treasury undersecretary. He left government to return to the legal practice in 1956.

During his next two decades in Cleveland, he not only helped direct the expansion of his law firm but was highly active in city Republican, civic and charitable endeavors. He was president of the Cleveland Bar Association in 1970.

A friend of former President Richard M. Nixon, he served as tax lawyer and adviser to the president in the 1970s.

News profiles of the Ohio lawyer in the mid-1970s described him as a "quiet, effective, soft-spoken and highly intelligent" man and one who was the "epitome of the work ethic."

Mr. Rose, who was a native of Columbus, Ohio, was a 1928 graduate of Princeton University, where he majored in history, and a 1931 magna cum laude graduate of Harvard University law school. At Princeton, he was editor of the Daily Princetonian and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa.

He was a trustee or director of Princeton University, the International Economic Policy Association, the Brookings Institution, the Atlantic Council and Bacon-Dacor House. He was a member of the Metropolitan, Chevy Chase, and Burning Tree clubs.

Survivors include his wife of 51 years, Katherine Cast Rose of Washington; a son, Jonathan Chapman Rose of Alexandria; and a grandson.

B-2 TERMINATION BILL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, a month ago, I addressed the Senate to introduce the B-2 Termination bill. This legislation, S. 2009, would halt further funding for procurement of the B-2 aircraft beyond the 15 planes in various stages of production. It would permit us to continue research and development of the B-2, but would stop us from spending exhorbitant sums of money—almost $50 billion—to build more B-2's before this plane has been tested adequately.

Every day we seem to be learning more about the skyrocketing costs of the B-2. And, we are realizing how much we don't know about the capabilities of this aircraft. Just last week, the GAO issued two scathing reports about Air Force accounting procedures and the status of the B-2 Program. These reports revealed that deceptive budgeting practices have hidden the true costs of the B-2 Program. Design changes, manufacturing defects, underestimated material costs and production schedule extensions have increased—and will continue to increase—the overall cost of the B-2 Program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the GAO report on the status of the B-2 Program and the GAO's formal statement before the House Armed Services Committee on their findings be printed in the RECORD. I encourage my colleagues to examine these documents carefully.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE,
NATIONAL SECURITY AND INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS DIVISION,
Washington, DC, February 22, 1990.

B-224698.

Hon. LES ASPIN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This report was prepared as part of your request that we review the B-2 program. This is our first unclassified report on the B-2. As you know, before this year all aspects of the B-2 program were highly classified. Recent changes in the security classification of the program permit this unclassified report on the B-2's history and current cost, schedule, and test status. Information on performance remains classified and will be included in a separate report.

We are sending copies of this report to appropriate congressional committees; the Secretaries of Defense and the Air Force; the Director, Office of Management and Budget; and other interested parties.

This report was prepared under the direction of Nancy R. Kingsbury, Director, Air Force Issues, who may be reached on (202) 275-4268 if you or your staff have any questions concerning this report. Other major contributors to this report are listed in appendix I.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK C. CONAHAN,
Assistant Comptroller General.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

PURPOSE

The B-2 bomber is one of the most costly Department of Defense programs. Its high cost and highly classified nature have made it the subject of considerable controversy. Since 1986, GAO has issued five classified reports on the B-2 program. Recent changes in the security classification of the program permit this unclassified report on the program's history and current cost, schedule, and test status. This report contains information updated as necessary.

BACKGROUND

The B-2 has been in full-scale development since 1981. It is a flying wing aircraft with two crew members and provisions for a third. It has twin weapon bays and four engines and is designed to perform the traditional long-range bomber role for both nuclear and non-nuclear missions. The Air Force believes the B-2 has the greatest potential for a future capability against targets of uncertain locations, although concerns exist about the difficulties of locating movable targets.

The Air Force has been developing the B-2 while producing and deploying the B-1B bomber to modernize the aging B-52 bomber fleet. The B-2 is being developed to take advantage of low observable technologies, which, when combined with on-board avionics, are intended to allow penetration of current and postulated Soviet defenses.

In 1981 the Air Force estimated the cost to procure 133 B-2s—6 development aircraft and 127 production aircraft—would be $32.7 billion in 1981 dollars. In 1986 the Department of Defense announced the estimated cost would be $36.6 billion in 1981 dollars, which was equivalent to $58.2 billion in escalated dollars over the life of the B-2's procurement. This cost estimate and the related program schedule became the baseline from which subsequent budget and schedule changes are measured.

RESULTS IN BRIEF

The B-2 program's cost and schedule have changed significantly since 1986 and remain uncertain. The B-2 acquisition strategy includes cost and schedule projections that rely on very high annual funding levels and on ordering a large number of planes before the necessary testing to demonstrate that the B-2 can perform its mission is completed.

Since 1986 the B-2 cost estimate increased $12 billion, and the final B-2 delivery was extended 3 years to 1999. Future schedule changes and cost increases will occur if projected annual funding requirements are not appropriated or if planned program savings are not achieved.

The flight test program has just begun. If current schedules are met, it will be at least 3 years before critical performance requirements have been fully tested. That is the point in testing where problems are typically discovered. At that time, under the current schedule, over $48 billion would have been appropriated and 31 aircraft would have been ordered. In view of these uncertainties, as well as changing world conditions, GAO believes that alternative acquisition strategies should be considered.

Major design changes early in the B-2's development caused manufacturing difficulties that have contributed to a slower production schedule and labor cost increases. Contractors have reported improvements in productivity and reductions in manufacturing defects, but these improvements are less than anticipated. Also, further manufacturing improvements may be hindered by continuing design changes.

PRINCIPAL FINDINGS

Cost Estimate Increases:

In June 1989 the B-2 program was estimated to cost $70.2 billion, a $12 billion increase from the baseline estimate. The June 1989 estimate depends on achieving $6.2 billion in savings through a cost reduction initiatives program and multiyear procurement strategy. The amount of savings and the feasibility of achieving them are uncertain. If the projected savings are not realized, additional funding will be required, and the B-2 program's schedule may be extended.

Since 1986 B-2 estimated cost increases have been caused primarily by an incomplete aircraft design at the start of manufacturing, underestimated material costs, and production schedule extensions. The most recent increase, $2.6 billion, occurred between January and June 1989 and was primarily due to extending the schedule 1 year.

Funding Assumptions:

The current acquisition plan requires funding of $5.3 billion in fiscal year 1991 and $7.5 to $8 billion annually for fiscal years 1992 through 1995 to achieve the estimated program cost of $70.2 billion. If these funding levels are not achieved, the Air Force will have to delay or reduce the B-2's production program.

Program Schedule Changes:

The B-2 program schedule has changed each year since 1986. The latest change in June 1989 delayed both the first full production and multi-year procurement decisions by 1 year. It also extended the B-2 final deliveries from 1998 to 1999. The last B-2 delivery is now scheduled 3 years later than planned in the 1986 baseline estimate.

The Secretary of Defense approved this schedule extension because delays in completing the first aircraft delayed the start of flight testing. If the production schedule had not been extended, the concurrency in the program would have increased. The schedule extension maintained the previously planned relationship between flight testing and production.

Manufacturing Problems:

GAO reported in August 1988 that the contractors were encountering manufacturing problems, as evidenced by a large number of manufacturing defects, inefficient labor, and the transfer of work originally planned to be accomplished at the subcontractor plants to the final assembly site. These problems were caused in part because, to maintain schedule, manufacturing was started before the aircraft design was complete.

Manufacturing data collected in 1989 showed that the contractors are resolving some of these problems. The contractors are reporting they have reduced the number of manufacturing defects, improved worker efficiency, and transferred less work to the final assembly site. However, these improvements were less than anticipated.

As in the case of other programs, the contractors are initiating many changes to engineering drawings, which continue to disrupt the manufacturing process. Some of these changes require new parts, new tooling, and changes to the manufacturing plan, which hinder efforts to stabilize the manufacturing process.

B-2 Flight Test Program:

The B-2 flight test program began on July 17, 1989, with the first flight of the aircraft. To date, 1 percent of the flight test program has been completed. The program will likely continue into 1994. The pace of testing will increase as the remaining five development aircraft become available for testing.

The first 1½ years of flight testing is to demonstrate basic B-2 air worthiness and provide preliminary data on the low observable features of the aircraft. More critical operational testing, including integrated offensive and defensive avionics, where problems have frequently been discovered on other programs, is scheduled to begin in 1992.

MATTER FOR CONGRESSIONAL CONSIDERATION

There has been much debate on whether the Department of Defense can realistically expect to receive the funding levels projected by the Department for the B-2 program. Because of this and the fact that critical testing is several years away, the Congress may wish to require the Secretary of Defense to provide an analysis of alternative acquisition plans for the B-2 program, including various annual funding levels. This analysis woud provide the Congress with information on options for future funding decisions and their related impact on the B-2's cost and schedule.

AGENCY COMMENTS

GAO did not request official written comments on this report. However, GAO discussed a draft of this report with Department of Defense officials and incorporated their comments where appropriate.

CHAPTER 1: INTRODUCTION

The B-2 program has been in full-scale development since 1981. It is part of the Strategic Modernization Program, which was designed to modernize the strategic bomber forces by replacing the aging B-52 bomber fleet with B-1B and B-2 bombers. The B-2 is intended to be a long-range, multirole bomber capable of penetration at both low and high altitudes. It supports the Single Integrated Operational Plan [1] and various conventional missions.

The B-2 is a flying wing aircraft with two crew members and provisions for a third. It has twin weapons bays that provide up to 50,000 pounds total payload capacity. The actual payload carried by the B-2 will vary depending on the mission. It is powered by four turbofan engines that provide 19,000 pounds of thrust each. The B-2 design includes low observable technologies such as special shaping and radar absorbing materials, which are intended to reduce the radar cross section of the aircraft. These materials require new manufacturing technologies that are more challenging that the technologies of aluminum aircraft. Figure 1.1 shows the B-2 in flight.

Although concerns exist about the difficulties of locating movable targets, the Air Force believes the B-2 has the greatest potential for an enhanced capability against targets with uncertain locations because of its expected increased survivability compared to other aircraft.

BACKGROUND

The B-2 program is managed by the Air Force System Program Office, Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, Ohio. Northrop B-2 Division, Pico Rivera, California, is the prime contractor. Major subcontractors include Boeing and Vought, which manufacture separate sections of the B-2 at production facilities in Seattle, Washington, and Dallas, Texas, respectively. These aircraft sections are shipped to the B-2 final assembly site in Palmdale, California, where Northrop is responsible for the B-2 final assembly and systems integration. General Electric, Evendale, Ohio, manufactures the engines for the aircraft.

The Air Force plans to procure 133 B-2s: 6 development aircraft and 127 production aircraft. All but one of the development aircraft will be modified after the completion of the flight test program and used as operational aircraft. The Air Force plans to keep the other development aircraft available for future test purposes. In 1986 the Congress directed the Secretary of Defense to release its estimate of the program's cost. The estimate of $36.6 billion in 1981 dollars and the related schedule serve as a baseline for the B-2 program. Except where noted, all cost estimates in this report are expressed in then-year dollars, which include the estimated impact of inflation.

The first flight of the B-2 occurred on July 17, 1989, taking off from Air Force Plant 42 in Palmdale, California, and landing at Edwards Air Force Base, California. The aircraft has since flown seven more times. According to the Air Force, most of the objectives of the eight flights were accomplished, but the analysis of the data gathered is still underway.

OBJECTIVES, SCOPE, AND METHODOLOGY

In 1986 the Chairman, House Committee on Armed Services, requested that we review the B-2 program. Since that time we have issued five classified reports. Recent changes in the security classification of the B-2 program permit this unclassified report on the B-2 program's history and current cost, schedule, and test status. This report contains information from our prior classified reports that is now unclassified and updated as necessary.

We obtained information from records and officials at the B-2 System Program Office and the Northrop B-2 Division. In addition, we reviewed program data provided by the Office of the Secretary of Defense and Air Force Headquarters, Washington, D.C.; the Strategic Air Command, Omaha, Nebraska; the Air Force Plant Representatives Office, Pico Rivera, California; the Air Force Flight Test Center, Edwards Air Force Base, California; Hughes Radar Division, El Segundo, California; Boeing Advanced Systems Division, Seattle, Washington; and other classified organizations.

We performed our review in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards. We did not request written agency comments. However, we discussed a draft of this report with Department of Defense officials and incorporated their comments where appropriate.

CHAPTER 2. B-2 COST ESTIMATES FROM 1981 TO 1989

In 1981 the Air Force estimated the cost to procure 133 B-2s would be $32.7 billion in 1981 dollars. The Air Force based this and subsequent estimates through 1985 on development and production data for other aircraft. As the B-2 manufacturing process evolved, actual costs were used in the estimates, which caused them to increase.

In January 1986 the Department of Defense announced an estimate of $36.6 billion 1981 dollars. This estimate became the baseline to measure subsequent cost and schedule changes. In June 1989 the Secretary of Defense approved a new estimate of $43.8 billion in 1981 dollars.

These increases can be attributed primarily to design-related manufacturing difficulties, underestimated material costs, and changes to the production schedule. Manufacturing difficulties increased labor costs and delayed the delivery of the first aircraft. The Air Force extended the production schedule to reduce annual funding requirements and avoid increased program concurrency. The June 1989 estimate still contains optimistic funding assumptions that may cause further increases.

As program costs increased, the Congress directed the Air Force to identify ways to reduce costs through a cost reduction initiatives program. In June 1989 the Air Force estimated that $6.2 billion could be saved through the implementation of these initiatives and a multiyear procurement strategy. Some of the initiatives, however, are based on optimistic assumptions and are subject to change.

PROGRAM COST INCREASES

B-2 program cost estimates have increased since the 1986 baseline estimate, even though some increases were offset by projected savings from multiyear procurement and cost reduction initiatives. The estimate is now $43.8 billion in 1981 dollars, or $70.2 billion in then-year dollars, as shown in table 2.1.

TABLE 2.1.—AIR FORCE ESTIMATES OF B-2 ACQUISITION COSTS AND SAVINGS

The January 1986 estimate was based on a first flight date in December 1987 and delivery of the last aircraft in 1996. Increases in development costs in the January 1987 estimate were offset by lower estimates for production costs because of $1.5 billion in savings expected from multiyear procurement. This was the first estimate in which the Air Force assumed projected savings from multiyear procurement.

In January 1988 the Air Force revised its estimate to $67.8 billion. This increase reflected a 3-year extension of the program, with final aircraft delivery scheduled for 1999. This estimate was not approved by the Secretary of Defense, and the Air Force was directed to examine the program to identify ways to reduce the program's cost.

In January 1989 the program was estimated to cost $67.6 billion. This estimate was based on an accelerated schedule, with final aircraft delivery scheduled for 1998, and included $8.2 billion in potential savings from a cost reduction initiatives program. These potential savings lowered the estimate from $75.8 billion to $67.6 billion. In March 1989 we reported that the feasibility of some of these savings was uncertain.

In June 1989 the cost estimate increased to $70.2 billion. This increase was primarily due to extending the schedule 1 year, with final aircraft delivery scheduled for 1999. Expected savings from the cost reduction initiatives program were reduced to $6.2 billion.

We have been informed the Air Force revised the June 1989 estimate to reflect higher inflation rates, the impact of the labor strike at Boeing, and congressionally directed changes to the 1990 aircraft order schedule. As of February 9, 1990, the Department of Defense had not released a new estimate of B-2 program costs that reflected these factors.

CAUSES OF COST INCREASES

The B-2 program cost increases have been primarily caused by an incomplete aircraft design at the start of manufacturing, underestimated material costs for a composite aircraft, and production schedule extensions.

Incomplete Aircraft Design: In early 1981, before the full-scale development contract was awarded, the Air Force modified its requirements to include a low-altitude capability for the B-2. This change was made because the Air Force wanted the flexibility of a bomber that could fly at both high and low altitudes. The change forced Northrop to redesign its original B-2 airframe, adding additional control surfaces and improved structures to accommodate the stresses of low-altitude, high-speed flight. Northrop's efforts to redesign the airframe also delayed its efforts to complete the other aspects of the B-2's design. However, no change was made to the B-2's production schedule.

To meet its first flight deadline, the contractors started manufacturing the B-2 in January 1986, even though the aircraft design was not completed. In August 1988 we reported that problems caused by initiating manufacturing activities before the B-2 design was stabilized delayed the completion of the first development aircraft. Manufacturing personnel were receiving engineering drawings late or were not able to use existing drawings and thus forced to wait for new drawings and parts. As a result, manufacturing labor hours increased significantly. The incomplete B-2 design also led to parts shortages, tooling problems, and the transfer of manufacturing activities to the final B-2 assembly site.

Underestimated Material Costs: Material cost estimates have increased significantly since the 1986 baseline estimate. The Air Force used a cost estimating model in the 1986 estimate to predict B-2 material costs. The model was based on building an aluminum aircraft. Even though the Air Force attempted to compensate for the differences between building an aluminum aircraft and a composite B-2 structure, the model produced an estimate that was lower than the costs actually incurred.

Schedule Changes: Development costs increased as a result of changes in the production schedule. As the production schedule is delayed, and fewer aircraft are in process, more fixed costs are allocated to each aircraft. Production costs increase as the schedule is extended because the aircraft are produced over a longer period of time, increasing the fixed costs required to build the aircraft.

COST REDUCTION INITIATIVES PROGRAM

The fiscal year 1988 Defense Authorization Act required the Department of Defense to establish a B-2 cost, performance, and management initiatives program. In response, the Air Force developed a cost reduction initiatives program with a 10-percent cost reduction goal. The Air Force also developed the program due to the $10 billion increase in estimated program costs from the January 1987 to January 1988 estimates. B-2 contractors and the Air Force identified over 150 technical and management initiatives to reduce program costs such as increased multiyear procurement, reduced overhead rates, and production improvements.

Lower Estimate of Savings: In March 1989 we reported that the Air Force estimates of cost reduction savings were based on optimistic assumptions. Many of the initiatives were still being evaluated and subject to change. In addition, we stated that it was uncertain if and when the Congress would approve multiyear procurement. Estimated savings from multiyear procurement were $2.7 billion in January 1989.

Because of the schedule changes in June 1989, two cost reduction initiatives included in the January 1989 estimate were removed. The enhanced schedule initiative was estimated in 1988 to save $1.4 billion by completing the production program in 1998. This initiative had to be eliminated when the production program was extended to 1999. Also, the Air Force eliminated an initiative to save $500 million to reduce direct costs because the changes to the program schedule made it difficult to predict when and how direct costs could be reduced.

ANNUAL FUNDING REQUIREMENTS

Figure 2.1 shows the distribution of the June 1989 $70.2 billion estimate from fiscal year 1990 through the completion of the program. In fiscal year 1991, $5.3 billion is required. The peak funding requirements occur in fiscal years 1992 through 1995 and are $7.8, $8, $7.7, and $7.5 billion, respectively. Annual funding levels for fiscal years 1989 and before totaled $22.6 billion.

The B-2 annual appropriations to date have not exceeded approximately $5.2 billion. More importantly, there are indications that future funding will not grow to the peak levels required in fiscal years 1992 through 1995. For example, the Chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services stated during the fiscal year 1990 defense authorization hearings that ". . . it is a . . . certainty that the B-2 program will not be funded at the $7 billion to $8 billion level. . . ."

CONCLUSIONS

B-2 program costs have increased substantially since the 1986 baseline estimate. Manufacturing problems and schedule instability continue to contribute to cost increases. The current estimate assumes several successive years of funding levels of approximately $8 billion. This assumption is not consistent with recent appropriation experience. If these funding levels are not achieved, cost will increase and schedule changes may occur.

CHAPTER 3: PROGRAM SCHEDULE CHANGES

The January 1986 baseline schedule estimated that the final B-2 would be delivered in early 1996. The schedule approved by the Secretary of Defense in June 1989 estimated that the final B-2 would be delivered in mid-1999, over 3 years later than the date in the baseline schedule. The schedule change affects the overall procurement plan, such as when full-rate production and multiyear procurement are initiated. The schedule change also affects fixed-price options currently held by the prime contractor, subcontractor schedules, the quantity and timing of tooling purchases, and flight testing.

CHANGES TO B-2 SCHEDULE

The B-2 program schedule has changed each year since the 1986 baseline. For example, as shown in table 3.1, in the 1986 estimate all 127 production aircraft were planned to be ordered and 52 aircraft were planned to be delivered by 1993, but in the June 1989 estimate only 47 production aircraft, or 37 percent, were planned to be ordered and only 9 aircraft were planned to be delivered by that time.

CHANGES TO PROGRAM MILESTONES

The changes made to aircraft order and delivery schedules have changed program milestones. We used the 1986 schedule as a baseline to measure milestone changes. The first flight milestone was accomplished 19 months after originally scheduled. Other program milestones shown in figure 3.2 are projected to slip approximately 2 years. The third aircraft delivery milestone is important to the test program because this aircraft resembles the production aircraft more closely.

In addition, the required assets available milestone, which replaced the initial operational capability milestone and establishes the date that 15 aircraft have been delivered to the Strategic Air Command, has been delayed 37 months.

PROCUREMENT STRATEGY CHANGES

The June 1989 schedule changed the low-rate initial production, full-rate production, and multiyear procurement strategy. The full-rate production decision was delayed until 1991. This change added two aircraft to the low-rate production program and extended the last year of production orders from 1995 to 1996.

Although the Secretary of Defense approved a 1-year delay to the production program, concurrency between flight testing and production remained essentially the same because the changes were made to accommodate delays to the first flight.

OTHER SCHEDULE CHANGE IMPACTS

Schedule changes have affected previously negotiated fixed-price options for production aircraft subsystems delivery requirements, and contractor tooling requirements.

Fixed-price options between Northrop and various subcontractors for B-2 subsystems are affected by the aggressive schedule originally planned for the program. Northrop's full-scale development contracts with other subcontractors contain options for future purchase of B-2 components at fixed prices. These options were negotiated based on the earlier production schedule. As the production schedule is slowed, it places the fixed-price options at risk because the options cannot be exercised below a preestablished minimum production quantity. Northrop has estimated the cost of not exercising these options could be as high as $2.6 billion. We have not examined the assumptions on which this estimate was based.

Also, the new scheule affects the pace at which avionic subsystems are required, produced, and delivered for aircraft integration. The contractor is changing the manufacturing sequence of the B-2 radar and navigation subsystems based on funding availability rather than manufacturing requirements. Limited development funds combined with the availability of production funds have prompted the contractors, with the Air Force's approval, to manufacture production radar and navigation units before the delivery and testing of development units.

Contractor plans for the quantity and timing of tooling and facilities are also affected by schedule changes. For example, Boeing has stated that the monthly production rate of aircraft will determine the number of major assembly tools it will need to keep pace with the production schedule. It has estimated tooling needs based on 1.8, 2, and 3 aircraft per month. At a rate of three aircraft per month, Boeing's analysis indicates it may need at least three additional major assembly tools. Adding these tools may also affect facility requirements.

Flight Test Schedule: The Air Force has planned a 3,600-hour flight test program to demonstrate B-2 performance capabilities over approximately 4 years. This test program includes development and some initial operational test activities. To date, 1 percent of the flight hours in this test program have been completed. As development aircraft deliveries are delayed, the flight test programs must also be adjusted.

The Air Force planned to complete the test program in 1993. It now appears that the completion of testing could slip into 1994 as a result of delays in delivering the development aircraft. The first 1½ years of flight testing will be primarily to demonstrate basic flying qualities and provide preliminary data on the low observable features of the aircraft. Approximately 6 months of this time the aircraft will not be flown while planned modifications are made. The pace of testing will increase as the remaining five development aircraft become available during 1990 and 1991. More critical operation testing, including integrated offensive and defensive avionics, is scheduled to begin in 1992.

CONCLUSIONS

The B-2 program schedule has changed each year since 1986. These changes affect program milestones, the overall procurement strategy, and the test program. Schedule extensions also increase program cost estimates. Additional schedule changes will contribute to the instability and uncertainty that have characterized the B-2 program since 1986. Also, the flight test program has just begun. If current schedules are met, it will be at least 3 years before critical performance requirements are proven. In view of these uncertainties, as well as changing world conditions, we believe that alternative acquisition strategies should be considered.

MATTER FOR CONGRESSIONAL CONSIDERATION

There has been much debate on whether the Department of Defense can realistically expect to receive the funding levels it has projected for the B-2 program. Because of this and the fact that critical testing is several years away, the Congress may wish to require the Secretary of Defense to provide an analysis of alternative acquisition plans for the B-2 program, including various annual funding levels. This analysis would provide the Congress with information on options for future funding decisions and their related impact on the B-2's cost and schedule.

CHAPTER 4: MANUFACTURING TRENDS

We used several key indicators to measure the B-2's manufacturing status, such as the amount of work transferred to final assembly, defects, and manufacturing inefficiencies. These indicators show that in 1989 the manufacturing process had improved, but not as much as planned. Also, a large number of engineering changes continue to hinder manufacturing improvements.

Department of Defense officials told us that the manufacturing problems discussed in the following sections have been considered in making the $70.2 billion program cost estimate. The officials agreed, however, that continued inability to meet planned improvements and schedule milestones may cause further cost estimate increases.

WORK REQUIRED AT FINAL ASSEMBLY

We previously reported that the Air Force had authorized contractors to transfer manufacturing work planned to be completed at the Northrop, Boeing, and Vought factories to the final assembly site. The transfer occurred because the contractors were not able to accomplish their work and still maintain the scheduled delivery date of December 1987 for the first development aircraft. Despite the transfer of work, the first aircraft was not delivered until June 1989, 19 months late. The Air Force and the contractors believed that the amount of work transferred to the final assembly site would subside because the contractors would begin to achieve a more efficient manufacturing process with each aircraft delivered.

The contractors have reported a reduction in the amount of work transferred to final assembly, but not as much as planned. In September 1988 the Air Force extended the development schedule by 9 months to minimize the amount of work transfered to final assembly. This extension was designed to provide Northrop, Boeing, and Vought enough time to install various systems into major aircraft sections before they were shipped to final assembly. Despite this extension, plus an additional 5-month delay to the scheduled completion of the fifth and sixth development aircraft, the contractors are not expected to finish installing all planned systems before the sections are shipped to final assembly.

Work transferred from the contractors' factories to the final assembly site is inefficient because it forces workers to travel to the site to complete installation of the systems. This creates inefficiencies because more personnel are working on the aircraft at the same time, which makes the aircraft structure less accessible. Table 4.1 shows the change in the projected amount of work transferred to final assembly, expressed in standard hours,[2] between September 1988 and August 1989. The amount of work has decreased significantly between the second and third aircraft. Nevertheless, the contractors' August 1989 estimate of the amount of work transferred to final assembly for the first six development aircraft increased from the September 1988 estimate.

TABLE 4.1—NUMBERS OF HOURS OF WORK TRANSFERRED TO FINAL ASSEMBLY

Aircraft	September 1988 estimate	August 1989 estimate [1]

4	3,204	3,500
5	2,284	3,000

[1] The current estimate for the first aircraft is final.

[2] A standard hour is an engineering estimate of labor hours required to accomplish a task. Early in the development program, because of labor inefficiencies, it takes many actual labor hours to accomplish a standard hour of work.

MANUFACTURING DEFECTS

A manufacturing defect is a flaw on the aircraft that may result in extra work to correct the defect or replace the defective part. In 1988 we reported that the Air Force had projected the number of defects for the first 2 aircraft to be approximately 160,000.[3] These defects were largely attributable to improperly drilled holes and difficulties in sealing the fuel tank. Even though manufacturing defects are expected during the fabrication and assembly of an aircraft, the number of defects should decrease as the workers gain experience and the aircraft design stabilizes.

The Air Force currently projects 190,000 defects on the first two aircraft. Although the total for the first two aircraft is more than previously projected, the number is expected to decrease from approximately 110,000 on the first aircraft and 80,000 on the second to approximately 60,000 on the sixth aircraft.

The two major causes of defects to date relate to improperly drilled holes and Boeing's difficulty in meeting Northrop specifications for sealing the fuel tank in the wing section of the aircraft. This is the primary cause of Boeing's work being transferred to final assembly. Air Force officials have stated that this is a temporary problem that will not affect future aircraft.

However, as shown in figure 4.1, quality in the manufacturing process has not improved. Data from the program office show that the rate of defects per 1,000 hours of work is about the same for the third through the sixth development aircraft but is greater than the rate for the first and second aircraft.

LABOR INEFFICIENCIES

In August 1988 we reported that continuing design problems were causing labor inefficiencies that increased the amount of manufacturing time required to build the aircraft. The actual hours needed to complete the first aircraft significantly exceeded the contractors' estimates.

Air Force and contractor officials told us that as workers learn the manufacturing process, they would become more efficient and the difference between the planned and actual hours would decrease. Recent data indicate that even though the contractors are reporting using fewer hours to complete subsequent aircraft, they have not been able to reduce the difference between the planned and actual labor hours.

Table 4.2 compares the contractors' planned labor hours with the number of projected hours the Air Force estimates will be needed to assemble the major sections of the first three development aircraft. As indicated, the percent difference between the planned and projected labor hours is increasing.

TABLE 4.2—COMPARISON OF PLANNED AND ACTUAL LABOR HOURS

Aircraft	Planned hours	Actual hours	Percent difference
1	819,408	1,505,774	84
3	406,998	789,713	94

[3] The defect quantities discussed in this section do not include any defects incurred during final assembly.

CHANGES TO ENGINEERING DRAWINGS

Engineering drawings are critical to the manufacturing process because they are the basis for all parts, tooling, and manufacturing plans. When engineering drawings are released late, planning, parts, and tooling needed to fabricate and assemble the aircraft are delayed and the manufacturing process is disrupted, causing worker inefficiency and schedule delays.

The contractors originally expected to release all engineering drawings (approximately 8,400) by early 1986. As of March 1989, more than 20,000 had been released. In addition, changes to released engineering drawings were taking place at approximately 2,000 per month through early 1989. The contractors and Air Force officials have stated that they expect the number of drawings and changes to decrease as the third development aircraft nears completion in 1990.

As with manufacturing defects, engineering changes are expected in a development program, but the number of changes should decrease as the design matures. Air Force officials have stated that the current rate of changes is not unusual.

Manufacturing problems delayed the first flight of the B-2 aircraft by 19 months. These problems were caused by the initiation of manufacturing activities before the B-2 design was stablilized. This immature design led to parts shortages, tooling problems, and a transfer of manufacturing activities to final assembly. Because workers were receiving engineering drawings late or were not able to use existing drawings, they were forced to wait on new drawings and new parts. As a result, the number of labor hours required to build the aircraft increased significantly.

The contractors have reported some improvements in each of these areas. These improvements, however, are less than anticipated. Also, design stability, which is important to improving the manufacturing process, may be hindered by continuing changes to engineering drawings.

STATUS OF THE B-2 BOMBER PROGRAM

(Statement of Frank C. Conahan, Assistant Comptroller General)

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Panel: I am pleased to be here today to discuss the current status of the B-2 stealth bomber program. Today, in conjunction with this hearing, we are pleased to release an unclassified and updated report on the history and status of the B-2 program. In my testimony, I will briefly summarize our principal findings about the program, and offer some conclusions and observations drawn from our work.

THE B-2 BOMBER PROGRAM

The Air Force plans to procure a total of 133 B-2 aircraft: 6 development aircraft and 127 production aircraft. Through fiscal year 1990, the Congress has authorized production of the 6 development aircraft, and 10 production aircraft, and a total of $26.8 billion has been appropriated for the program. The President's fiscal year 1991 budget requests $5.3 billion for an additional five production aircraft, long-lead items for future aircraft, and continuing the development and testing programs.

One development aircraft has been delivered. Deliveries of the second and third aircraft are scheduled during the next year or so. Currently, the first aircraft is undergoing some planned modifications after completing some early air worthiness flight testing. Flight testing of this aircraft is scheduled to resume in April.

PROGRAM COST

In 1981 the Air Force estimated that the cost to procure 133 B-2s would be $32.7 billion in 1981 dollars. In 1986 the Department of Defense announced the estimated cost would be $36.6 billion in 1981 dollars, which was equivalent to $58.2 billion in escalated dollars over the life of the B-2's procurement. A June 1989 program cost estimate, which is the most recent official total program estimates available, puts the cost for the 133 B-2's at $70.2 billion. This estimate represents a net increase of $12 billion over the 1986 estimate: $18.2 billion in cost increases offset by $6.2 billion in estimated savings from projected productivity improvements and multiyear procurement. We have been told that a revised cost estimate is being considered by the Office of the Secretary of Defense, which includes additional costs from such changes as increased inflation rates, and the cost of the recent strike at The Boeing Company. We estimate that the changes will add another several billion dollars to the B-2's estimated cost.

The principal causes for the cost increases to date have been an incomplete aircraft design at the start of manufacturing, underestimated material costs for composite aircraft, and production schedule extensions.

In early 1981, the Air Force modified its requirements to include a low-altitude capability for the B-2. This change forced Northrop to redesign its original B-2 airframe, adding additional control surfaces and improved structures to accommodate the stresses of low-altitude high-speed flight. Northrop's redesign of the airframe also delayed its efforts to complete other aspects of the B-2 design. To meet its first flight deadline, the Air Force directed Northrop to begin manufacturing of the aircraft in 1986, even though the design was not completed. The incomplete B-2 design led to cost growth from significant increases in manufacturing labor hours, parts shortages, tooling problems, and the unintended and uneconomical transfer of manufacturing activities to the final B-2 assembly site.

The Air Force's earlier cost estimates were based on a cost estimating model drawn from experience in building aluminum airplanes. Even though efforts were made to adjust the estimate to reflect building with composites, the model produced an estimate that was significantly lower than the costs actually incurred. Manufacturing delays and other factors also caused significant scheduled delays, which in turn increased development and production costs. The June 1989 cost estimate reflected a 3-year delay in the final aircraft deliveries compared to the 1986 estimate.

B-2 PROGRAM FLIGHT TESTING AND PRODUCTION SCHEDULE

The Air Force planned a 3,600-hour flight test program to demonstrate B-2 performance capabilities over approximately 4 years, which began with the first flight of the aircraft on July 17, 1989. To date, 1 percent of the flight hours in this test program have been completed. Under the current schedule, the Air Force plans to complete development and initial operational testing in 1993. It now appears that the completion of testing could slip into 1994, as a result of delays in delivering the development aircraft.

The first 1½ years of flight testing will be primarily to demonstrate basic flying qualities, and to provide preliminary data on the low observable features of the aircraft. The aircraft will not be flown approximately 6 months of this time, so additional planned modifications can be made. The pace of testing will increase as the remaining five development aircraft become available during 1990 and 1991. If current schedules are met, it will be at least 3 years before critical performance testing, including integrated offensive and defensive avionics, is completed. It has been during this critical performance testing that significant performance problems have been discovered in other advanced weapon systems programs.

OBSERVATIONS

The B-2 program's cost and schedule remain uncertain. In addition, the current acquisition strategy requires funding of $7.5 to $8.0 billion for fiscal year 1992 through 1995. There has been much debate on whether the Department of Defense can realistically expect to receive these funding levels. Revisions to the program to accommodate more moderate annual funding levels will also result in cost increases, unless the proposed production quantity is reduced.

The B-2 is a radically new aircraft design, and there is much uncertainty about whether its critical performance characteristics will be proven. Even in programs in which the aircraft design is more traditional, such as the B-1 bomber, significant problems persist, which require continuing investment of unanticipated resources. Under the current acquisition plan, 31 aircraft will be on order and over $48 billion will have been appropriated before anyone knows whether the B-2 will do its job.

We believe that it would be prudent to reduce the pace of funding and production for the B-2, to limit up-front investment until the critical performance elements of the aircraft are adequately evaluated.

Northrop Corporation officials have recently argued to us that an interruption in production funding would result in significant additional costs to maintain production capability for the future. Given the current production aircraft on order and the delivery schedule, which contemplates delivery dates for these aircraft several years hence, it is unclear when or how these costs would occur. Moreover, some level of increased cost may very well be warranted until such time as sufficient information on the B-2's performance capabilities is available to support moving into full-scale production.

Given the continuing difficulties and uncertainties in the development of the aircraft, the changing world circumstances, and the questions raised about the feasibility of funding levels as high as the current program requires, the Secretary of Defense in our opinion should provide the Congress with an analysis of practical and realistic alternatives for the future acquisition of this program. This analysis would form a more useful basis for budget action than the current program provides.

This concludes my prepared statement, Mr. Chairman. I will be happy to answer any questions you may have, to the extent possible in this open forum. In addition to the information provided in the unclassified report we issued today, we will be providing further details on certain performance and testing issues in a classified form. If your questions address issues that we believe to be classified, we will be pleased to provide answers at a later date in that form.

Mr. CRANSTON. Support for the B-2 program is eroding. I am pleased to announce that already 11 Senators have joined Senator LEAHY and myself as cosponsors of the B-2 termination bill. I am confident that even more Senators will join us in this effort to halt further procurement funding for the B-2 program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following Senators be added to S. 2009 as cosponsors. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KOHL], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LIEBERMAN], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH].

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

Hearing none, morning business is closed.

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE ACT OF 1989

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1430) to enhance national and community service, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, in conferring with the manager, on behalf of the Democrats on this bill, I understand that the Republican manager will be on the floor shortly. When he arrives, it is my intention, when both managers are present, to offer an amendment to the volunteer service bill. Pending the arrival of the Senator from Utah who manages for the Republicans, my thought was to take a moment to explain the nature and purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, of course.

Mr. KENNEDY. I see the Senator from Utah here at the present time. Without losing his right to be recognized, will the Senator from Colorado permit us to at least offer the committee substitute?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, of course, I am happy to yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I appreciate the willingness of the Senator from Colorado to yield. We will do so just prior to the offering of the amendment, and then ask consent that it conform with the changes that have been made at the request of the administration. They had asked us to make some technical changes, which we have done, and we will now start to debate the bill.

I think we are familiar with the issues that will be brought forward, and the Senator from Utah and I are quite prepared to debate those. Then we will accommodate the Senator from Colorado. We are grateful for him bringing his amendment before the Senate at this time. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, it is not entirely clear to me, the extent to which, if any, this amendment will need to be redrafted to conform to the new version of the bill that has just been laid before us. What I think I will suggest is, if staff would look at that issue, I will go ahead and discuss the amendment while we work out the issue of where it belongs in the bill, simply a question of being sure that the denomination of it is correct.

Mr. President, Americans are generous people. We all know that, but on November 22 of last year, a Gallup poll was released which documented what I thought was a very significant and interesting thing. The poll found 7 to 10 adults contributed money to a charitable organization during the preceding 12 months and 6 out of 10 gave money to their church that was earmarked in some specific way for charitable activities. Altogether, during the 12 months preceding the publication of this poll, 85 percent of Americans gave money to an organized charity, 42 percent of adults did unpaid volunteer work of some sort during the preceding 12 months, and the average volunteer contributed 6 hours of time in the 30 days preceding the publication of the poll.

The author of the poll wrote the following:

Religious spirit apparently motivates much of America's charity, since church and synagogue members are the most involved in charitable activity. Almost half the church members did unpaid volunteer work in the past year, compared with only a third on non-members. Nine in ten members gave money to a charity, compared with only seven in ten non-members. Eight in ten members gave food, clothing or other property to a charitable organization, compared with two-thirds of non-members.

In 1988, Mr. President, Americans gave more than $100 dollars to charitable organizations. About 46 percent of the donations went to religious groups and 54 percent to organizations in the following categories: public/society benefit; arts, culture and humanities; health; education; human services; and "all other uses." But of the billions of dollars that went to religious organizations, almost half was spent on a wide variety of human service, health, arts, educational, and societal improvement activities.

The following quotation, which is taken from a comprehensive survey of American philanthropy sums up well:

Religion today not only retains its historical influence on philanthropic giving—to secular as well as religious-affiliated organizations—it also functions as the Nation's major provider of a host of human services to neighborhoods and communities.

The discovery came to light in a nationwide survey of religious activities and finances conducted by Gallup under the sponsorship of Independent Sector.

Mr. President, some of the findings of that survey I think would be of interest to my colleagues: Between 64 and 93 percent of the congregations provide or support such services as housing, day care, free or low-cost meals, medical care, health instruction, counseling, and programmatic assistance to the disabled, and aid to international service organizations.

Between 29 and 45 percent of the congregations support, in addition to the above, programs for civil rights and social justice, community development, arts instruction and performances, elementary and high school education, and neighborhood and environmental improvements.

Beyond financial and in-kind giving, things like food, clothing, community support, so on, about one-third of the congregations provide up to 24 volunteers per month, another third offers up to 54 volunteers a month, and most of the remaining one-third provides 6 or more volunteers each month. The millions of hours thus donated by nonclergy congregation members amount to several billion dollars.

Mr. President, the reason I draw this to the attention of my colleagues as we consider S. 1430 I think is fairly obvious. We want to be sure that in the adoption of this legislation, about which there is substantial controversy, that if it is to be enacted, that we do not do so in a way that discourages religious organizations from performing their charitable work which has long been the hallmark of churches and church organizations in this country.

My amendment simply attempts to protect religious organizations, first by ensuring that they are not discriminated against under the act and, second, by helping those religious organizations that do choose to participate in the programs to maintain their religious identity and moral climate.

Mr. President, as my colleagues would suspect, I have not brought this amendment up because of any abstract reason or for consideration of some theoretical concerns, because in fact the problems to which this amendment is addressed have risen on a number of occasions in existing programs. Surely, if we are going to go foward with a broader-based Government-sponsored volunteer program, we ought to start to applying the Hippocratic oath to voluntarism. First, we should do no harm. That is really what my amendment seeks to do.

Mr. President, S. 1430 prohibits any funds authorized for the school-based community service program, the Youth Service Corps and the national service demonstration program from being used "by program participants and program staff to give religious instruction, conduct worship services, or engage in any form of proselytization. The bill forbids a church to conduct a conservation corps program or human services corps program "unless such project does not involve any religious functions." S. 1430 is clear, therefore, in its prohibition of religious activities, but it is not so clear, Mr. President, about whether or not religious entities can participate in the programs authorized by this bill.

My amendment adds the phrase, "churches and other religious entities" at the appropriate places in the bill to make it clear that churches and other religious entities can receive funds under the act, subject to the prohibitions on religious activities. In one place in the bill the amendment adds the phrase "private sectarian and nonsectarian schools" to make it clear that private schools can also qualify for participation.

The first part of my amendment also changes the bill so that the prohibition on religious activity is consistent throughout the bill, that is, that no money under this act may be used by program participants and program staff for giving religious instruction, conducting worship services, or engaging in any form of proselytization.

My amendment is based upon the truth that churches and other religious organizations must be included in any of our attempts to address social problems, particularly if our attempts seek to draw on the strength and capacities of the private sector.

Mr. President, I think many of my colleagues will remember the Adolescent Family Life Act specifically authorized an integrated approach involving "family members, religious and charitable organizations, voluntary associations, and other groups in the private sector, as well as services provided by publicly sponsored initiatives."

This approach was given constitutional sanction in the case of Bowen versus Kendrick when the Supreme Court held that the religion-specific provisions of that act were not unconstitutional.

Mr. President, in the full version of my statement, I will include a portion of the majority opinion written by Justice Rehnquist.

The second part of my amendment, Mr. President, seeks to allow religious organizations to maintain at least in part their religious integrity even while they use Federal funds to help the Government achieve its secular goals. This portion of the amendment really is suggested by a problem which the Salvation Army encountered in dealing with the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Formerly, HUD regulations prohibited federally funded homeless programs from "displaying religious symbols or decorations" and a shelter in New Britain, CT, was told to return a grant of $9,635 because it refused to take down a painting of Jesus.

The Washington Times reported as follows:

> The painting showing Jesus in a long robe with outstretched arms hangs prominently to the right of the television set in the lounge of the Franklin Square men's shelter. A Federal regulator spotted it immediately during an inspection tour of the facility.

HUD's policy on shelters was changed last fall, and it now appears that the New Britain, CT, shelter can keep its picture of Jesus on its wall. However, this experience and others which have come to my attention, convince me that it would be wise for us to clarify Federal policy so that a similar episode will not arise in the future.

The amendment goes beyond pictures to allow voluntary prayers and hymns. It also allows a religious or religious-affiliated organization to "affirm or promote" moral tenets even if those tenets are based on religious precepts.

Subsection (b) of the amendment will allow religious organizations that choose to participate in programs authorized by S. 1430 to keep their religious identity and maintain a moral climate.

The third portion of my amendment, subsection (c) will allow a church to one, require that participants under S. 1430 adhere to its religious tenets; two, require that participants under S. 1430 adhere to rules forbidding the use of drugs and alcohol; and three, in choosing between two or more prospective participants, hire that applicant who is already involved on a regular basis in other church activities.

Mr. President, I think are familiar to my colleagues. They are taken directly from section 122(b) of S. 5, the Senate's version of the ABC child care bill which we passed on June 23, 1989. The first two provisions were contained in an amendment offered by Senator COATS and accepted by the measure's sponsors. I understand that the third provision was the product of negotiations between Senator DODD and a number of religious groups, including the U.S. Catholic Conference.

The Senate did not have a rollcall on the measures, but I believe there is little doubt this comprises the sense of the Senate and its intent.

Mr. President, that in brief is the purpose of my amendment. If I may consult a moment with staff as to whether or not we now have this in its correct form, I will be prepared to send it to the desk.

Mr. President, I am advised that as of this moment the substitute, which is evidently pending before us, is not available to us in text form, and, therefore, I inquire of the managers of this measure—I would be glad to offer the amendment and simply provide it be inserted at the correct point in the bill when the text becomes available or proceed in whatever manner they suggest.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, we appreciate the Senator's offer. The fact is we are trying to make technical changes. We just about have them done. We will file a substitute. But why do not we plan on doing that as soon as we can get that substitute?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I take it it is the manager's suggestion we defer for the time being. I am happy to do that.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Chair has polled the committee and I have been authorized by the committee to offer the committee modification of the committee substitute as a complete substitute, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding of the Chair that the Senator has been authorized by the committee to make this modification. Therefore, the Senator has the right to do so. The amendment is so modified.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified, is as follows:

> Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

Congress finds that—

(1) service to the community and the Nation is a responsibility of all citizens of the United States, regardless of the economic level or age of such citizens;

(2) citizens of the United States who become engaged in service at a young age will better understand the responsibilities of citizenship and continue to serve the community into adulthood;

(3) serving others builds self-esteem and teaches teamwork, decision making, and problem-solving;

(4) the 70,000,000 youth of the United States who are between the ages of 5 and 25 offer a powerful and largely untapped resource for community service;

(5) conservation corps and human service corps provide important benefits to participants and to the community;

(6) the Volunteers in Service to America Program (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "VISTA"), as established by title I of the Domestic Volunteer Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 4951 et seq.), is one of the most cost effective means of fighting poverty in the United States;

(7) the cost of higher education, loan indebtedness, and the high price of housing deter many young adults from volunteering for service programs that involve a substantial time commitment;

(8) older Americans, through the Older American Volunteer Programs (as established by title II of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 5001 et seq.)), provide 500,000,000 hours of service each year and are a vital force in addressing national problems;

(9) the VISTA and Older American Volunteer Programs have recently been expanded and are an important part of the national and community service effort of the United States;

(10) many Americans cannot participate in a full-time service program, but should have the option of part-time service; and

(11) a range of full-time and part-time national and community service opportunities should be made available to all citizens, particularly youth and older Americans.

SEC. 3. PURPOSES.

It is the purpose of this Act to—

(1) renew the ethic of civic responsibility in the United States;

(2) ask citizens of the United States, regardless of age or income, to engage in full-time or part-time service to the Nation;

(3) begin to call young people to serve in national service programs;

(4) enable young Americans to make a sustained commitment to national service by removing barriers to such service that have been created by high education costs, loan indebtedness, and the cost of housing;

(5) build on the existing organizational framework of Federal, State, and local programs and agencies to expand full-time and part-time service opportunities for all citizens, particularly youth and older Americans;

(6) involve participants in activities that would not otherwise be performed by employed workers; and

(7) generate 100,000,000 additional service hours each year to help meet human, educational, environmental, and public safety needs, particularly those needs relating to poverty.

TITLE I—NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE STATE GRANT PROGRAM

SEC. 102. AUTHORITY TO MAKE STATE GRANTS.

The Commission may, in accordance with the provisions of this title, make grants to States, or to local applicants, to enable such States or applicants to carry out national or community service programs under subtitle B, C, D or E.

Subtitle B—School and Community Based Service

SEC. 110. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "Service America, the Service to America Act of 1990".

SEC. 111. GENERAL AUTHORITY.

The Commission may make grants under section 102 to States or local applicants for the creation or expansion of service opportunities for students and out-of-school youth and to increase the number of community members, particularly senior citizens, who are volunteering in schools.

SEC. 112. LOCALITY APPLICATION.

If a State does not apply for assistance under this subtitle or if a State does not have an application approved under section 113, the Commission may make grants directly to local applicants. The Commission shall apply the criteria described in section 114 in evaluating such local applications.

SEC. 113. STATE APPLICATION.

To be eligible to receive a grant under this subtitle a State, acting through the State educational agency, shall prepare and submit, to the Commission, an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commission shall reasonably require, including a description of the manner in which—

(1) local applications will be ranked by the State according to the criteria described in section 114, and in a manner that ensures the equitable treatment of local applications submitted by both educational and non-educational institutions;

(2) service programs within the State will be coordinated;

(3) cooperative efforts among education institutions, local government agencies, community-based agencies, businesses, and State agencies to provide service opportunities, including those that involve the participation of urban, suburban, and rural youth working together, will be encouraged;

(4) economically and educationally disadvantaged youths, including individuals with handicapping conditions, youth with limited basic skills or learning disabilities, and youth who are in foster care, are assured of service opportunities;

(5) service programs that receive assistance under this subtitle will be evaluated;

(6) programs that receive assistance under this subtitle will serve urban and rural areas and any tribal areas that exist within such State;

(7) technical assistance and training will be provided to service programs within the State;

(8) non-Federal and other types of Federal assistance will be used to expand service opportunities for students and out-of-school youth; and

(9) information and outreach services will be disseminated and utilized to ensure the involvement of a broad range of organizations, particularly community-based organizations.

SEC. 114. LOCAL APPLICATIONS.

(a) APPLICATION REQUIRED.—

(1) PARTNERSHIP.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Any education institution, local government agency, community-based agency, or consortia thereof that desires to receive a grant—

(i) from a State that has received assistance under this subtitle; or

(ii) in the case of a State that does not apply for assistance under this subtitle or have an application approved under section 113, directly from the Commission; shall form a partnership consisting of one or more education institutions and one or more local government or community-based agencies.

(B) EXCEPTION.—The provisions of subparagraph (A) shall not apply if the applicant is—

(i) an education institution that intends to provide service opportunities solely within such education institution; or

(ii) an education institution that has formed a partnership with one or more private businesses to conduct a partnership program.

(2) CONTENT OF APPLICATION.—To be eligible to receive a grant under this subtitle, a partnership under paragraph (1) shall prepare and submit, to the State educational agency (or the Commission if paragraph (1)(A)(ii) applies), an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the State educational agency (or the Commission) shall reasonably require. Each such application shall—where service opportunities will be provided, stating that the program was jointly developed by the parties and that the program will be jointly executed by the parties;

(B) establish and specify the membership and role of an advisory committee that shall consist of representatives of community agencies, service recipients, youth serving agencies, youth, parents, teachers, administrators, school board members, labor, and business, one-half of which shall be selected by the community partner and one-half of which shall be selected by the education institution;

(C) describe the goals of the program which shall include goals that are quantifiable, measurable, and demonstrate any benefits that flow from the program to the participants and the community;

(D) describe the service opportunities to be provided under the program;

(E) describe the manner in which the participants in the program will be recruited, including any special efforts that will be utilized to recruit out-of-school youth with the assistance of community-based agencies;

(F) describe the manner in which participants in the program were or will be involved in the design and operation of the program;

(G) state the name, if available, qualifications, and responsibilities of the coordinator of the program assisted under this subtitle;

(H) describe the preservice and inservice training to be provided to supervisors and participants in the program;

(I) describe the manner in which exemplary service will be recognized;

(J) describe any potential resources that will permit continuation of the program, if needed, after the assistance received under this subtitle has ended;

(K) disclose whether the program plans include addressing basic skill needs and reducing illiteracy; and

(L) contain assurances that, prior to the placement of a participant, the program will consult with any local labor organization representing employees in the area who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such program.

(3) YOUTH COMMUNITY SERVICE PROGRAM.—If an applicant under this section intends to operate a youth community service program, such applicant, in addition to providing the information described in paragraph (2), shall include in the application required under such paragraph—

(A) a description of an age-appropriate learning component for participants in the program that shall include a chance for participants to reflect on service experiences and expected learning outcomes;

(B) a description of whether or not the participants will receive academic credit for participation in the program;

(C) a description of the target levels of students and out-of-school youth who will participate in the program and the target levels for the hours of service that such participants will provide individually and as a group;

(D) a description of the proportion of expected participants in the program who are educationally or economically disadvantaged, including participants with handicapping conditions;

(E) a description of the ages or grade levels of expected participants in the program;

(F) other relevant demographic information concerning such expected participants; and

(G) assurances that participants in the program will be provided with information concerning VISTA, the Peace Corps (as established by the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2501 et seq.)), chapter 30 of title 38, United States Code, chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, full-time Youth Service Corps and National Service programs receiving assistance under this title, and other service options and their benefits (such as student loan deferment and forgiveness) as appropriate.

(4) PARTNERSHIP PROGRAM.—If an applicant under this section intends to operate a partnership program, in addition to the information required to be included in the application under paragraph (2), such applicant shall describe the students who are to be assisted through such program, including the ages and grade levels of such students.

(b) APPROVAL.—

(1) YOUTH COMMUNITY SERVICE PROGRAMS.—The State educational agency, or the Commission if subsection (a)(1)(A)(ii) applies, shall approve applications submitted by entities under this section that intend to operate youth community service programs, only if such applications meet the applicable requirements of subsection (a) and describe programs that provide—

(A) an age-appropriate learning component to enable participants to reflect on service experiences;

(B) preservice and inservice training for both supervisors and participants involving representatives of the community where service opportunities will be provided; and

(C) evidence that participants in the program will make a sustained commitment to the service project.

(2) ADULT VOLUNTEER AND PARTNERSHIP PROGRAMS.—The State educational agency, or the Commission if subsection (a)(1)(A)(ii) applies, shall approve applications submitted by entities under this section that intend to operate adult volunteer and partnership programs, only if such applications meet the applicable requirements of subsection (a) and describe programs that provide—

(A) preservice and inservice training for both supervisors and adult volunteers in the program; and

(B) opportunities for adult volunteers in the program to work with at-risk children or their teachers.

(c) PRIORITY.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—In providing assistance under this subtitle, the State educational agency, or the Commission if subsection (a)(1)(A)(ii) applies, shall give priority to applications that contain a description—

(A) of programs that involve participants in the design and operation of the program;

(B) of programs that are in the greatest need of assistance, such as programs targeting low-income areas;

(C) of programs that involve individuals of different ages, races, sexes, ethnic groups, disabilities, and economic backgrounds serving together; and

(D) in the case of applicants that are educational institutions, of programs that are integrated into the academic program.

(2) ADULT VOLUNTEER AND PARTNERSHIP PROGRAM.—In the case of an adult volunteer and partnership program, the State educational agency, or the Commission if subsection (a)(1)(A)(ii) applies, shall give priority to applications that contain a description of programs—

(A) that involve older Americans or parents as adult volunteers;

(B) that involve a partnership between an educational institution and a private business in the community;

(C) that include a focus on drug and alcohol abuse prevention, school drop-out prevention, or nutrition; or

(D) that will improve basic skills and reduce illiteracy.

SEC. 115. LIMITATIONS ON USE.

(a) REQUIREMENT FOR LOCAL APPLICANTS.—Assistance provided under this subtitle shall not be used by a local applicant to pay in excess of—

(1) 80 percent of the costs of programs that receive assistance under this subtitle for the first year in which the applicant receives assistance under this subtitle; and

(2) 70 percent of the costs of programs that receive assistance under this subtitle for the second year in which the applicant receives assistance under this subtitle.

(b) PAYMENT BY LOCAL APPLICANT.—

(1) NON-FEDERAL SOURCES.—That portion of the costs of programs that receive assistance under this subtitle that are to be paid by a local applicant from sources other than Federal funds may be paid in cash or in kind (fairly evaluated).

(2) PRIVATE PROFITMAKING ORGANIZATIONS.—If that portion of the costs of programs that receive assistance under this subtitle to be paid by a local applicant from sources other than Federal funds are paid by private profitmaking organizations, subsection (a) shall be applied by substituting—

(A) "85 percent" for "80 percent"; and

(B) "75 percent" for "70 percent".

SEC. 116. USE OF FUNDS.

(a) STATES.—

(1) ADMINISTRATION.—A State shall use not to exceed 20 percent of the amounts provided under this subtitle in each fiscal year for costs associated with administration, including training, technical assistance, curriculum development, and coordination activities.

(2) ADULT VOLUNTEER AND PARTNERSHIP PROGRAMS.—A State shall use not to exceed 10 percent of the amounts provided under this subtitle in each fiscal year to carry out adult volunteer and partnership programs.

(b) LOCAL APPLICANTS.—Local applicants may use assistance provided under this subtitle for supervision of participants, program administration, training, reasonable transportation costs, insurance, and other reasonable expenses.

(c) STIPENDS.—Assistance provided under this subtitle shall not be used to pay any stipend, allowance, or other financial support to any participant except to reimburse such participant for costs associated with transportation, meals, and other reasonable out-of-pocket expenses incident to participation in a program assisted under this subtitle.

Subtitle C—American Conservation and Youth Corps

SEC. 120. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "American Conservation and Youth Service Corps Act of 1990".

SEC. 121. GENERAL AUTHORITY.

The Commission may make grants under section 102 to States or local applicants, to the Secretary of Agriculture, to the Secretary of the Interior, or to the Director of ACTION for the creation or expansion of full-time or summer youth service corps programs.

SEC. 122. ALLOCATION OF FUNDS.

(a) COMPETITIVE GRANT.—The Commission shall award grants under this subtitle on a competitive basis to States or Indian tribes that have submitted applications under section 123.

(b) DIRECT GRANTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a State that does not apply for a grant under this subtitle or have an application approved under section 123, the Commission may award grants directly to public or private nonprofit agencies within such State.

(2) EVALUATION.—The Commission shall apply the criteria described in section 123 in determining whether to award a grant to such local applicants.

(c) LIMITATION.—

(1) CAPITAL EQUIPMENT.—Not to exceed 10 percent of the amount of assistance made available to a program agency under this subtitle shall be used for the purchase of major capital equipment.

(2) ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES.—Not to exceed 15 percent of the amount of assistance made available to a program agency under this subtitle shall be used for administrative expenses.

SEC. 123. STATE APPLICATION.

(a) SUBMISSION.—To be eligible to receive a grant under this subtitle, a State or Indian tribe (or a local applicant if section 122(b) applies) shall prepare and submit, to the Commission, an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commission may reasonably require, including the information required under subsection (b).

(b) GENERAL CONTENT.—An application submitted under subsection (a) shall describe—

(1) any youth service corps program proposed to be conducted directly by such applicant with assistance provided under this subtitle; and

(2) any grant program proposed to be conducted by such State with assistance provided under this subtitle for the benefit of entities within such State.

(c) SPECIFIC CONTENT.—To receive a grant under this subtitle to directly conduct a youth service corps program, each applicant shall include in the application submitted under subsection (a)—

(1) a comprehensive description of the objectives and performance goals for the program to be conducted, a plan for managing and funding the program, and a description of the types of projects to be carried out, including a description of the types and duration of training and work experience to be provided by such program;

(2) a plan for the certification of the training skills acquired by participants and the awarding of academic credit to participants for competencies developed through training programs or work experience obtained under this subtitle;

(3) an age appropriate learning component for participants that includes procedures that permit participants to reflect on service experiences;

(4) an estimate of the number of participants and crew leaders necessary for the proposed program, the length of time that the services of such participants and crew leaders will be required, the support services that will be required for such participants and crew leaders, and a plan for recruiting such participants, including educationally and economically disadvantaged youth, youth with limited basic skills or learning disabilities, youth with handicapped conditions, and youth who are in foster care;

(5) a list of requirements to be imposed on the sponsoring organizations of participants in the program, including a requirement that a sponsoring organization that invests in a program that receives assistance under this subtitle, by making a cash contribution or by providing free training to participants, shall be given preference over a sponsoring organization that does not make such an investment;

(6) a description of the manner of appointment and training of sufficient supervisory staff (including participants who have displayed exceptional leadership qualities), who shall provide for other central elements of a youth corps, such as crew structure and a youth development component;

(7) a description of a plan to ensure the on-site presence of knowledgeable and competent supervisory personnel at program facilities;

(8) a description of the facilities, quarters and board (in the case of residential facilities), limited and emergency medical care, transportation from administrative facilities to work sites, and other appropriate services, supplies, and equipment that will be provided by such applicant;

(9) a description of the basic standards of work requirements, health, nutrition, sanitation, and safety, and the manner that such standards shall be enforced;

(10) a description of the plan to assign participants to facilities as near to the homes of such participants as is reasonable and practicable;

(11) an assurance that, prior to the placement of a participant under this subtitle, the program agency will consult with any local labor organization representing employees in the area who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such program; and

(12) such other information as the Commission shall require.

(d) GRANT PROGRAM.—To be eligible to receive a grant under this subtitle, a State shall establish and implement a program to make grants to applicants within the State pursuant to subsection (b)(2) and, in the application submitted under subsection (a), such State shall describe the manner in which—

(1) local applicants will be evaluated;

(2) service programs within the State will be coordinated;

(3) economically and educationally disadvantaged youth, including youth with handicapping conditions, youth with limited basic skills or learning disabilities, and youth in foster care, will be recruited;

(4) programs that receive assistance under this subtitle will be evaluated;

(5) the State will encourage cooperation among programs that receive assistance under this subtitle and the appropriate State job training coordinating council established under the Job Training and Partnership Act (29 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.);

(6) such State will certify the training skills acquired by each participant and the credit provided to each participant for competencies developed through training programs or work experience obtained under programs that receive assistance under this subtitle; and

(7) prior to the placement of a participant under this subtitle, the State will ensure that program agencies consult with each local labor organization representing employees in the area who are engaged in the same or similar work as the work that is proposed to be carried out by such program.

SEC. 124. FOCUS OF PROGRAMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Programs that receive assistance under this subtitle may carry out activities that—

(1) in the case of conservation corps programs, focus on—

(A) conservation, rehabilitation, and the improvement of wildlife habitat, rangelands, parks, and recreational areas;

(B) urban revitalization, historical and cultural site preservation, rural revitalization, and reforestation of both urban and rural areas;

(C) fish culture, wildlife habitat maintenance and improvement, and other fishery assistance;

(D) road and trail maintenance and improvement;

(E) erosion, flood, drought, and storm damage assistance and controls;

(F) stream, lake, waterfront harbor, and port improvement;

(G) wetlands protection and pollution control;

(H) insect, disease, rodent, and fire prevention and control;

(I) the improvement of abandoned railroad beds and rights-of-way;

(J) energy conservation projects, renewable resource enhancement, and recovery of biomass;

(K) reclamation and improvement of strip-mined land;

(L) forestry, nursery, and cultural operations; and

(M) making public facilities accessible to individuals with disabilities.

(2) in the case of human services corps programs, include participant service in—

(A) State, local, and regional governmental agencies;

(B) nursing homes, hospices, senior centers, hospitals, local libraries, parks, recreational facilities, day care centers, programs serving individuals with handicapped conditions, and schools;

(C) law enforcement agencies, and penal and probation systems;

(D) private nonprofit organizations that primarily focus on social service;

(E) activities that focus on the rehabilitation or improvement of public facilities, neighborhood improvements, literacy training that benefits educationally disadvantaged individuals, weatherization of and basic repairs to low-income housing, energy conservation (including solar energy techniques), removal of architectural barriers to access by handicapped individuals to public facilities, and conservation, maintenance, or restoration of natural resources on publicly held lands; and

(F) any other nonpartisan civic activities and services that the Commission determines to be of a substantial social benefit in meeting unmet human, educational, or environmental needs (particularly needs related to poverty) or in the community where volunteer service is to be performed; or

(3) encompass the focuses and services described in both paragraphs (1) and (2).

(b) INELIGIBLE SERVICE CATEGORIES.—To be eligible to receive assistance under this subtitle, the activities conducted through programs referred to in subsection (a) shall not be conducted by any—

(1) business organized for profit;

(2) labor union;

(3) partisan political organization;

(4) organization engaged in religious activities, unless such activities do not involve any religious functions; or

(5) domestic or personal service company or organization.

(c) LIMITATION ON SERVICE.—No participant shall perform services in any project for more than a 1-year period.

SEC. 125. RELATED PROGRAMS.

An activity administered under the authority of the Secretary of Health and Human Services, that is operated for the same purpose as a program eligible to be carried out under this subtitle, is encouraged to use services available under this subtitle.

SEC. 126. PUBLIC LANDS OR INDIAN LANDS.

(a) LIMITATION.—To be eligible to receive assistance through a grant provided under this subtitle, a program shall carry out activities on public lands or Indian lands, or result in a public benefit.

(b) REVIEW OF APPLICATIONS.—In reviewing applications submitted under section 123 that propose programs or projects to be carried out on public lands or Indian lands, the Commission shall consult with the Secretary of the Interior.

(c) CONSISTENCY.—A program carried out with assistance provided under this subtitle for conservation, rehabilitation, or improvement of any public lands or Indian lands shall be consistent with—

(1) the provisions of law and policies relating to the management and administration of such lands, and all other applicable provisions of law; and

(2) all management, operational, and other plans and documents that govern the administration of such lands.

(d) RESERVATION.—The Commission shall reserve not to exceed 5 percent of the amounts appropriated in each fiscal year under section 401(a)(2) to make grants under this subtitle for Federal disaster relief programs.

SEC. 127. TRAINING AND EDUCATION SERVICES.

(a) ASSESSMENT OF SKILLS.—Each program agency shall assess the educational level of participants at the time of their entrance into the program, using any available records or simplified assessment means or methodology and shall, where appropriate, refer such participants for testing for specific learning disabilities.

(b) ENHANCEMENT OF SKILLS.—Each program agency shall, through the programs and activities administered under this subtitle, enhance the educational skills of participants.

(c) PROVISION OF PRE-SERVICE AND IN-SERVICE TRAINING AND EDUCATION.—

(1) REQUIREMENT.—Each program agency shall use not less than 10 percent of the assistance made available to such agency under this subtitle in each fiscal year to provide pre-service and in-service training and educational materials and services for participants in such a program. Program participants shall be provided with information concerning the benefits to the community that result from the activities undertaken by such participants.

(2) AGREEMENTS FOR ACADEMIC STUDY.—A program agency may enter into arrangements with academic institutions or education providers, including—

(A) local education agencies;

(B) community colleges;

(C) 4-year colleges;

(D) area vocational-technical schools; and

(E) community based organizations;

to evaluate the basic skills of participants and to make academic study available to participants to enable such participants to upgrade literacy skills, to obtain high school diplomas or the equivalent of such diplomas, to obtain college degrees, or to enhance employable skills.

(3) COUNSELING.—Career and educational guidance and counseling shall be provided to a participant during a period of in-service training as described in this subsection.

(4) PRIORITY FOR PARTICIPANTS WITHOUT HIGH SCHOOL DIPLOMAS.—A program agency shall give priority to participants who have not obtained a high school diploma or the equivalent of such diploma, in providing services under this subsection.

(d) POST-SERVICE EDUCATION AND TRAINING ASSISTANCE.—

(1) USE OF FUNDS.—A program that receives assistance under this subtitle shall use not less than 10 percent of such assistance to comply with the requirements of section 131 for post-service education and training assistance.

(2) ACTIVITIES.—The activities conducted under this section may include activities available to an eligible participant under in-service education and training assistance programs, career and vocational counseling, assistance in entering a program under the Job Training Partnership Act (29 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.), and assistance for other activities considered appropriate for such participant by the appropriate program agency and the Commission.

(e) STANDARDS AND PROCEDURES.—

(1) CONSISTENCY WITH STATE AND LOCAL REQUIREMENTS.—Appropriate State and local officials shall certify that standards and procedures with respect to the awarding of academic credit and the certification of educational attainment in programs conducted under subsection (c) are consistent with the requirements of applicable State and local law and regulations.

(2) ACADEMIC STANDARDS.—The standards and procedures described in paragraph (1) shall provide that an individual serving in a program that receives assistance under this subtitle—

(A) who is not a high school graduate, participate in an educational curriculum so that such individual can earn a high school diploma or the equivalent of such diploma; and

(B) may arrange to receive academic credit in recognition of the education and skills obtained from service satisfactorily completed.

SEC. 128. AMOUNT OF AWARD.

In determining the amount of a grant to be awarded to an applicant under this subtitle, the Commission shall consider—

(1) the number of the unemployed youth population of the area to be served; and

(2) the type of project or service proposed to be carried out with the amounts appropriated under section 401(a)(2).

SEC. 129. PREFERENCE FOR CERTAIN PROJECTS.

In the consideration of applications submitted under section 123, the Commission shall give preference to programs that—

(1) will provide long-term benefits to the public;

(2) will instill a work ethic and a sense of public service in the participants;

(3) will be labor intensive, and involve youth operating in crews;

(4) can be planned and initiated promptly; and

(5) will enhance skills development and educational level and opportunities for the participants.

SEC. 130. AGE AND CITIZENSHIP CRITERIA FOR ENROLLMENT.

Enrollment in programs that receive assistance under this subtitle shall be limited to individuals who, at the time of enrollment, are—

(1) not less than 16 years nor more than 25 years of age, except that summer programs may include individuals not less than 15 years nor more than 21 years of age at the time of the enrollment of such individuals; and

(2) citizens or nationals of the United States (including those citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Republic of the Marshall Islands, and Palau) or lawful permanent resident aliens of the United States.

SEC. 131. POST-SERVICE BENEFITS.

The program agency shall provide post-service education and training benefits (such as scholarships and grants) for each participant in an amount that is not in excess of $100 per week, or in excess of $5,000 per year, whichever is less.

SEC. 132. LIVING ALLOWANCE.

(a) FULL-TIME SERVICE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—From assistance provided under this subtitle, each participant in a full-time youth service corps program that receives assistance under this subtitle shall receive a living allowance of not more than an amount equal to 100 percent of the poverty line for a family of two (as defined in section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)).

(2) NON-FEDERAL SOURCES.—Notwithstanding paragraph (1), a program agency may provide participants with additional amounts that are made available from non-Federal sources.

(b) REDUCTION IN EXISTING PROGRAM BENEFITS.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to require a program in existence on the date of enactment of this Act to decrease any stipends, salaries, or living allowances provided to participants under such program.

(c) HEALTH INSURANCE.—In addition to the living allowance provided under subsection (a), program agencies are encouraged to provide health insurance to each participant in a full-time youth service corps program who does not otherwise have access to health insurance.

(d) FACILITIES, SERVICES, AND SUPPLIES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The program agency may deduct, from amounts provided under subsections (a) and (c) to a participant, a reasonable portion of the costs of the rates for any room and board that is provided for such participant at a residential facility.

(2) EVALUATION.—The program agency shall establish the amount of the deductions and rates under paragraph (1) after evaluating the costs of providing such room and board to the participant.

(3) DUTIES OF PROGRAM AGENCY.—A program agency may provide facilities, quarters, and board and shall provide limited and emergency medical care, transportation from administrative facilities to work sites, and other appropriate services, supplies, and equipment to each participant.

(e) GUIDANCE AND PLACEMENT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Each program agency shall provide such job and educational guidance and placement information and assistance for each participant as may be necessary, including referrals of such participants to organizations where such participants may receive basic skills training or be tested and receive services for specific learning disabilities.

(2) COORDINATION WITH OTHER ENTITIES.—Assistance under paragraph (1) shall be provided in coordination with appropriate State, local, and private agencies and organizations.

SEC. 133. JOINT PROGRAMS.

(a) DEVELOPMENT.—The Commission may develop, in cooperation with the heads of other Federal agencies, regulations designed to permit, where appropriate, joint programs in which activities supported with assistance made available under this subtitle are coordinated with activities supported with assistance made available under programs administered by the heads of such agencies (including the Job Training Partnership Act (29 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.)).

(b) STANDARDS.—Regulations promulgated under subsection (a) shall establish standards for the approval of joint programs that meet both the purposes of this title and the purposes of such statutes under which assistance is made available to support such projects.

SEC. 134. FEDERAL AND STATE EMPLOYEE STATUS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Participants and crew leaders shall be responsible to, or be the responsibility of, the program agency administering the program on which such participants, crew leaders, and volunteers work.

(b) NON-FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this subsection, a participant or crew leader in a program that receives assistance under this subtitle shall not be considered a Federal employee and shall not be subject to the provisions of law relating to Federal employment.

(2) WORK-RELATED INJURY.—For purposes of subchapter I of chapter 81 of title 5, United States Code, relating to the compensation of Federal employees for work injuries, a participant or crew leader serving in a program that receives assistance under this subtitle shall be considered an employee of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in section 8101 of title 5, United States Code, and the provision of that subchapter shall apply, except—

(A) the term "performance of duty", as used in such subchapter, shall not include an act of a participant or crew leader while absent from the assigned post of duty of such participant or crew leader, except while participating in an activity authorized by or under the direction and supervision of a program agency (including an activity while on pass or during travel to or from such post of duty); and

(B) compensation for disability shall not begin to accrue until the day following the date that the employment of the injured participant or crew leader is terminated.

(3) TORT CLAIMS PROCEDURE.—For purposes of chapter 171 of title 28, United States Code, relating to tort claims procedure, a participant or crew leaders assigned to a youth service corps program shall be considered an employee of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee of the government" as defined in section 2671 of such title.

(4) ALLOWANCE FOR QUARTERS.—For purposes of section 5911 of title 5, United States Code, relating to allowances for quarters, a participant or crew leader shall be considered an employee of the United States within the meaning of the term "employee" as defined in paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of such section.

Subtitle D—National and Community Service

SEC. 140. SHORT TITLE.

This subtitle may be cited as the "National and Community Service Act".

SEC. 141. GENERAL AUTHORITY.

The Commission may make grants under section 102 to States for the creation of full- and part-time national and community service programs.

SEC. 142. GRANTS.

(a) TERM OF GRANT.—The term of a grant awarded under section 141 shall not extend beyond September 30, 1991.

(b) CRITERIA FOR RECEIVING APPLICATIONS.—In determining whether to award a grant to a State under section 141, the Commission shall consider—

(1) the ability of the proposed program of such State to serve as an effective model for a large-scale national service program;

(2) the quality of the application of such State, including the plan of such State for training, recruitment, placement, and data collection;

(3) the extent that the proposed program builds on existing programs; and

(4) the expediency with which the State proposes to make the program operational.

(c) DIVERSITY.—The Commission shall ensure that programs receiving assistance under this subtitle are geographically diverse and include programs in both urban and rural States.

(d) ALTERNATIVE VOUCHER OPTION LIMITED.—The Commission shall ensure that not to exceed 25 percent of States receiving a grant under section 141 are authorized to exercise the alternative voucher authorized under section 146(e)(3).

(e) COMPOSITION OF PROGRAMS.—The Commission shall ensure that not less than 25 percent of the programs that receive assistance under this subtitle include full-time, part-time and special senior service participants.

(f) STATE APPLICATION FOR GRANT.—To receive a grant under section 141, a State shall prepare and submit, to the Commission, an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commission may reasonably require, including—

(1) a description of the State administrative plan for the implementation of a program with assistance provided under this subtitle, including such functions, if any, that will be carried out by public and private nonprofit organizations pursuant to a grant or contract;

(2) a description of the manner in which an ethnically and economically diverse group of participants, including economically and educationally disadvantaged individuals, college-bound youth, individuals with handicapping conditions, youth in foster care, and employed individuals, shall be recruited and selected for participation in a program receiving assistance under this subtitle;

(3) a description of the procedures for training supervisors and participants and for supervising and organizing participants in such program;

(4) a description of the procedures to ensure that the program provides participants with an opportunity to reflect on their service experience;

(5) a description of the geographical areas within such State in which the program would be operated to provide the optimum match between the need for services and the anticipated supply of participants;

(6) a description of the plan for placing such participants in teams or making individual placements in such program;

(7) assurances that, prior to such placement, the State will consult with any local labor organization representing employees in the area who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such program;

(8) assurances that, prior to such placement, such State will consult with employees at the proposed project site who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such program;

(9) a description of the anticipated number of full- and part-time participants and special senior service members in such program;

(10) a plan for the recruitment and selection of sponsoring organizations that will receive participants under programs that receive assistance under this subtitle;

(11) a description of the procedures for matching such participants with such sponsoring organizations;

(12) a description of the procedures to be used to assure that sponsoring organizations that are not matched with participants shall be provided with information concerning the VISTA program and the programs established under title II of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 5001 et seq.);

(13) the State budget for the program;

(14) a description of whether the State desires to exercise the voucher alternative option authorized under section 146(e)(3);

(15) a plan for evaluating the program and assurances that such State will fully cooperate with any evaluation undertaken by the Commission pursuant to section 178; and

(16) any other information as the Commission may reasonably require.

(g) NUMBER OF STATES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Commission shall ensure that not more than five States are authorized to operate full-time programs and not more than five States are authorized to operate part-time programs in fiscal year 1991 under this subtitle.

(2) SINGLE PROGRAM.—For purposes of this paragraph (1), a State operating a single national service program with both full- and part-time options shall be counted as a State operating a full-time program and a State operating a part-time program.

(3) COOPERATIVE ARRANGEMENT.—For purposes of this paragraph (1), a State operating a national service program involving a cooperative arrangement with a multi-State organization or with sites in more than one State shall be counted as a single State.

SEC. 143. TYPES OF NATIONAL SERVICE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—A participant in a program that receives assistance under this subtitle shall perform national service to meet unmet educational, human, environmental, and public safety needs, especially those needs relating to poverty.

(b) TYPES OF NATIONAL SERVICE.—National service performed under subsection (a) may include—

(1) educational service, such as service in literacy programs, the Head Start program (as established under the Head Start Act (42 U.S.C. 9831)) and other early childhood education programs, tutorial assistance, and service in schools, libraries, and adult education centers;

(2) human service, such as—

(A) service in hospitals, hospices, clinics, community health centers, public health organizations, facilities serving individuals with acquired immune deficiency syndrome, homes for elderly individuals, programs serving individuals with handicapping conditions, and child-care programs; and

(B) service in programs to assist elderly, disabled, poor, and homeless individuals, including programs to build, restore, and maintain housing for poor or homeless individuals and self-help programs;

(3) environmental service, such as service in programs to conserve, recycle, maintain, and restore natural resources in urban and rural environments, to provide recreational opportunities, and to encourage community betterment or beautification;

(4) public safety service, including placement with police and fire departments, courts, the border patrol, and prisons; and

(5) in the case of special senior service members, service to assist a State in administering a program, including mentoring, supervision, and other functions.

SEC. 144. TERMS OF SERVICE.

(a) LENGTH OF SERVICE.—

(1) PART-TIME.—An individual performing part-time national service under this subtitle shall agree to perform community service for not less than 2 years.

(2) FULL-TIME.—An individual performing full-time national service under this subtitle shall agree to perform community service for not less than 1 year nor more than 2 years, at the discretion of such individual.

(3) SPECIAL SENIOR SERVICE.—A special senior service participant performing national service under this subtitle shall serve for a period of time as determined by the Commission.

(b) PARTIAL COMPLETION OF SERVICE.—If the State releases a participant from completing a term of service in a program receiving assistance under this subtitle for compelling personal circumstances as demonstrated by such participant, the Commission may provide such participant with that portion of the financial assistance described in section 146 that corresponds to the quantity of the service obligation completed by such individual.

(c) TERMS OF SERVICE.—

(1) PART-TIME.—A participant performing part-time national service under this subtitle shall serve for—

(A) 2 weekends each month and 2 weeks during the year; or

(B) an average of 9 hours per week each year of service.

(2) FULL-TIME.—A participant performing full-time national service under this subtitle shall serve for not less than 40 hours per week each year of service.

SEC. 145. ELIGIBILITY.

(a) PART-TIME.—

(1) REQUIREMENTS.—An individual may serve in a part-time national service program under this subtitle if such individual—

(A) is 17 years of age or older; and

(B) is a citizen of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

(2) PRIORITY.—In selecting applicants for a part-time program, States shall give priority to applicants who are currently employed.

(b) FULL-TIME.—An individual may serve in a full-time national service program under this subtitle if such individual—

(1) is 17 years of age or older;

(2) has received a high school diploma or the equivalent of such diploma, or agrees to achieve a high school diploma or the equivalent of such diploma while participating in the program; and

(3) is a citizen of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

(c) SPECIAL SENIOR SERVICE.—An individual may serve as a special senior service member under this subtitle if such individual—

(1) is 60 years of age or older; and

(2) meets the eligibility criteria for special senior service membership established by the Commission.

SEC. 146. VOUCHERS.

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subsection (d), the Commission shall annually provide to each part-time participant a non-transferrable voucher that is equal in value to $2,000 for each year of service that such participant provides to the program.

(2) WAIVER.—A State may apply for a waiver to reduce the amount of a voucher provided under paragraph (1) to an amount that is equal in value to not less than the average annual tuition and required fees at 4-year public institutions of higher education within such State.

(3) CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prevent a State from using funds made available from non-Federal sources to increase the amount of a voucher provided under paragraph (1) to an amount in excess of that described in such paragraph.

(b) FULL-TIME.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subsection (d), the Commission shall annually provide to each full-time participant a non-transferrable voucher that is equal in value to $5,000 for each year of service that such participant provides to the program.

(2) WAIVER.—A State may apply for a waiver to reduce the amount of a voucher provided under paragraph (1) to an amount that is equal in value to not less than the average annual tuition, required fees, and room and board costs at 4-year public institutions of higher education within such State.

(3) CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prevent a State from using funds made available from non-Federal sources to increase the amount of a voucher provided under paragraph (1) to an amount in excess of that described in such paragraph.

(c) SPECIAL SENIOR SERVICE PARTICIPANT.—A special senior service participant shall be ineligible to receive a voucher under this section.

(d) INDEXING.—The Commission shall increase the value of vouchers provided under this section in each fiscal year based on the increase in the costs associated with attending a 4-year institution of higher education during that fiscal year. The Commission shall determine such increases in costs based on information made available by the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the National Center for Education Statistics.

(e) USE OF VOUCHER.—

(1) PART-TIME.—A voucher provided under subsection (a) shall only be used for—

(A) payment of a student loan from Federal or non-Federal sources;

(B) downpayment or closing costs associated with purchasing a first home;

(C) downpayment, closing costs, or other costs associated with purchasing a small business concern; or

(D) tuition at an institution of higher education on a full-time basis, or to pay the expenses incurred in the full-time participation in an apprenticeship program approved by the appropriate State agency.

(2) FULL-TIME.—A voucher provided under subsection (b) shall only be used for—

(A) payment of a student loan from Federal or non-Federal sources;

(B) downpayment or closing costs associated with purchasing a first home;

(C) downpayment, closing costs, or other costs associated with purchasing a small business concern; or

(D) tuition, room and board, books and fees, and other costs associated with attendance (pursuant to section 472 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1087ll)) at an institution of higher education on a full-time basis, or to pay the expenses incurred in the full-time participation in an apprenticeship program approved by the appropriate State agency.

(3) ALTERNATIVE VOUCHER OPTION.—A State administering a full-time national service program under this subtitle may apply to the Commission for authorization to offer an alternative voucher option limiting the use of vouchers for education, housing, or costs associated with the purchase of a small business concern, including downpayment or closing costs.

SEC. 147. LIVING ALLOWANCE.

(a) FULL-TIME SERVICE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—From assistance provided under this subtitle, each participant in a full-time national service program receiving assistance under this subtitle shall receive a living allowance of not more than an amount equal to 100 percent of the poverty line for a family of two (as defined in section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)).

(2) NON-FEDERAL SOURCES.—Notwithstanding paragraph (1), a program agency may provide participants with additional amounts that are made available from non-Federal sources.

(b) REDUCTION IN EXISTING PROGRAM BENEFITS.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to require a program in existence on the date of enactment of this Act to decrease any stipends, salaries, or living allowances provided to participants under such program.

(c) HEALTH INSURANCE.—In addition to the living allowance provided under subsection (a), grantees are encouraged to provide health insurance to each participant in a full-time national service program who does not otherwise have access to health insurance.

(1) FULL-TIME.—Each full-time special senior service participant shall receive a living allowance equal to the living allowance provided to full-time participants under subsection (a), and such other assistance as the Commission considers necessary and appropriate for a special senior service participant to carry out the service obligation of such participant.

(2) PART-TIME.—Each part-time special senior service participant shall receive a living allowance equal to a share of such allowance offered to a full-time special senior service participant under paragraph (1), that has been prorated according to the number of hours such part-time participant serves in the program, and such other assistance that the Commission considers necessary and appropriate for a special senior service participant to carry out the service obligation of such participant.

SEC. 148. TRAINING.

(a) PROGRAM TRAINING.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Each participant shall receive 3 weeks of training provided by the Commission in cooperation with the State.

(2) CONTENTS OF TRAINING SESSION.—Each training session described in paragraph (1) shall—

(A) orient each participant in the nature, philosophy, and purpose of the program;

(B) build an ethic community service; and

(C) train each participant to effectively perform the assigned program task of such participant by providing—

(i) general training in citizenship and civic and community service; and

(ii) if feasible, specialized training for the type of national service that each participant will perform.

(b) ADDITIONAL TRAINING.—Each State may provide additional training for participants as such State determines necessary.

(c) AGENCY OR ORGANIZATION TRAINING.—Each participant shall receive training from the sponsoring organization in skills relevant to the work to be conducted.

SEC. 149. PUBLIC-PRIVATE PARTNERSHIP.

The Commission shall consider and develop opportunities for cooperation between public and private entities in the funding and implementation of a program receiving assistance under this subtitle, including cost-sharing arrangements with sponsoring organizations.

SEC. 150. IN-SERVICE EDUCATION BENEFITS.

Each State that receives assistance under this subtitle shall provide to each participant enrolled in a full-time program in-service educational services and materials to enable such participant to obtain a high school diploma or the equivalent of such diploma.

Subtitle E—Innovative Service Programs

SEC. 160. GENERAL AUTHORITY.

The Commission may make grants under section 102 to States for the creation of innovative national and community service programs.

SEC. 161. GRANTS.

(a) CRITERIA FOR RECEIVING APPLICATIONS.—In determining whether to award a grant to a State under section 160, the Commission shall consider—

(1) the ability of the proposed program of such State to serve as an effective model for other States;

(2) the quality of the application of such State, including the plan of such State for training, recruitment, placement, and data collection;

(3) the extent that the proposed program builds on existing programs; and

(4) the degree to which the program responds to State and community human, educational, environmental and public safety needs in an innovative manner.

(c) STATE APPLICATION FOR GRANT.—To receive a grant under this subtitle, a State shall prepare and submit, to the Commission, an application at such time, in such manner, and containing such information as the Commission may reasonably require, including—

(1) a description of the proposed program to be established with assistance provided under the grant;

(2) a description of the human, educational, environmental or public safety service that participants will perform and the State or community need that will be addressed under such proposed program;

(3) a description of the target population of participants and how they will be recruited;

(4) a description of the procedure for training supervisors and participants and for supervising and organizing participants in such proposed program;

(5) a description of the procedures to ensure that the proposed program provides participants with an opportunity to reflect on their service experiences;

(6) a description of any stipend or benefit that participants will receive, if any;

(7) an estimate of the anticipated number of participants and the anticipated number of hours of service such participants will perform;

(8) a description of the State budget for the program;

(9) assurances that, prior to the placement of a participant in a project, the State will consult with any local labor organization representing employees in the area who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such project; and

(10) assurances that, prior to the placement of a participant in a project, the State will consult with employees at the proposed project site who are engaged in the same or similar work as that proposed to be carried out by such project.

Subtitle F—Administrative Provisions

SEC. 170. LIMITATION ON NUMBER OF GRANTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Commission shall not award more than one grant during each fiscal year to each State under section 102.

(b) NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS.—In submitting applications for a grant under section 102, a State shall consolidate all of the applications of such State for the conduct of programs under subtitles B through E, into a single application that meets the requirements of such subtitles.

(c) MULTIPLE USE.—A grant awarded under section 102 to a State may be used by the State in accordance with the applications consolidated, submitted, and approved under subtitles (B) through (E).

(1) advise the President and the Congress concerning developments in national and community service that merit the attention of the President and the Congress;

(2) design and administer the programs or initiatives established under this title;

(3) shall consult with appropriate Federal agencies in administering programs that receive assistance under title I;

(4) may delegate authority to administer the programs established under this title to any other agency or entity of the Federal government, on the agreement of such agency or entity, as the Board determines appropriate;

(5) shall provide, directly or through contract with public or private nonprofit organizations with extensive experience in service programs, training and technical assistance to States, school and community-based service programs, full-time youth service corps, and national service demonstration programs;

(6) shall arrange for the evaluation of programs established under this title, in accordance with section 178;

(7) coordinate with the Secretary of Defense in evaluating the effect of the national service demonstration program on the recruitment efforts of the active and reserve components of the Armed Forces; and

(8) carry out any other activities determined appropriate by the Secretary.

(d) EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE BOARD.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Board shall appoint an individual to serve as Executive Director of the Board (hereinafter referred to in this section as the "Director").

(2) DUTIES.—The Director shall advise the Board concerning developments in volunteer or national service that the Director determines merits the attention of the Board, identify promising service initiatives, and coordinate the work of the Board with the work of other Federal agencies involved in service activities and in the design of a competitive grant to provide assistance as authorized under this title.

(e) TECHNICAL EMPLOYEES.—The Director may, at the discretion of the Board, appoint not more than 10 technical employees to administer the Committee. Such employees shall be appointed for terms that shall not exceed 2 years, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Board shall provide assistance to not less than three national or regional service clearinghouses.

(2) PUBLIC AND PRIVATE NONPROFIT AGENCIES.—Public and private nonprofit agencies that have extensive experience in community service, adult volunteer and partnership programs, youth service, and other volunteer programs shall be eligible to receive funds under paragraph (1).

(3) FUNCTION OF CLEARINGHOUSES.—National and regional clearinghouses that receive assistance under paragraph (1) shall—

(A) assist State and local community service programs with needs assessments and planning;

(B) conduct research and evaluations concerning community service;

(C) provide leadership development and training to State and local community service program administrators, supervisors, and participants;

(D) administer award and recognition programs for outstanding community service programs and participants; and

(E) facilitate communication amongst community service programs and participants.

(4) GRANTS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The Board may make grants to national model service programs.

(B) ELIGIBILITY.—States, education institutions, local government agencies, community-based agencies, nonprofit organizations, or consortia composed thereof shall be eligible to receive grants under subparagraph (A).

(C) DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.—The Board shall widely disseminate information concerning national model service programs that receive assistance under subparagraph (A).

(5) INNOVATIVE CURRICULUM MATERIALS.—The Board may make grants for the development of innovative curriculum materials for use in youth community service and adult volunteer partnership programs.

(g) PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS FOR SERVICES.—

(1) PRESIDENTIAL AWARDS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—The President, acting through the Commission, is authorized to make Presidential Awards for service to individuals demonstrating outstanding community service and to outstanding service programs.

(B) NUMBER OF AWARDS.—The President is authorized to make one individual and one program award in each Congressional district, and one Statewide program award in each State.

(C) CONSULTATION.—The President shall consult with the Governor of each State, and with the Board, in the selection of individuals and programs for Presidential Awards.

(D) PARTICIPANTS IN PROGRAMS.—An individual receiving an award under this subsection need not be a participant in a program assisted under this title.

(2) INFORMATION.—The President shall ensure that information concerning individuals and programs receiving awards under this subsection is widely disseminated.

(h) DETAIL OF EMPLOYEES.—Any Federal government employee may be detailed to the Commission without payment of reimbursement to the detailing agency. Such detail of a Federal employee shall not result in the interruption or loss of civil service status or privilege of such employee.

(i) LIMITATION.—In each fiscal year the Commission shall limit the value of any benefits conferred under this Act, to an amount that is not in excess of the appropriations for such fiscal year to carry out this Act, and if the fulfillment of the requirements of this Act requires amounts in excess of the limitation described in this subsection, such benefits shall be reduced to the extent necessary to comply with the requirements of this subsection.

TITLE II—MODIFICATIONS OF EXISTING EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Whenever in this title an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

Subtitle A—Higher Education

SEC. 210. INNOVATIVE PROJECTS FOR COMMUNITY SERVICE.

(a) PURPOSE.—Section 1061 of the Act (20 U.S.C. 1135e) is amended by striking out "projects in exchange" and all that follows through the end thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof "activities before, during, or after the completion of such student's higher education.".

(b) USE OF GRANTS.—Section 1062 of the Act (20 U.S.C. 1135e-1) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1062. INNOVATIVE PROJECTS FOR COMMUNITY SERVICE.

"(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this part, to make grants to, and enter into contracts with, institutions of higher education (including combinations of such institutions), and other public agencies and nonprofit organizations working in partnership with institutions of higher education, for purposes including—

"(1) encouraging students to participate in community service activities that will engender a sense of social responsibility and commitment to the community;

"(2) encouraging students to assist in the teaching of individuals with limited basic skills or an inability to read and write;

"(3) creating opportunities for students to engage in community service activities in exchange for financial assistance that reduces the debt acquired by students in the course of completing postsecondary education;

"(4) encouraging student-initiated and student designated community service projects; and

"(5) encouraging the integration of community service into academic curricula.

"(b) ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.—

"(1) APPLICATION.—No grant may be made, and no contract may be entered into, under this section unless an application is made to the Director of the Fund for Improvement of Postsecondary Education (hereinafter referred to as the 'Director') at such time, in such manner, and contained or accompanied by such information as the Director may reasonably require. Such applications shall include plans that describe the manner in which appropriate training is to be provided to participants and supervisors.

"(2) ADVISE.—Consistent with the provisions of section 1003(c), the National Board of the Fund for the Improvement of Postsecondary Education shall advise the Director on programs, priorities, and the selection of projects developed under the authority of this section.

"(3) TECHNICAL EMPLOYEES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary may appoint, for terms of not to exceed 2 years, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code governing appointments in the competitive service, technical employees to administer this part who may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51, and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

"(B) LIMITATION.—The Secretary may appoint not more than 1 technical employee for each $2,000,000 appropriated under section 1063.

"(4) APPLICATION OF OTHER SECTION.—The provisions of section 1004(b) shall apply to grants made under this section.

"(5) CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this part shall be construed as requiring an institution of higher education to offer academic credit as a requirement of receiving assistance under this part.".

Subtitle B—State Student Incentive Grant and Work Study Programs

SEC. 220. ADDITIONAL RESERVATION FOR CAMPUS-BASED COMMUNITY WORK LEARNING STUDY JOBS.

Section 415B(a) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1070c-1(a)) is amended by inserting the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(3)(A) If the amount appropriated to carry out this subpart exceeds $75,000,000, the Secretary shall, notwithstanding the provisions of section 415(C)(b)(3)(A), allot 50 percent of such excess to the States for the purpose described in section 415(C)(b)(3)(B).

Subtitle E—Loan Forgiveness

SEC. 250. LOAN FORGIVENESS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part B of title IV of such Act is amended by inserting after section 432 (20 U.S.C. 1082) the following new section:

"SEC. 432A. TREATMENT OF STUDENTS VOLUNTEERS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law except subsection (c), a loan insurable under section 427, or the student loan insurance program of a State, institution, or organization under section 428, shall provide that, in the case of any student borrower who, prior to the beginning of the repayment period, agrees in writing to volunteer for service under the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2501 et seq.) or under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 4951 et seq.) or for comparable full-time service as a volunteer with a tax exempt organization of demonstrative effectiveness, for the payment by the United States of the percent of the amount of loans specified in subsection (b).

"(b) PARTIAL CANCELLATION AUTHORITY.—

"(1) AGREEMENT.—The Secretary shall enter into an agreement with any student borrower described in section 427(a)(2)(H) or 428(b)(1)(V) under which the borrower shall agree to serve as a volunteer under the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2501 et seq.) or under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 4951 et seq.) or for comparable full-time service as a volunteer with a tax-exempt organization of demonstrated effectiveness.

"(2) ASSURANCES.—The agreement entered into under paragraph (1) shall contain provisions designed to assure that—

"(A) the Secretary will assume the obligation of paying the percent of any loan made, insured, or guaranteed under this part, except those described in sections 428A, 428B and 428C, pursuant to the schedule described in paragraph (5); and

"(B) the student borrower who fails to volunteer for service in accordance with the agreement will assume the obligation of paying the amount of any such loan attributable to the period for which the student borrower failed to comply with the agreement.

"(3) PAYMENT.—The Secretary shall in each fiscal year pay to the holder of each loan for which the Secretary assumes responsibility under this subsection the amount specified in paragraph (5).

"(4) WAIVER OR SUSPENSION.—The Secretary shall waive or suspend any obligation of service or payment of any loan, or any part thereof, to which the United States is entitled under paragraph (2)(A) whenever the Secretary determines that compliance by an individual with the agreement is impossible or would involve extreme hardship to the individual.

"(5) AMOUNT OF PAYMENT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The percentage of a loan that shall be paid by the United States under paragraph (2)(A) shall be 15 percent for the first or second year of service and 20 percent for the third or fourth year of service as described in paragraph (1).

"(B) INTEREST.—If a portion of the loan is paid by the Secretary under this subsection for any year, the entire amount of interest on such loan which accrues for such year shall be paid by the Secretary.

"(C) CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to authorize the refunding of any repayment on the loan.

"(c) LIMITATION.—In each fiscal year, the Secretary shall limit the value of any benefits conferred under this section to an amount that is not in excess of the appropriation for such fiscal year to carry out this section, and if the fulfillment of the requirements of this section requires amounts in excess of this limitation described in this subsection, such benefits shall be reduced to the extent necessary to comply with the requirements of this subsection.".

(c) TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS.—

(1) STUDENT VOLUNTEER.—

(A) NOTE.—Section 427(a)(2)(B)(ii) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1077(a)(2)(B)(ii)) is amended by inserting after "that" a comma and the following: "subject to the provisions of subparagraph (H),".

(B) PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.—Section 427(a)(2) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1077(a)(2)(B)(ii)) is amended by—

(i) striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (G);

(ii) redesignating subparagraph (H) as subparagraph (I); and

(iii) inserting after subparagraph (G) the following new subparagraph:

"(H) complies with section 432A.".

(2) FEDERAL PAYMENT TO REDUCE INTEREST.—

(B) PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.—Section 428(b)(1) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1078(b)(1)(D)) is amended by—

(i) striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (T);

(ii) striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (U) and by inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(iii) adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(V) complies with section 432A.".

SEC. 251. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by section 250 shall apply only to loans made to cover the costs of instruction for periods of enrollment beginning on or after 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act to individuals who are new borrowers on that date.

TITLE III—POINTS OF LIGHT INITIATIVE FOUNDATION

SEC. 301. SHORT TITLE.

This title may be cited as the "Points of Light Initiative Foundation Act".

SEC. 302. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress finds that—

(1) community service and service to others is an integral part of American tradition;

(2) existing volunteers and volunteer programs should be praised for their efforts in helping and serving others;

(3) the definition of a successful life includes service to others;

(4) individuals should be encouraged to volunteer their time and energies in community service efforts;

(5) if asked to volunteer or participate in community service, most Americans will do so;

(6) institutions should be encouraged to volunteer their resources and energies and should encourage volunteer and community service among their members, employees, affiliates; and

(7) volunteer and community service programs are intended to complement and not replace governmental responsibilities.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this title—

(1) to encourage every American and every American institution to help solve our most critical social problems by volunteering their time, energies and services through community service projects and initiatives;

(2) to identify successful and promising community service projects and initiatives, and to disseminate information concerning such projects and initiatives to other communities in order to promote their adoption nationwide; and

(3) to discover and encourage new leaders and develop individuals and institutions that serve as strong examples of a commitment to serving others and to convince all Americans that a successful life includes serving others.

SEC. 303. ESTABLISHMENT.

There is established a nonprofit corporation to be known as the "Points of Light Initiative Foundation" (hereinafter referred to in this title as the "Foundation"). The Foundation shall be subject to the provisions of this Act and, to the extent consistent with this section, to the provisions of the District of Columbia Nonprofit Corporation Act (D.C. Code 501 et seq.).

SEC. 304. BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

(1) IN GENERAL.—The management of the Foundation shall be vested in a Board of Directors (hereinafter referred to in this title as the "Board") that shall be composed of not less than 19 and not more than 25 members.

(2) APPOINTMENT.—

(A) BY PRESIDENT.—The members of the Board shall be appointed by the President. Such members shall be appointed so as to ensure a broad bipartisan representation, including women and minorities, of groups and individuals associated with volunteer and community service.

(B) CRITERIA.—In appointing members under this paragraph, the President shall consider individuals who—

(i) have made significant contributions to existing volunteer and community service programs;

(ii) are capable of bringing significant resources, expertise, and experience to the Foundation; or

(iii) have a significant interest in promoting community service and volunteerism.

(C) UNITED STATES OFFICERS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the President may appoint officers of the United States to serve on the Board.

(3) CHAIRPERSON.—The President shall designate one member of the Board to serve as Chairperson.

(4) HONORARY CHAIRPERSON.—The President shall serve as the Honorary Chairperson of the Foundation.

(5) TERM.—Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, each member of the Board shall serve a 2 year term. The terms of such members shall be staggered by 1 year intervals to provide for continuity in the management of the Foundation.

(b) COMPENSATION AND EXPENSES.—

(1) NO COMPENSATION.—Members of the Board shall serve without compensation.

(2) EXPENSES.—While away from their homes or regular places of business on the business of the Board, members of such Board may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as is authorized under section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons employed intermittently in the Government service.

(c) BOARD AUTHORITY; RULES AND REGULATIONS; QUORUM.—

(1) AUTHORITY.—The Board shall manage the exercise of all the powers and duties of the Foundation.

(2) RULES AND REGULATIONS.—The Board may prescribe, amend, and repeal bylaws, rules, and regulations that govern the manner in which the business of the Foundation may be conducted and in which the powers granted to the Foundation by law may be exercised.

(3) QUORUM.—A majority of members of the Board shall constitute a quorum.

SEC. 305. EMPLOYEES.

(a) APPOINTMENT.—The Board shall appoint a President or an Executive Director, and may appoint such other officers and employees as may be necessary to administer the Foundation, for such terms and at such rates of compensation as are fixed by the Board. Such officers and employees shall be exempt from the civil service regulations and requirements.

(b) OTHER PERSONNEL AND SERVICES.—The Board may request the assistance of personnel and the use of services from other public and private corporations and agencies. Such personnel shall serve at the pleasure of the Board and without compensation from the Foundation.

SEC. 306. POWERS AND FUNCTIONS.

The Foundation, in addition to the other powers and functions provided for in this title—

(1) shall have perpetual succession, except that such Foundation may be dissolved by an Act of Congress;

(2) may adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal;

(3) may make and perform contracts and other agreements with any individual, corporation, or other entity and with any government agency;

(4) may acquire by purchase, devise, bequest, or gift, or otherwise lease, hold, and improve, such real and personal property as the Board finds to be necessary to achieve the purposes of the Foundation;

(5) may accept money, funds, property, and services of every kind by gift, devise, bequest, grant, or otherwise;

(6) may establish and operate such programs, adopt such policies, and pursue such activities as may be determined appropriate by the Board to further the purposes of the Foundation; and

(7) shall have such other powers as may be necessary and appropriate to carrying out its powers and duties under this Act.

SEC. 307. PRINCIPAL AND BRANCH OFFICES.

The Foundation shall establish a principal office in the District of Columbia and may establish such branch offices or other offices in any place within the United States or elsewhere where the Foundation may carry out its operations.

SEC. 308. NONPROFIT NATURE OF THE FOUNDATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Foundation shall be a nonprofit corporation and shall have no capital stock.

(b) REVENUE AND EARNINGS.—No part of the revenue, earnings, or other income or property of the Foundation shall inure to the benefit of the members of the Board, the officers, or the employees of the Foundation, and such revenue, earnings or other income, or property shall be used for carrying out the purposes of this title.

(c) CONFLICT OF INTEREST.—No member of the Board, officer or employee of the Foundation shall in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate in the deliberation or the determination of any question affecting the personal interests of such members, officer or employee or the interests of any corporation, partnership or organization in which such members, officer or employee is directly or indirectly interested.

(d) CONTRIBUTIONS.—The Foundation shall not contribute to or otherwise support any political party or candidate for elective public office.

SEC. 309. EXEMPTION FROM TAX.

The Foundation, including its income, shall be exempt from taxation imposed by the United States or any territory or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

SEC. 310. OVERSIGHT.

The Board shall use amounts appropriated under section 401(a)(7) to—

(1) prepare and submit, to the appropriate Committees of Congress and the President, an annual report concerning the activities of the Foundation and the expenditure of funds by such;

(2) procure audits of its activities by the Comptroller General; and

(3) participate in the Office of Management and Budget budget review process.

SEC. 311. ANNUAL BUDGET.

The Foundation shall establish an annual budget for use in allocating amounts available to the Foundation under section 401(a)(7). The Foundation may, in each fiscal year, supplement the appropriation for such fiscal year under such section (a) with private resources.

TITLE IV—AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 401. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act, $50,000,00 for fiscal year 1990 and $75,000,000 for fiscal year 1991, of which the Secretary shall make available—

(1) to carry out subtitle B of title I, $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1991;

(2) to carry out subtitle C of title I, $14,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $21,000,000 for fiscal year 1991;

(3) to carry out subtitle D of title I, $14,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $21,000,000 for fiscal year 1991;

(4) to carry out subtitle E of title I, $400,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $600,000 for fiscal year 1991;

(5) to carry out subtitle G of title I, $800,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $1,200,000 for fiscal year 1991;

(6) to establish clearinghouses under section 190(f), $800,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $1,200,000 for fiscal year 1991; and

(7) to carry out title III, $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 and $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.

(b) POINTS OF LIGHT FOUNDATION.—If any amounts made available under subsection (a)(7) are not used by the Points of Light Foundation, such amounts shall be made available to carry out subtitles B, C, and D of title I on a pro rata basis.

(c) UNUSED APPROPRIATIONS.—If an amount authorized to be appropriated in any fiscal year is not appropriated, or is appropriated but not expended in such fiscal year, such amount shall remain available to be appropriated, or expended, in the following fiscal year.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado be permitted and that the technical change to conform his amendment with the substitute be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Colorado still has the floor.

AMENDMENT NO. 1262

(Purpose: To allow religious organizations that receive Federal financial assistance under this Act to keep their religious identity and maintain a moral climate in their programs and activities)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, with that understanding, I send the amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] (for himself), Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, and Mr. MCCONNELL, proposes an amendment numbered 1262 to the committee modified amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 8, line 2, after the word "needs" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 8, line 9, after the words "secondary school" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, private sectarian and nonsectarian schools";

On page 10, line 6, after the words "public or private agencies" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 36, line 3, strike "any religious function" and insert in lieu thereof, "the use of funds provided under this title by program participants and program staff to give religious instruction, conduct worship services, or engage in any form of proselytization".

On page 69, line 7, strike the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", but nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent any church or other religious entity from—

"(A) displaying religious symbols or decorations;

"(B) allowing persons to pray voluntarily, whether silently or vocally;

"(C) allowing persons to sing religious hymns; or

"(D) affirming or promoting any moral tenet that may be based on religious precepts;".

On page 70, line 6, after the word "affiliation" insert the following: ", except that a church or other religious entity may require that participants adhere to the religious tenets and teachings of such organization and further, such organization may require that participants adhere to rules forbidding the use of drugs or alcohol".

On page 70, line 7, redesignate subsection (c) as subsection (d) and insert after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) QUALIFIED APPLICANTS.—If two or more prospective participants are qualified for any position with a church or other religious entity that is funded under part A of title I or titles II or III, nothing in this Act shall prohibit such organization from accepting a prospective participant for such position who is already participating on a regular basis in other activities of the church or other religious entity.".

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I will now, unless someone wishes to address the amendment, suggest the absence of a quorum.

Did the Senator from Massachusetts wish to speak?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we are not hostile to the purposes for which the Senator from Colorado is offering his amendment. The path we have followed in this legislation with regard to the activities of religious institutions follows what has been done with other voluntary service programs which have been in existence, some of them for some 25 years—VISTA volunteer programs, Foster Grandparent program, the higher education grant programs, and other programs. What we have done in this bill is to include language that is similar to church-state language in those various authorizations. Rather than list various particular items, our proposal does not exclude the participation of religious organizations so long as the programs themselves do not involve religious worship or instruction.

It is still my hope and belief that we are wiser to try, rather than listing the things that would be authorized, to include a straightforward statement prohibiting the funding of religious activities. It may be at some point down the line if we adopt the amendment, that some will say that things that were not specifically referenced may not be permitted. We took the approach included in the proposal because it has been time tested. There have been religious organizations and groups which have participated in service programs. We know at this time and we have inquired whether there had been any problems to date that had been troublesome from a constitutional point of view or from religious organizations that felt they were being excluded. In the course of our inquiring about those matters, they were not brought to our attention.

So, that is why we proceeded in this way. It seems to me to be preferable, but I am not opposed to the essence of what the Senator from Colorado is attempting to do. He has a list of the various items on this in part (a) of his amendment. We are just going over the particular items at this time.

If it would be agreeable to the Senator from Colorado, we would like to do is just review these for a few moments, come back to him, and see if we cannot reach agreement. I believe that we will be able to do so. But I think we want to make sure that, if we do that, we are able to represent accurately to the Senate exactly where we are going and what we are intending.

As I understand, the Senator understands and supports the various other provisions that we have included prohibiting the funding of religious instruction, worship, and proselytization.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the Senator will yield, that is absolutely right. The issue arises because of that prohibition in the first place. In general, it seems to me that the Senator is correct in suggesting that the less we say the better, but in this particular case, since there is a general prohibition on religious activities, we need to be sure that we do not, without intending to do so, forbid religious entities from participating. So, in the spirit and intent that I believe the text of my amendment is to modify what is already in the bill and narrow the scope of the prohibition that exists in the bill. I will be happy to entertain any suggestions he may have on it, but my belief is that we rested the narrow grafted way.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, S. 1430, states that assistance provided under title I shall not be used by program participants or program staffs to provide religious instruction, conduct religious services, or to engage in any form of proselytization. And then we left the other matters to be addressed by the courts. By contrast, the Senator from Colorado's approach is to list those that would be permitted.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Georgia has a matter he would like to talk about, and perhaps in that time I could talk to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. I have a brief statement and in a few minutes I do have a couple of questions I would like to ask the sponsor.

Mr. President, I am extremely pleased that the National and Community Service Act has been brought on the floor. We certainly all agree on the value and importance of public service. I believe this bill creates some exceptional programs and expands programs which have been very successful in the past. These programs do offer enormous benefits to our communities and our Nation as well as the many rich rewards for the volunteers that give their time and talent and their effort.

I would like to stress that the programs in this bill can be particularly effective in rural America. Many times on this floor many of us have spoken of the challenges facing people living in our rural communities. Many of the problems we associate with the inner city—inadequate health care, jobs, education, housing—all of these have become increasingly rural problems. We can all go to the rural areas of the States we represent and see how these problems are threatening the viability of life in the countryside.

These problems have worsened in a time when spending on rural programs has decreased, declining 75 percent in the last 10 years. National service programs offer a way to make up for those losses, and we must make every effort to improve the quality of life in rural America.

Rural communities need the contributions that young people participating in community service programs can make. The illiterate need to be taught to read and write. Disadvantaged students need to be tutored. The elderly and disabled and children of working parents need someone to care for them. The land, water, and air—the precious resources of rural America—need to be preserved.

The young people living in rural America can benefit greatly from participation in such service programs. Providing service to their communities gives young people a sense of responsibility to their communities—and also to their Nation. It matures them and elevates their self-esteem. These programs can also give young people training to better prepare them for their future careers.

Let us not overlook what is just as important. The increased participation of our young people in their communities can strengthen the ties that hold them to these communities. Young people are leaving rural areas for the cities in alarming numbers. Increased civic and community involvement can cause more young peope to decide that they can make a life for themselves in their home towns as adults, choosing the place that they would prefer to live.

Some of the mechanisms for national and community service activities are already in place. For example, our land grant colleges and universities have traditionally played a role in the revitalization of rural America, and these schools, under these programs, continue to play an increasing role.

The National and Community Service Act contains great potential benefits both for our communities and the participants in the programs. Rural America sorely needs the concentration of human resources fostered by the National and Community Service Act. I want to make sure that the citizens in our small towns and countryside will have the opportunity to realize the benefits of this legislation.

I have a couple of questions. But before I ask them, I see one of the primary sponsors of this legislation and certainly a woman as a private citizen and a public servant—our association goes back now almost 20 years to our days as city council persons, me in Georgia, BARBARA MIKULSKI in Maryland—who, along with the senior Senator from Massachusetts and the senior Senator from my State, Senator NUNN, has been the unquestioned leader in bringing this legislation to the floor and seeing to it that its expanse includes the rural areas of her State and my State that I have spoken of.

Ms. MIKULSKI. If the Senator will yield. I thank the Senator for his gracious comments. The chairman of the committee, Senator KENNEDY, is working with Senator ARMSTRONG on the religious exemption amendment and, as one of the prime architects and a member of the committee, I would be happy to enter into a colloquy with the Senator. Senator KENNEDY has designated me to be the floor manager during this segment.

Mr. FOWLER. I am delighted, I say to the Senator. I just have two questions for the record and for those inquiries that continue to come in.

How does the Senator see the provisions of this bill operating in rural areas of our country?

Ms. MIKULSKI. Like the Senator, I made a transition of being a Member of the House of Representatives, representing a large, exciting metropolitan area—he in Atlanta; I in Baltimore—to representing a whole State with rural constituencies.

As we listened and learned about rural America, the way we would help them in this program is, No. 1, the program would be operated under the aegis of a Governor. A Governor would submit a State plan to this quasi-public corporation we have so we could keep bureaucracy lean and benefits in the community greater. The Governor submits a plan based on the State's needs.

As the Senator has indicated, Georgia, the great State he represents, has the large metropolitan area of Atlanta and yet a lot of rural areas. That Governor would know what the needs of Georgia are just like the Governor of Maryland knows the needs of my State. And the State plan would develop how the needs of rural areas would be met.

The program will function, I say to the Senator, primarily through nonprofit organizations. This is for the part-time voucher program and then through the nonprofits, your kids could be delivering weekend Meals on Wheels out of those clay hills. They can be working for Habitat for Humanity by building housing for the poor. But it would be operated by the local groups in local communities to a plan developed by a Governor.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the Senator. I know she would agree, and we would love to have to any other comments, that we do not underestimate the possible impact for our rural areas for the goals that we know are necessary; am I correct?

Ms. MIKULSKI. Absolutely. What this program does, I think, is really reward the values of rural America, because it is rural America where the values of the habits of the heart that deTocqueville talks about are so alive and well and flourishing. It is there where neighbor continues to help neighbor; it is there where a contemporary version of the barn raising continues to go on.

I think we are going to have a lot to learn from the creative ways rural America implements it. Also I say to the Senator this provides an opportunity structure. That is what this bill is. It goes to three basic values we want to foster in our society: Access to the American dream, the ability to pursue higher education or accumulate a nest egg for a down payment on first-time home ownership, but not a giveaway program, and that you earn that voucher through your own sweat equity working in the community.

We also want to inculcate the value of civic obligation. You, like I, have heard Walesa, we have heard Havel, one day we will hear Mandela talk about the fact there is no such thing as no cost democracy. We must put that in our own community.

Last, but not at all least, the habits of the heart, I think that is what this legislation does. It goes right to the values of Main Street America.

What we did in this bill is we get away from the values of Wall Street and go back to the values of Main Street, and that is why I think rural America is going to be an active participant.

Mr. FOWLER. All I can say is, if we can fit rural America into that great American tradition now, from deTocqueville to MIKULSKI, there will be no question that our country will remain strong; our country will get stronger because of the full participation of the democratic ideal that, as Vaclav Havel said, is always an illusive horizon which we continue to travel toward but we never actually achieve it.

But, unless we find a way that brings on those kids who have been left behind through no fault of their own, but who want to work, who want to contribute, who want to emerge as full, operating, productive citizens in their own communities, not having to go running off to Atlanta and Boston, I think under the leadership of the Senator from Maryland and that of the Senator from Massachusetts, who has now returned to the floor, I believe we can do it. I am thankful for your collective leadership on behalf of those kids.

I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON].

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly in favor of the Armstrong amendment of which I am a cosponsor, and to thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts for his careful consideration of that amendment. Awaiting his answer with respect to his position on it, I would simply like to add to the illustrations which the Senator from Colorado elicited in connection with his support of the proposal, with this one.

New York City's foster care system, which was obviously already filled with troubles, overburdened and unable to cope with a growing caseload, almost self-destructed when the city imposed onerous requirements on religious foster care agencies. Those agencies, of course, provide relief to a public system that sorely needs it by finding foster homes for children who need those homes.

But city leaders, after having been pressured by the American Civil Liberties Union, started requiring these religious agencies to stop preferring children of their own faiths, to drop requirements that children in the care of individuals attend religious services, and to require that those children be given, "meaningful access to the full range of family planning information, services and counseling."

In other words, Mr. President, Jewish agencies were forced to stop giving priority to Jewish children, Presbyterian agencies could not require that foster parents take children in their care to church, and Catholic agencies had to provide abortion counseling and referral to children in the care of Catholic foster parents.

The net result of regulations like that was that the government was hurt, because a greater burden was imposed on it when private social welfare agencies could no longer handle the caseload because they refused to go along with these requirements. The religious agencies of course are hurt badly because they are forced to choose between adhering to their own moral tenets and providing care to those in need, the homeless, the poor and other disadvantaged people. They may have had services which they need—and for which they have asked—disrupted because of disputes among lawyers.

Happily there was a compromise. The city of New York backed away, in part—but did not in its entirety—from those requirements. It simply raises the questions with which we have been dealing as Americans over the course of 200 years, recently in increasingly distorted ways.

We seem to have concentrated overwhelmingly on that half of the first amendment dealing with religion which prohibits the establishment of religion and to have ignored almost completely the free exercise provisions of that first amendment. We do not deal in neutral fashion with social welfare agencies which are connected with churches, with synagogues, or with other religious organizations.

It is obvious to all of us that those organizations engage in many activities which have highly laudable secular purposes. They ought to be able to receive funding in order to engage in those secular purposes. And, when they have that public money, they should not be required to behave as though they were no longer religious agencies at all.

The Salvation Army is not the District of Columbia Department of Human Services and the law should not require it to act as if it were that kind of agency. The Armstrong amendment would assure that S. 1430 embodies these principles. It really does three things.

The bill itself is clear in its prohibition of religious activities. But it is unclear about whether religious entities are eligible to participate in publicly supported national and community service programs. This amendment makes it clear that those entities are eligible.

The amendment states that religious entities that participate in programs funded under the act are not thereby required to transform themselves into secular organizations. They can continue to display religious symbols and decorations, allow people to pray and voluntarily recite religious hymns, promote moral tenets like honesty, dependability, and fidelity which are accepted by the vast majority of our society but which in these cases are often based on religious precepts.

And finally the amendment includes provisions similar to those included in S. 5, the Act for Better Child Care, which we debated at great length on the floor of this body last year.

Those provisions would allow a religious entity which participates in programs funded under S. 1430 first to require that participants adhere to its religious tenets; second, to require that such participants adhere to rules forbidding the use of drugs and alcohol; and third, that in choosing between two or more prospective participants, to hire a person who is already involved on a regular basis in the activities of the organization which is engaged in the hiring.

It seems to this Senator, Mr. President, that this is a fair and appropriate addition to S. 1430. The goal of S. 1430, after all, is to encourage volunteer activities, to encourage people to become foster parents, to encourage people to work to help the homeless, to encourage a myriad of other salutary activities in our society.

We should encourage, therefore, rather than discourage, religious organizations' participation in the provision of these services which, after all, is their history and, in many cases, one of their major reasons for being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment?

The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the Armstrong amendment.

Mr. President, throughout the history of our great nation, churches and religious organizations have formed the very heart of voluntary action. President Reagan once said, "How can we love our country and not love our countrymen and, seeing our countrymen in need, not reach out a helping hand?" In the entire history of the Republic, churches and religious organizations have led that effort.

If we are about to enter into a Federal funding program to try to encourage voluntarism, to try to reward people who volunteer—in fact, this bill, some would say, makes being a volunteer a paid profession, which many would suggest is not in the spirit of voluntarism—I can see no logic whatsoever for not adopting the Armstrong amendment because it simply assures that a bill aimed at encouraging voluntarism not exclude the very heart of the voluntary effort in America. That very heart of the effort has been centered in churches and religious organizations.

I think this is a needed clarification in this bill. I think it is a needed clarification in law. I congratulate our distinguished colleague from Colorado, and I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FOWLER). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of S. 1430, the National and Community Service Act of 1990, and the proposed committee modification offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

S. 1430 is the result, as you know, of months of work on behalf of the chairman of the committee, Senator KENNEDY, Senator PELL, Senator NUNN, Senator MIKULSKI, and my office. This legislation contains provisions for 15 national service proposals introduced by a number of our colleagues in 1989 and provides for service opportunities for Americans of all ages.

Mr. President, before I get into the details of the bill I would like to commend our colleague from Utah [Mr. HATCH] for his willingness to work out a compromise to make S. 1430 a bipartisan package of service opportunities.

While the compromise would only authorize a modest $125 million for fiscal year 1990 and fiscal year 1991, an amount considerably lower than when S. 1430 was first proposed, it should be noted that we will have the opportunity to reauthorize the programs within the next 2 years. At that time the programs will have been tested, and if they prove to be successful, as I am confident they will, we will have every reason to increase the authorization levels and to expand the programs.

Once again the Senator from Utah has provided that there is the opportunity to reach a compromise in this institution, and to do what is necessary to try to deal with some of the pressing problems of this country.

I have had the unique pleasure and privilege to work with him on other matters, and frankly it comes as no surprise to me that he was able and willing to work out a compromise on this proposal. I commend him for that effort.

S. 1430 is comprehensive, and I would add complementary of existing service programs. States would be given the opportunity to apply a newly created Corporation for National Service for grants to expand or develop service programs. The States would apply for Federal funds to, one, develop programs for school age youth and local schools or community organizations; or, number two, expand or develop full time or summer conservation or Youth Service Corps for youths between the ages of 16 and 25; and, third, develop a community-serviced demonstration program; or, lastly, develop an innovative idea of their own outlined in the grant application.

Moreover, S. 1430 would also authorize President Bush's Points of Light Foundation to promote volunteer service in this country.

The Federal Government's commitment to inspire civic responsibility has a very long and proud tradition.

Mr. President, as we all know, it has waned since the leadership of President Kennedy in the early 1960's. "Ask not what you can do for your country" is a long long way from our "Are you better off than you were in 1980." S. 1430 would restore the Federal Government's commitment to make service attractive to young people, and to foster a service ethic in all America.

Mr. President, our country has a wide variety of problems that are literally crying out for a greater commitment to the public good. We are suffering the fallout of a decade that has seen the gulf between the affluent and poor become a very wide chasm indeed. Children, those who are in the dawn of life, are falling through the cracks of society each and every day.

Let me share some of the statistics which all of us are all too painfully aware of. One out of every four children in this country is living in poverty as the majority of homeless are families today. And 20 percent of our young people are dropping out of high schools.

Let me quickly add that in the societies of Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany those numbers hover around zero. So we begin to think in terms of competition with the 20-percent dropout rate. And, by the way, that is the national average. When you get into our cities in this country that number reaches into the 50-to 60-percent category.

Also, many of the 37 million Americans without health insurance are children. In fact, 15 million kids in this society have no health coverage whatsoever. Whatever complaints you may want to level at their parents, you cannot blame 15 million kids for not having health insurance.

Many large and small cities across this country are in a state of decay. Drugs, as we all know, are ravaging many of our cities and communities, and eroding the next generation of workers, parents, and leaders.

Mr. President, we are not going to solve all of these problems with a line item in the Federal budget. We are not going to solve them all by coming up with more taxes at the local or State level. We are going to need a commitment from all levels of government. But one of the things we ought to be able to do is to encourage Americans of all ages, of all backgrounds, to participate in doing what we can to turn some of these statistics around in this next decade. That is what the bill proposed by Senator KENNEDY, myself, Senator MIKULSKI, Senator NUNN, Senator HATCH, and others attempts to do.

It is one small piece in that puzzle. It is not going to solve the problem. But if we fail to convince Americans of all ages, of all economic levels, to participate in resolving these problems, then I would suggest to you the problems are going to become worse.

The state of affairs demands the urgent attention and leadership of every one of our citizens at all levels of government, including the Federal Government as well.

We must mobilize our human resources to attack the myriad of societal ills. We must once again call, as I said a moment ago, all Americans to service.

Americans of all ages and from all economic backgrounds and circumstances can and should feel like contributing members of our society. They just need to be asked. I will never forget when I joined the Peace Corps back in the 1960's a particular interview which I think may have had more to do with my decision, as I was in my senior year in college, to join the Peace Corps than anything else.

It was an interview with a person who had joined that Peace Corps and come back. They asked him why he had not done something like that before. His simple one line answer was, "Nobody ever asked me before."

All of sudden I remembered that there was this fellow in the White House who had asked me to do something like that. I got excited about it. I thought if he got excited about it this really might be something worth doing. That, more than anything else, is the spark that lit my interest in serving in the Peace Corps in the Dominican Republic. That event had, more to do with my adult life, with the exception of my family, than any other event or set of circumstances.

So volunteering made a big difference. It can make a big difference in others' lives as well. All we need to do in many ways is really just ask and back up our request for a greater number of opportunities for service. Young people today complain of feeling detached, isolated from society. According to a poll conducted by Peter Hart Associates, fewer young people feel compelled today to serve the community than ever before. There is little doubt that these emotions contribute to the dropout rate, low morale, substance abuse, and extremely low voter turnout of young people between the ages of 18 and 24. For the young people, for our communities, and the Nation, we need to take the necessary steps to convince young people to realize that they have tremendous potential and can contribute significantly. More importantly, we need to help young people to appreciate that each and every one of them has something to contribute to this country.

One of the best ways I know of to instill in young people a sense of pride in accomplishment is through service. As I said, I know because it happened to me. I am confident that people across this country, given the same kind of opportunities here at home, will respond to them as I did. There is nothing different from my generation than this generation, not a single thing. The difference was, in my generation there was a government that asked a generation to participate. Regretfully, we have failed to make that similar request of this generation. But they are there, they are willing ot participate, they are willing to serve. All that needs to be done is for them to be asked to participate. I think all of us are confident they will respond accordingly.

When I have the opportunity to speak to high school students in my own State I cannot emphasize enough the benefits of national community service. Last spring, when I heard testimony in Hartford on community service, middle school and high school young people discussed the enjoyment and satisfaction they experienced when tutoring or bringing food to elderly or fighting a forest fire. In particular, one witness, a young man by the name of Richard Innaimo, of the Connecticut Conservation Corps, was quoted as saying, "I am proud of what I do and the knowledge and experience I get out of CCC. I get a sense of accomplishment when I do something that will make people enjoy our State parks." Mr. President, we need to get the word out that service can be an exciting and rewarding experience.

The programs outlined in title I are designed to build on the existing structure of service opportunities available in States. There are prototypes of school, community, and conservation service programs already in place in many States in this country. In particular, title I, section C, of the modification, which I originally sponsored, to make grants available to States for conservation and youth service corps programs, would build on model programs already in place in some 20 States.

Title I section (c) of the bill is really taking advantage of a program that already exists in some 20 States. It is a tested program that has already been working extremely well. The participants in the existing Conservation Corps, for instance, have already made enormous contributions to our country. Just in 1989, corps members from around the country traveled to Yellowstone, SC, and California to help rebuild communities and parks devastated by fires, earthquakes, and hurricanes.

It is not enough to make service opportunities more available to Americans. The programs have to be affordable to the sponsors and participants. S. 1430 attempts to make service more affordable for all Americans. To help defray living expenses, States could provide participants in the full-time programs stipends not to exceed the poverty level for a family of two, $8,020. For each year of service participants would also receive a voucher, not to exceed $5,000, to invest in an education or the purchase of a first home.

Some will say that is not volunteering. If you are going to provide a stipend at the poverty level and you are going to provide additional resources to encourage one's further education, then you are actually engaging in a contradition of terms here; this is not volunteering, it is fully paying someone. I suppose in an absolute literal sense there is some merit to that.

I was a Peace Corps volunteer, I was paid $5,000 a year; $100 a month, to pay for my rent and food in the small village I lived in in the Dominican Republic. I was one of the more affluent people in town. At $100 a month I guess I could suggest I was not a volunteer. My house cost $13 a month, my food was $30 a month, my laundry was $5 a month, and the rest was considered excess, I suppose, if you will. That made me one of the richest guys in town. But in a sense I think I was a volunteer at $100 a month. Certainly in this country today if you are living at the poverty level and putting money away for one's education is roughly the same thing.

Second, I would add, volunteering ought not to be something one can do because you are affluent enough to do it. If your suggestion would be that the only people who could volunteer would be the people who would not have to accept the stipend or would not have to accept some assistance for furthering their education, then you will eliminate some of the very people who may benefit the most from volunteering.

I mentioned a moment ago about speaking to high school students in Hartford, CT, who were involved in volunteer programs. Some of those young people were the poorest people in Hartford, CT, who were volunteers, out there doing a good job. They had a sense of participation and contribution.

Mr. President, I see that the Chair is interested in moving on to another matter.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to yield.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM 12:45 P.M. UNTIL 2:15 P.M.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand the order is to recess at 12:30, am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to 12:45, and that the Senator from Connecticut be permitted to conclude his remarks and, as I understand, the Senator from California wants to make some remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts and I will be very, very brief here.

But the point is Mr. President, that volunteering ought not to be something that one is affluent enough to do.

When I joined the Peace Corps in early 1950's, I certainly could afford to do it in many ways. I was fortunate enough to grow up in a home where my parents could afford to pay for my education. I did not have to get involved in a lot of student loans or a lot of debt to pay for my college education. I am not sure my parents would be able to do that today given the cost of education.

When I went off and joined the Peace Corps, I could do so. I did not have to go to work and immediately pay off student loans. Today we would like to attract all people to service and including people who dropped out of school. And what title I says is, you do not have to have a high school education or high school diploma to participate.

I talked to some young people here in Maryland who were involved in a conservation program. Many of them had dropped out of school and were attracted and drawn into this conservation program. And, in every single case, every one of them had gone back and gotten a high school diploma. Every single one of them said the reason they did so was because of the positive experience they had had as volunteers in the Conservation Corps program of Maryland, and that they felt with an education they could even do more.

So, volunteering ought not to just be for middle- or upper-class folks. It ought to be available as well to the poor and people who have not completed a high school education. And title I is designed to do it. Volunteering is not only good for the recipient of a volunteer service, it is extremely good for the volunteer. It can give a person who has never had the sense of self-worth and accomplishment that experience for the first time in their lives.

So our title I is designed to build on existing programs and to make volunteering something available to all Americans, even though there is a cost involved here of a living stipend and an educational grant assistance program to put money aside to further one's education.

S. 1430 will make service more affordable for college graduates with outstanding student loan costs. In the 1986 Higher Education Act reauthorization, I sponsored a provision which partially cancels the direct student loans of Peace Corps and Vista volunteers. These benefits would be extended to cover Stafford student loans as well, thanks to the provisions in S. 1430 first introduced by Senator BUMPERS. Furthermore, provisions authored by Senator BUMPERS would allow participants in Peace Corps-type positions with tax-exempt community service organizations to also qualify for the loan forgiveness.

Opponents of S. 1430 will argue that the Federal Government should not be spending this kind of money for volunteers. I think I have addressed that point as effectively as I know how. It does involve a commitment of some dollars. But if we can reduce the dropout rates of young Americans, if we can increase the literacy of people who dropped out of school or who have fallen through the cracks, if we can improve on a health care system, if we can improve the feeding conditions, nutrition programs of elderly Americans, there is no way you can calculate the dollars saved by becoming involved in programs like this.

I do not think anyone would argue with the notion that we would be saving millions of dollars if we can save some of these people, make them more self-sufficient or reduce the likelihood they are going to have serious health problems.

This bill allows us to do that, allows us to invest small amounts of money and reap tremendous benefits for the recipients as well as those who will be motivated to serve our great Nation.

There are a lot of problems in our country. Again this bill will not solve all of them but it comes close to at least making it possible for all Americans to participate in the resolution of these problems.

I again commend our colleague from Massachusetts for bringing these various ideas together; our colleague from Utah for being a significant, positive and, once again, contributing factor to the development of this legislation; my colleague from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI], who has been deeply involved and interested in the subject matter for a long, long time; and Senator NUNN for his deep interest in national service.

I hope that our colleagues will support and adopt this legislation before too long.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I wish to once again pay tribute to the Senator from Connecticut for his strong commitment in voluntarism and in service. He has demonstrated that with his own life's commitment as a volunteer in the Peace Corps, and he has been one of the strongest and most active members of our committee in the shaping of this legislation. He is also chairman of a subcommittee of our Committee on Human Resources that extends the various other voluntary programs, the ACTION Program and others. They have all benefited from his oversight and involvement. As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, he continues to pursue the support for the Peace Corps. He and I can remember it was not long ago when there were attempts by the administration to basically emasculate that program, that has been so successful.

So we are indeed grateful for not only his strong statement but for the very commendable work that he has involved himself in in this area as well as many others.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado be temporarily set aside. The Senator from Colorado has agreed to this procedure.

AMENDMENT NO. 1263

(Purpose: To provide for national service in programs involving drug and alcohol abuse, education and treatment and for other purposes)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] proposes an amendment numbered 1263.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 19, line 18, strike "and".

On page 19, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following:

(L) disclose whether the program plans include preventing and treating school age drug and alcohol abuse and dependency; and

On page 19, line 19, strike "(L)" and insert (M).

On page 35, line 5, after "facilities," insert "activities that focus on drug and alcohol abuse education, prevention and treatment,".

On page 53, line 4, strike "and".

On page 53, after the semicolon, insert "and".

On page 53, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following:

(C) service in programs engaged in the education, prevention, and treatment of drug and alcohol abuse, including care programs for cocaine-addicted babies;

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I could take a long time to discuss the philosophy and notion encapsulated in this bill. I have listened with attention to my friend from Connecticut and others. The Senator from Connecticut cited various experiences he has had with reference to the joy and fulfillment that comes from the kind of services that he described here, including the Peace Corps.

I might say to my good friend I am very privileged in that I happen to have a lot of children. They are now almost grown. My twins are 22, and I have eight children, so they are the babies. I can tell you there is no question that the young people—and I know this is not just a young people bill, but the young people of this country truly yearn for an opportunity to help others. As a matter of fact, I think we are remiss because our society is so built around competition and success and getting a niche in life that it is very difficult for it to find a niche for those who want to take a little time in an orderly and organized way and be helpful to others. We have a difficult time structuring that because it is obvious that is not the prime activity of the country. We have to get along with our economic concerns, our private sector development, and jobs. But I do not need my family to be convinced that we ought to provide more opportunity for young people to help other young people, or to participate in being helpful to those in need.

Having said that, my amendment is a simple one. At various places in the bill where we mention and describe specific service activities, knowing full well that those were not intended to be all inclusive, I have asked that in each of those three places in the bill we include drug treatment and drug-related preventative activities in the scope of community service in which we are encouraging American citizens, young and old, under this bill to participate.

It would not necessarily be excluded if my amendment is not part of the bill, but I think the managers of the bill agree with me that it would serve well to list drug prevention and related activities as one of the areas where we would like our citizens to help other citizens in various social service modes. That is essentially the amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I commend the Senator from New Mexico for this amendment. What it would do is, in the various school-based systems, it would make a part of the application that an indication that there are drug and alcohol education programs, and, second, it would make the drug and alcohol treatment programs, rehabilitation programs, prevention programs in the community eligible for these kinds of activities. This is completely consistent with what we intend with this program. I think it is a useful and valuable amendment. I urge the Senate to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question occurs on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI].

The amendment (No. 1263) was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, let me commend my colleague from New Mexico for this amendment and thank him, as well, for his remarks. He has almost a whole youth corps right there under his own roof with eight children. Having been one of six, I can relate to what that experience is like. And I have had the opportunity to meet a number of his children. He and his lovely wife have done a fantastic job with that crew of theirs. I am not surprised at all they are anxious to participate and volunteer.

AMENDMENT NO. 1264

(Purpose: To ensure that Indian tribes are eligible to receive grants under all subtitles of title I)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of Senator CONRAD and ask unanimous consent that the Armstrong amendment be temporarily set aside and that we proceed to the consideration of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Hearing no objection, it is so ordered. The Armstrong amendment is set aside.

The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], for Mr. CONRAD, proposes an amendment numbered 1264.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 26, line after line 19, add the following new section:

SEC. 117. TREATMENT OF INDIAN TRIBES.

An Indian tribe shall be treated the same as a State for purposes of making grants under this subtitle.

On page 27, between lines 20 and 21, insert the following new paragraph:

(3) INDIAN TRIBES.—An Indian tribe shall be treated the same as a State for purposes of making grants under this subtitle.

On page 52, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following new subsection:

(h) INDIAN TRIBES.—An Indian tribe shall be treated the same as a State for purposes of making grants under this subtitle.

On page 66, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following new subsection:

(d) INDIAN TRIBES.—An Indian tribe shall be treated the same as a State for purposes of making grants under this subtitle.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, this amendment will ensure that Indian reservations are eligible to participate in community service programs regardless of whether their States do so.

Indian reservations stand to benefit substantially from the programs proposed in S. 1430. Community service will help Indian youth learn about the interworkings of their communities and of government, while at the same time providing valuable contributions that make a difference close to home.

Reservations in North Dakota and elsewhere have unemployment rates that reach as high as 80 percent. They frequently need assistance in water, sanitation and various natural resource areas. They need housing improvements. And like any other community, they need enlightened leadership.

Community service opportunities for Indian youth and for others in their communities will help reservations build for the future. There are many benefits that this legislation can provide to reservations, and I am pleased to offer this amendment today.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment basically clarifies that Indian tribes are eligible to receive grants directly from the Federal Government to operate a Conservation Corps or Youth Service Corps. It is completely consistent with our intentions, and it is supported by my colleague, the Senator from Utah.

We are prepared to support that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, offered by the distinguished chairman.

The amendment (No. 1264) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we are looking for our colleague and friend from Colorado to see if we cannot have a disposition of that legislation. I believe that we will, at 4:30 when we resume consideration of this bill.

We are prepared to consider the remaining amendments. We have been able to dispose of a number of those amendments. There are, perhaps, at least that have been communicated to me, a half a dozen that need our attention. So I ask our colleagues on both sides of the aisle, when we resume consideration of this bill, if they would be good enough to come to the floor and offer these amendments.

We are prepared to debate these amendments. We support some. We will be glad to work out with our colleagues as many of those that can be worked out.

Hopefully, we can move along. We have had a good discussion of this legislation yesterday. To my knowledge, we have yet to have anyone speak in opposition to it. There are some ideas that we will have to address. Some we support, some we do not feel should be a part of this legislation. But we are glad to get to them this afternoon.

We know we have other urgent business here on the agenda, so we are eager to dispose of these matters as quickly as we can.

I hope our colleagues will come to the floor immediately after the cloture vote and be prepared to dispose of these amendments.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am delighted that the National and Community Service Act has finally reached the floor, and contains my original proposal to establish a National Service Demonstration program with educational benefits.

As one who has been a longtime advocate of national service, I am very encouraged by the considerable national attention this issue has now received.

We are at the point where we should enact a demonstration program of voluntary national service involving a strong community service and education component. The demonstration program contained in this bill will enable us to test the concept of national service, and to gain valuable information in several areas.

First, this demonstration program will enable us to learn how much interest there is in community service. While community service programs exist on many college campuses today, we do not have detailed information on either the extent or the depth of student interest in this area. Consequently, before we embark on a full-blown program, it is, to my mind, very important that we have this kind of information.

Second, we do not know the kind of people who will be interested in community service. The demonstration program will accomplish that by giving us crucial information on the socioeconomic background of those who participate.

Third, the demonstration program would give us a much better idea of just how expensive a comprehensive program might be, and would enable us to judge whether or not we could afford such a program given the severe budgetary constraints confronting us. Estimates are that a comprehensive program could cost as much as $50 billion a year, and that would most certainly place any program beyond our reach. The demonstration program would enable us to determine whether or not such an estimate is accurate, as well as whether or not we could get along with a more limited program.

This legislation also involves a commitment to what I consider a very important concept, namely that successful completion of community service should involve an educational benefit. Most important, the educational benefit should supplement, and not replace, our existing, proven Federal student aid programs.

It would be cruel, indeed, to replace programs that today serve over 6 million students with one that would serve less with less assistance, and would require a special obligation of service by the poor simply because they are poor.

Mr. President, under the provisions of my demonstration program, citizens of all ages could elect to serve in either a full- or part-time community service program. Participants would be paid a stipend during their tenure. Such a provision would open the doors of community service to all Americans—rich or poor. Without stipends, community service would become the domain of the rich, or those able to depend on others for financial support during their tenure. Such people do not make up the majority of Americans.

When participants successfully complete the community service requirement, they would be entitled to receive an educational benefit of $5,000 for each year of full-time service and $2,000 for each year of part-time service. The stipend could either be used at an institution of higher education or for enrollment in an apprentice and training program. A second option is to use the voucher for a down payment on a home.

It is appropriate, indeed, that the fulfillment of two aspects of the American dream—home ownership and a college education—are made more obtainable by this bill. For millions of American families, these two goals are of utmost importance. I am proud to be part of such an innovative program and look forward to the benefits it will bring to so many citizens in our Nation.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:45 p.m. having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until 2:15 p.m.

Thereupon, at 12:45 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2:15 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. KOHL].

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

MOTION TO PROCEED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). Under the previous order, the hour of 2:15 p.m. having arrived, there will now be 2 hours of debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 212, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE].

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that no time be charged against either side on the quorum call.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume. My purpose in asking consent that the time not be charged against either side was to assure that both conferences were completed and that the Republican leader was here. That was my only purpose in doing that. I ask unanimous consent therefore that the vote on cloture be extended accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, while listening to the proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212 in the course of last week's debate, I had occasion to recall the words of that most eloquent interpreter of Whig historical philosophy, the 19th century English scholar Thomas McCaulay, who, in his famous essay entitled "History," penned the following words:

No picture then, and no history, can present us with the whole truth; but those are the best pictures and the best histories which exhibit such parts of the truth as most nearly produce the effect of the whole. He who is deficient in the art of selection may, by showing nothing but the truth, produce all the effect of the greatest falsehood.

As one after another I heard my colleagues present tiny pieces of the complicated history of Turkish-Armenian relations during the years 1915-23 as if they were revealing the greater truth, I realized that despite my firmly held contention that this body is not the place to judge history, I still have a responsibility to try to ensure that the selections presented here do not—and I quote McCaulay again—"produce all the effect of the greatest falsehood."

Throughout last week's debate, we heard countless references to our American envoy to the Ottoman Empire, Ambassador Henry Morgenthau, as a primary supporter for the view that the deaths of Ottoman Armenians between 1915 and 1923 are best termed a "genocide." However, a review of the chronology in question establishes a number of interesting and indisputable facts: First, Ambassador Morgenthau's tenure in Turkey covered only the first 9 months (from April 24, 1915-January 31, 1916) of the 108 months covered by the resolution. In other words, both his reports and his expertise are clearly confined to less than 10 percent of the period encompassed by the dates 1915-23, and those the first 10 months at that.

It was another American envoy, Mark L. Bristol, who, first as U.S. high commissioner and later as Ambassador served in Turkey for over 50 percent of the period covered by the resolution (from February 1919-December 1923), that is, for 59 of the 108 months covered by the resolution's dates. In addition, as Bristol's tenure encompassed the second half of the period in question, he had the advantage of having access to all the reports and written records of his predecessors, including those of Morgenthau.

Realistically, we might have expected that the proponents of the resolution would have made frequent reference to the reports, letters, opinions of Admiral Bristol, who, by their own reasoning was the highest ranking American witness throughout 5 years of what they would have us believe was a Turkish perpetrated genocide lasting 9 years against their minority Armenian population.

A careful perusal of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 20-22, 1990, does not uncover a single reference in the speeches of the resolution's proponents to the views of Bristol. One can not help but wonder why? Bristol was a prolific writer, and the "Papers of Adm. Mark Lambert Bristol," housed just blocks away from us in the "Library of Congress," comprise some 33,000 items, including reports, diaries, correspondence, copies of official dispatches, telegrams and appointment sheets. By far, the overwhelming majority of this material dates from his tenure in Turkey.

Throughout Bristol's sojourn in Turkey he received almost daily reports from hundreds of American missionaries, relief workers, as well as from his own intelligence staff, as to events in the countryside. Included in these reports was a great deal of material concerning Turco-Armenian relations. Even a cursory examination of the "Bristol papers" establishes the fact that the Admiral had a thorough grasp of the complexities involved. Far from endorsing the one-sided view of Armenians as innocent victims, and Turks as guilty perpetrators, Bristol clearly understood that there was plenty of blame to go around. The following passage from a letter dated August 14, 1920, from Bristol to a Mr. Walter H. Bradley of the Pepperell Manufacturing Company in Boston, MA, is typical of the way he expressed the struggle between the two peoples:

It is an unfortunate fact that the Armenians have practically the same traits as the other races in this part of the world. It is a fact that whichever race is in power vents its revenge upon the subordinate races, especially the members of that race which may have previously been in power over the race now exercising power. I have it from absolute first-hand information that the Armenians in the caucasus attacked Tartar (Turkish) villages that are utterly defenseless and bombarded these villages with artillery and then murder the inhabitants, pillage the village and often burn the village. (Bristol Papers, General Correspondence: Container #32-Bristol to Bradley Letter of September 14, 1920.)

Clearly, Bristol, rather than being an advocate for one position or another, visualized his role as commissioner/ambassador, to accurately report to his superiors in Washington on what was occurring in the Ottoman Empire. In short, Bristol interpreted his brief to mean that rather than advance the partisan claims of one or another ethnic group, it was his job to provide Washington with an objective analysis of the situation on the ground. This meant that he recognized the strengths and weaknesses of all the peoples living in the region.

Through the objective eye of the trained observer, Admiral Bristol wrote these words:

These races in the Near East are all very much the same, and if you put them all in a bag and shake them up you would not know which one would come out first. (L.C.-Bristol Papers, General Correspondence: Container #33. Letter of December 27, 1920 from Bristol to Mr. Walter George Smith.)

In a letter to James Barton, the Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, written on March 28, 1921, Bristol wrote:

I see that reports are being freely circulated in the United States that the Turks massacred thousands of Armenians in the caucasus. Such reports are repeated so many times it makes my blood boil. The "Near East relief" have the reports from Yarrow and our own American people which show absolutely that such Armenian reports are absolutely false. (L.C.-Bristol Papers, General Correspondence, Container #34.)

James Barton replied to Bristol on May 6, 1921, in the following terms:

With reference to the false reports that come through reporting massacres of the Armenians by the Turks. There is no one who can deprecate this more than I do. But there is a situation over here (in the U.S.) which is hard to describe. There is a brilliant young Armenian, a graduate of Yale University, by the name of Cardashian. He is a lawyer, with offices down in Wall Street, I believe. He has organized a committee so-called which has never met and which is never consulted, with Mr. Gerard (former U.S. Ambassador to Germany) as chairman. Cardashian is the whole thing. He has set up what he calls an Armenian publicity bureau or something of that kind, and has a letterhead printed. Gerard signs everything that Cardashian writes. He told me this himself one time. * * * We have had many a conference with Armenian leaders as to what can be done to stop this vicious propaganda carried on by Cardashian. He is constantly reporting atrocities which never occurred and giving endless misinformation with regard to the situation in Armenia and in Turkey. (L.C.—Bristol Papers, General Correspondence: Container #34.)

One cannot help but be struck by the similarity between Mr. Cardashian's activities in 1921, activities designed to portray the Turks as vicious killers before the Court of American Public Opinion and the intent of Senate Joint Resolution 212 today. Nor, when one reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 20, 1990, (S1212-S1214) which contains an attack on the 69 leading American authorities on Turkish studies in this country, by yet another Armenian attorney, this one, Van Z. Krikorian, Director of government and legal affairs for the Armenian Assembly of America, can one fail to recall Barton's comments on the propaganda activities of Mr. Cardashian. Lawyers, as well as Senators, would be well advised to leave historical determinations to those trained to make them.

Clearly, as even these few examples from the papers of Adm. Mark L. Bristol, our envoy to the Ottoman Empire, between February 1919 and the end of December 1923 establish, he was one first hand official American observer who did not feel that the human tragedy which affected the Ottoman Empire in those years could be called a Turkish perpetrated genocide of Armenians as stated in the wording of Senate Joint Resolution 212. To the contrary, Bristol's comments leave no doubt in the mind of any objective reader but that he: (a) Viewed the conflict as a tragic civil war which took the lives of Turks and Armenians alike; and, (b) that he was seriously disturbed by efforts to portray that human tragedy as a sectarian suffering of Armenians at the hands of Turks. While in no way excusing any excesses committed by the Ottoman authorities against nonbelligerent Armenians, the facts are clear; namely the Ottoman rulers had every reason to doubt the loyalty of large numbers of their indigenous Armenian population. Likewise, when two people are fighting a war with one another, the casualties can hardly be termed victims of a "genocide."

Last week, the credibility of Prof. Bernard Lewis, the Emeritus Cleveland Dodge professor at Princeton University, and the present director of the Annenberg Institute in Philadelphia, PA, was challenged by a statement on this floor on the grounds that his opposition to the resolution's terming the tragic events, of 1915-23 a "genocide" contradicts earlier statements on the subject made by Lewis in his 1961 study entitled: "The Emergence of Modern Turkey." It was said on this floor that, "Lewis actually wrote that the Armenians suffered 'the terrible Holocaust of 1915, where a million and a half Armenians perished.'"

In point of fact, Mr. President, had the entire passage from the Lewis book been read, we all would have realized that this distinguished scholar's 1961 position was quite in keeping with the sentiments expressed in the "sixty-nine Scholars' Statement" made in 1985. Lewis describes the events leading up to 1915 in the following terms:

Most tragic was the case of the Armenians, who at the beginning of the 19th century were still known as the Millet-I Sadika, the 'loyal community.' . . . The political and cultural impact of russian Armenia on the one hand, and the new national and liberal ideas coming from Europe on the other, powerfully affected the Ottoman Armenians . . . and stimulated the growth of an ardent and active Armenian nationalist movement.

For the Turks, the Armenian movement was the deadliest of all threats. From the conquered lands of the Serbs, Bulgars, Albanians, and Greeks, they could, however reluctantly, withdraw, abandoning distant provinces and bringing the imperial frontier nearer home. But the Armenians, stretching across Turkey in Asia from the caucasian frontier to the Mediterranean coast, lay in the very heart of the Turkish homeland—and to renounce these lands would have meant not the truncation, but the dissolution of the Turkish state. Turkish and Armenian villages, inextricably mixed, had for centuries lived in neighborly association. Now a desperate struggle between them began—a struggle between two nations for a single homeland, that ended with the terrible Holocaust of 1915, when a million and a half Armenians perished. (Lewis Emergence: p. 356.)

So, Mr. President, the sentiments expressed in the passage that I have just read, written in 1961, are fully in keeping with the following section of the "sixty-nine scholars statement," to which Professor Lewis affixed his signature:

As for the charge of "genocide." No signatory of this statement wishes to minimize the scope of Armenian suffering. We are likewise cognizant that it cannot be viewed as separate from the suffering experienced by the Muslim inhabitants of the region. The weight of evidence so far uncovered points in the direction of serious intercommunal warfare (perpetrated by Muslim and Christian irregular forces), complicated by disease, famine, suffering and massacres in Anatolia and adjoining areas during the First World War. Indeed, throughout the years in question, the region was the scene of more or less continuous warfare, not unlike the tragedy which has gone on in Lebanon for the past decade. The resulting death toll among both Muslim and Christian communities in the region was immense. But much more remains to be discovered before historians will be able to sort out precisely responsibility between warring and innocent, and to identify the causes for the events which resulted in the death or removal of large numbers of the eastern Anatolian population, Christian and Muslim alike.

Clearly, Bernard Lewis in 1961 believed, just as he did a quarter century later in 1985, that the tragedy which affected Armenians and Turks alike during the First World War resulted, not for some kind of "genocidal" plot on the part of Turkey, but, rather from a tragic civil conflict between two peoples fighting over a single homeland. In short, nationalism run amuck.

How many died as a result of this conflict? Last week, my colleague, Senator SIMON, answered that query in the following terms:

. . . at a minimum, hundreds of thousands of people were slain simply because they were Armenian. That is the reality. Many will put that number higher. I wish there were a good scholarly book. If there is anyone from a university press watching this proceeding, I hope someone will do it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, February 22, 1990, S1428.)

I am happy to be able to inform my colleague that someone has done it. I have in my hands a copy of a demographic history on the very question he raised, which, in keeping with his suggestion, was published by a major American university press, that of New York University, copyright 1983. Its author, Prof. Justin McCarthy, is chairman of the history department at the University of Louisville in Kentucky, and a scholar whose expertise in this subject is so universally recognized by his peers that he has chosen to write the entry on "demography" in the major reference work in the field of Middle Eastern studies, "The Encyclopaedia of Islam." Nor has his expertise been ignored by our own Government. Professor McCarthy holds perhaps the unique honor of having held a National Science Foundation "national needs post-doctoral fellowship in demography" and a National Endowment for the Humanities "senior fellow" grant in history. In short, his 1983 book, "Muslims and Minorities: The Population of Ottoman Anatolia and the End of the Empire," is exactly the study my colleague Senator SIMON bemoaned the lack of. I should like to share with my colleagues this distinguished scholar's conclusions as to the fate of the Anatolian population in the years covered by Senator DOLE's resolution.

I quote from pages 137 and 138 of Professor McCarthy's book:

The pattern of mortality in Anatolia was both geographic and ethnic. Those in the regions of Anatolia with a high proportion of Christian inhabitants were very likely to have died. This was true regardless of the religious or ethnic group of the inhabitant. While Christian-Muslim warfare was with foreign invasion, at the root of the Anatolian mortality, it is an error to speak of Greek deaths, Muslim deaths, or Armenian deaths as if each somehow had a separate existence. To mention the sufferings of one group and avoid those of another gives a false picture of what was a human, not simply an ethnic, disaster.

In the east, the areas of Muslim deaths and Armenian deaths were almost perfectly correlated. From all evidence, the "Six Vilâyets" of the Armenian homeland were the area of the greatest number of Armenian deaths. Some 40% of the total Armenian population of Anatolia died, but the percentage must have been higher in the "Six Vilâyets." In the same area, the Muslims suffered their worst mortality. In numbers, the Muslims lost many more persons than did the Armenians, in percentage of total population, less. The great mortality of both Muslims and Armenians does not fit into any theory that posits one group of murderers, another group murdered. Both Muslims and Christians were killers, both Muslims and Christians were killed.

In the west it was much the same. The number of Muslim deaths was greater and the percentage of Christian deaths was higher though figures for both Christians and Muslims are greatly affected by the need to consider large areas of Anatolia in the figures of table 7.13. Because of the effect of post-war migration and lack of knowledge of the home provinces of Greek refugees, a very large geographic area, including many relatively tranquil provinces, was selected for table 7.13. Actual mortality in war areas such as Aydin Province must have been much higher for both groups.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time for now. I hope that the other side will produce a speaker.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I have been waiting in the wings, Mr. President. I just left the floor a moment ago, because Senator DOLE has just returned from a commitment in the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I spoke at some length last Thursday in support of the resolution and sought the floor to do so again today.

I believe that a good starting point in support of the resolution is a comment which was made by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] when he made the comment that there was reason to doubt the loyalty of Armenians. I believe that that is the starting point for what is the crux of the issue, that Armenians were subject to massacre solely because they were Armenian. When the fighting was going on, the Ottoman Empire turned on Armenians, not only men who were noncombatants but women and children who were conclusively noncombatants. They turned on the Armenians simply because they were Armenians.

You cannot justify that conduct by the contention that there was reason to doubt the loyalty of Armenians. You cannot justify the massacre of noncombatant men and obviously noncombatant women and children there was reason to doubt the loyalty of the Armenians. What we are really saying is an extension of the concept of guilt by assocation to the action of death by association.

Mr. BYRD. Would the distinguished Senator yield for what I believe is a correction? I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. SPECTER. I am pleased to do so.

Mr. BYRD. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia said anything about his doubting the loyalty of Armenians. I was quoting from the text. It was not my words. These were not my words.

Mr. SPECTER. I am pleased to add that modification. I had heard the Senator from West Virginia say, "There was reason to doubt the loyalty of Armenians," and I was not certain in that context that it was a quotation from another text. The Senator from West Virginia did quote extensively from other texts and I am glad to accept that modification.

Moving from the modification, I would then contend that the core argument from the source cited by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia puts the issue squarely in the context which I would submit shows the impropriety of that kind of reasoning and the propriety of the categorization of this conduct is being genocide and that the argument follows that when the authority cited by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia seeks to justify the conduct of the Ottoman Empire, because there was reason to doubt the loyalty of Armenians, that they are really picking out women and children who were obviously noncombatants, and some men who were noncombatants, and subjecting them to massacres because they were Armenians.

As I had started to develop the point, there is an obvious repugnance under U.S. law to guilt by association. That is a concept which has been the subject of numerous court decisions and conclusions on civil liberties. Here we have not only the concept of guilt by association, but we have the action by association, the action of death by association.

I believe, Mr. President, that that really is the core issue of what constitutes genocide, and that is the picking out of people for extermination solely because they belong to a certain race or a certain religion or a certain ethnic group. Here the categorization was by virtue of being Armenian. It is in the context where people are killed simply because of that categorization that we have the essence of genocide.

Mr. President, I believe that there are two questions which have arisen as a result of the extensive floor debate on this subject. One is, did genocide occur? And, the second is, should United States strategic interests with Turkey take precedence over the human rights issue involved here?

I believe it is a fair statement that the evidence which has been presented on the Senate floor supports an affirmative answer to the first question; that is, "Did genocide occur?"

In my presentation last Thursday, Mr. President, I cited extensive authorities on the facts, the most persuasive of which for me was what former Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, Henry Morgenthau, said. Ambassador Morgenthau held the position of Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire during the critical period from 1913 to 1916. So he was there contemporaneously with the events. I cited—and I read them into the RECORD and will not repeat them today—example after example of atrocities, placing the number of Armenians subject to massacre between 60,000 and 1 million. That question had arisen during the course of the comments by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, of even greater weight to this Senator was the submission of statements from Armenians in Pennsylvania who took an active interest in this matter after the issue came before the Judiciary Committee last October. I read into the RECORD statements from Armenians, now Americans, now Pennsylvanians, who are living in this country, attesting to what they personally observed: The murder of a father, the mother of a mother, the murder of a brother and of a sister, in this specific context.

One of these statements was submitted by a man who was 104 years old. Another was submitted by an individual 92 years old. Others were in their eighties.

Senator DOLE had in his office earlier today a group of people who are now living in the United States who were in Armenia at that time, an elderly group, principally from Pennsylvania, a few from New Jersey. They, again, provide live testimony to what the facts were.

I had expressed the opinion and made the comment last Thursday, that I had some doubts on October 17 when this issue came before the Judiciary Committee as to whether this resolution should be supported. I expressed those doubts on the record in the Judiciary Committee, and I think the Presiding Officer was there, as a member of the committee, on that day when we took the issue up.

Those doubts centered on two points: Whether it was appropriate for the Senate to make an historic determination; and second, what the facts were. I was not prepared last October 17 to speak on the subject, as to what the facts were.

I have since thought through the matter at some length and have concluded that the issue of human rights is so important that the Senate should speak on it. It is a matter of overwhelming importance, in fact, a tribute to the Senate that so many people are paying so much attention to this issue.

We might think Senators might express themselves on this issue and take a vote and it would not attract much attention. But it has attracted worldwide attention, with very active lobbying efforts on all sides. I think that is a tribute to our institution. And I think, second, it is a tribute to the importance of human rights, which we are seeing all over the world.

Institutions are crumbling. Elections are being held, like the one the day before yesterday in Nicaragua, which are stunning in their upset quality because of concern for human rights. Governments have toppled one after another in Eastern Europe because of the concern for human rights. The Soviet Union has gone to plural political parties because of concern for human rights.

It is for those reasons, Mr. President, that I think we should give a resounding "no" to the second question, "Should United States strategic interests with Turkey take precedence over human rights?" Because our strategic interests with Turkey, in NATO, are to advance values which are important to the United States: The value of democracy, the value of freedom, the value of security. What human right is more fundamental than the right to exist? What more fundamental human right than the right to exist in the context of protecting your own life?

How can a child protect his or her own life when there are adults with weapons bent on massacre? How can a woman, or for that matter a noncombatant man, protect their lives? Here we have what is obviously the most basic of human rights.

So, when the Senate voted 49 to 49 last Thursday on this cloture motion, it seemed to me to be a very delicate balance, as the Senate is wont to do from time to time, between the Armenian interests and the interests asserted by the Turkish Government.

I hope there would be a stronger vote today. I hope we would have cloture so we can proceed to the merit of the issue.

In conclusion, I would like to again make the point that this resolution does not call into any criticism the current Turkish Government or the Turkish people. We are talking about what was done by the Ottoman Empire in another day.

I have friends on both sides of this issue, friends who are espousing the side of the Armenians, friends who are espousing the side of the Turkish Government—the side of one distinguished Pennsylvanian, I put his comments in the RECORD, Ayhan Hakimoglu, last Thursday.

When we talk about the Turkish Government as a friend of the United States Government, I do not think this should have any effect on those friendship relationships, just as there should not be any effect on the friendship relationship of any individual Senator who votes here with people who are on the other side of the issue. If friends cannot tolerate an honest expression of opinion on a matter of great importance like this, then we have a real question as to the solidity or the underpinning of the friendship.

But on the facts, Mr. President, and on the law, it seems to me this resolution should be adopted, and I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of cloture.

I thank my distinguished colleagues from Kansas for allocating this time to me, and I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator, the Republican leader, allow me to take 1 minute?

Mr. DOLE. I will be happy to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in response to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, I indicated earlier that I was quoting someone else. What happened was, I had been quoting a former United States envoy to Turkey who had served as Ambassador to Turkey and also the United States High Commissioner, and it was in the context and background of those quotes—and other quotes, which I did not read into the record—that I said, "The Ottoman rulers had every reason to doubt the loyalty of large numbers of their indigenous Armenian population. Likewise, when two peoples are fighting in a war with one another, the casualties can hardly be termed victims of a genocide."

So those were my words but, I was not speaking as ROBERT BYRD in doubting the loyalty of the Armenians.

I was saying that the Ottoman rulers had every reason to doubt the loyalty of large numbers of their indigenous population. That is against the background of the quotations that I used, and some that I did not use, from the papers of the former U.S. Ambassador and High Commissioner, Admiral Bristol.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, may I take a moment to thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for that explanation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] is on his way to the floor, as are both Senators from Massachusetts. I suggest it might be a good time for anybody who wants some time on this side—we only have an hour on each side. As I understand, I have about 48 minutes left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct; 48 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from West Virginia has about 36 minutes left. I would like to reserve at least the last 12 minutes to close the debate on this side of the issue.

While I am waiting for additional speakers, I want to thank, first of all, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania for his thoughtful statement and his willingness to keep an open mind on this issue until he had a chance to study it, and he did study it for weeks. He had a number of visits with Armenians, and some who are here today. Some remembered their mothers, fathers, sisters, and brothers who were slaughtered during this period. We met with these people this morning. The oldest is 99 years of age; the youngest is 76. Most were in their early eighties. They are here for one reason. They are not able, in most cases, to run around the Capitol and buttonhole Senators. They do not have wealth and influence; they do not have an Armenian Embassy; they do not have an ambassador here; there is nobody to help them out.

They feel so strongly about this issue, just as strongly as members of the Jewish community felt a few years ago when we were arguing the Genocide Convention. They would not rest easy until at least they came to Washington, DC, and for many of them it is the first time they have been here. They do not want anything. They are not endangering anyone. Some said today they cannot sleep at night thinking about what happened in the years 1915 to 1923.

One of the group called my attention to the speech last week by President Havel of Czechoslovakia. We all went over to hear this outstanding statement by a man who just a few short months ago was in prison and is now the President of Czechoslovakia. He said a lot of things that got our attention, but I think the one thing that really caught the attention of most of my colleagues and most of the people who were watching him around the world, was: "In other words, we still do not know how to put morality ahead of politics, science, and economics. We are still incapable of understanding that the only genuine backbone of all of our actions if they are to be moral is responsibility." The bottom line is, he said, put morality ahead of politics: What is right and what is wrong.

There is no doubt in my mind what is right in this case and no doubt in my mind some Senators, who are opposing us on this motion, know they are wrong, but they have made commitments for a number of reasons they say they cannot betray. We had 60 Senators committed to support the resolution. Some of those yielded on those commitments.

But the issue is right or wrong, and I defy anybody to go in the back and read the headlines that appeared in the New York Times and other papers. I mentioned this a number of times. Part of them are combined in this book called "The Armenian Genocide." There are hundreds of pages of news accounts, papers around the world, all over this country, talking about how women were sold, how children were starved, how people were slaughtered, and I have yet to hear a voice that those are not accurate.

I read the other day at least two times the statement by Talaat, the Minister of the Interior, who had information that they were feeding some of the Armenian children in orphanages. They did not want to feed the Armenian children. They wanted to starve the Armenian children. And so he sent this directive, which appears at the back of the Chamber, in which he makes it very clear you are not to give any sustenance to these children; they are Armenians. They are not worth saving, in other words; starve them to death. Is that inhumanity to man? I think so.

I think we have demonstrated—the Senator from Pennsylvania has—it is pretty clearly genocide. Some people say, oh, that is the problem. If you take out the word "genocide," we might vote for this. In my view, all these are faulty arguments and have been faulty arguments raised by the proponents. But I want to round out the documentary records with a few more inserts raised because of the debate last week.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] raised a couple of arguments. The first of these two refutes the suggestion that there is ongoing terrorism conducted by Armenian extremists against Turkey. This was, indeed, a serious problem a number of years ago. In my opening statement, I indicated that all Americans, including all responsible Armenian Americans, acknowledge and deplore all terrorism, but the fact is these terrorist acts have virtually ceased as of a couple of years ago.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a paper produced by the State Department entitled "Patterns of Global Terrorism," which confirms this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[U.S. Department of State]

PATTERNS OF GLOBAL TERRORISM: 1988

ARMENIAN SECRET ARMY FOR THE LIBERATION OF ARMENIA (ASALA) AKA: THE ORLY GROUP, 3D OCTOBER ORGANIZATION

Description: Marxist-Leninist Armenian terrorist group formed in 1975 with stated intention to compel Turkish Government to acknowledge publicly its alleged responsibility for the deaths of 1.5 million Armenians in 1915, pay reparations, and cede territory for an Armenian homeland. Led by Hagop Hagopian until he was assassinated in Athens in April 1988.

Activities: Initial bombing and assassination attacks directed against Turkish targets. Later attacked French and Swiss targets to force release of imprisoned comrades. Made several minor bombing attacks against US airline offices in Western Europe in early 1980s. Bombing of Turkish airline counter at Orly airport in Paris in 1983—eight persons killed and 55 wounded—led to split in group over rationale for causing indiscriminate casualties. Suffering from internal schisms, group has been relatively inactive over past four years but, according to press reports, assassinated several Armenian rivals in Lebanon during the period 1985–86.

Strength: Several hundred.

Location/Area of Operation: Lebanon/Western Europe, United States, and Middle East.

External Aid: Has received aid, including training and safehaven, from Syria. May also receive some aid from Libya. Has extensive ties to Palestinian terrorist groups, including the PFLP and PFLP-GC.

JUSTICE COMMANDOS OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE (JCAG) AKA: ARMENIAN REVOLUTIONARY ARMY (ARA)

Description: Rightwing Armenian nationalist group founded in 1975, probably to counter influence of leftist ASALA. Goals are similar to ASALA's, but ideological differences preclude working together.

Activities: Operations limited to attacks against Turkish targets, chiefly diplomats. Later operations conducted in name of ARA. Inactive since last attack in 1985.

Strength: Unknown.

Location/Area of Operation: Unknown. Operates in Western Europe, United States, Canada, and Middle East.

External Aid: Receives aid from rightwing segments of Armenian community worldwide.

(Mr. KERREY assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the second item refutes Senator WALLOP'S assertion that the atrocities stopped with the end of World War I. In fact, the atrocities continued into 1923. We have chosen the dates 1915 to 1923 simply because the facts bear out our assertion that atrocities continued throughout that 8-year period.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print a study of atrocities committed against Armenians after World War I and up to 1923 in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASSACRE IN MARASH 1920

Issue: Turks engaged in massacre of Armenians in the region of Marash in 1920 after the end of WWI.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. Deportations and massacres of Armenians continued through the period of 1915 to 1923 in Turkey.

2. Armenians in the region of Marash were deported and massacred in 1920.

3. Stanley Kerr, an American relief worker, was witness to the massacre in Marash and reported on the atrocities.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN—DEVASTATION AND MASSACRE

Koulaghi Kourtlou and Sheker Deré

From Saint Stephen's Church on 20 January a procession of mourners went to the cemetery carrying on a bier the body of an Armenian legionnaire who had been killed by a sniper firing from the minaret of a mosque. The Turkish authorities had made no move to find the culprit, nor did the French commander take any steps to force an investigation. This caused great resentment among the Armenians, who felt that the Turks were testing the ability of the French to punish such an incident.

On his return from the cemetery Khatchig Der Vartanian, who had been one of the pall bearers, deposited the wooden framework on which the body had been carried in the courtyard of Saint Stephen's Church, not knowing that it would soon serve for the escape of his sister Makrouhi—bride of a few months—and his mother. Aware of the tension in the city, Khatchig urged his sister to move to his home near the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths where a large detachment of Senegalese troops was quartered and where her brother Yervant served as interpreter to the commander, Major Corneloup. Disregarding his advice, Makrouhi was busy the next morning assisting her mother-in-law in the preparation of a feast for her relatives and those of her husband, Arsen Der Ohannesian, when shortly after the noon hour the unusual quiet of the quarter was shattered by a fusillade of gun fire. People caught in the streets were screaming and running for shelter, many to the nearby Church of Saint Stephen. Arsen took his bride and his mother across to the church compound without stopping to carry food or bedding. That evening hundreds of Armenians from the Bektoutiyé Quarter came to the church. They barricaded the doors and stretched out to sleep on the floor, using the church carpets for mattresses. Only a few steps away there was food in abundance, the banquet prepared for the family gathering, but no one dared move outside the door.

A week passed. The Turks had begun a systematic campaign to clear the quarter of Armenians, burning their homes and killing the inhabitants. Finally they set fire to a group of houses close to the church, and a few survivors escaped to Saint Stephen's. They were shocked and exhausted but cried to those already in the church, "Run! Run! They will burn you alive if you stay here!"

This created a panic among the five or six hundred refugees. it had become dark. The great door was opened and many ran into the yard, but to open the main gate would be suicide, for across the street snipers were waiting in the Turkish reformatory. Could they climb the high wall and escape into the side street?

While the crowd milled about, Arsen noticed the bier last used to carry the dead legionnaire to the cemetery. It could serve as a ladder, with the crossbars for steps! Placing it against the wall, he directed his mother and wife to remove their shoes so they would make no noise when they dropped over the wall to the stone paved street. Some twenty-five other refugees followed, each one helping to boost the one ahead over the wall. Outside the Turks were busy carrying water to save their own houses from burning. In small groups the Armenians slipped quietly down the alley to the street leading to the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths.

Arsen discovered that his mother was missing and did not know whether she had gone ahead or had been left behind. Reaching the foot of the citadel and Cutthroat Lane, they decided to take shelter in the house of Arsen's cousins—Der Sahag's house. They climbed a wall in the rear and entered the house, finding only a small boy and his grandfather who was unable either to walk or talk because of a stroke. The others had fled to the Francisan Monastery. For a week Arsen, Makrouhi, and six others hid in the basement, going to the kitchen for food only at night. An Armenian neighbor kept watch over them, as well as over his own household, and finaly persuaded them to join his family for better protection and comfort. There, too, was an Algerian soldier caught away from his base on 21 January.

At midnight a daring young Armenian came to them from the Franciscan Monastery for his sister, knowing her to be there. As they left together for the monastery, the others decided to risk the journey, for it was even more dangerous to stay. Shortly after they set out in the darkness the one armed man in the party accidentally discharged his rifle. All over the neighborhood Turks began shooting—their technique for scaring off would-be aggressors. Some of the group turned back and were never seen again. Makrouhi hung on to her husband's arm and ran on, passing a mill and the body of its Armenian owner in the street which runs along the Kanli Deré. They climbed the forty or fifty steps up the steep slope to the high-walled monastery, perched like a castle on the ridge, and approached the main entrance with its barricade. Would the defenders shoot, assuming them to be enemies? "Armen! Armen!" they shouted to identify themselves as Armenians, and a French soldier called back for them to approach and enter. Only three of the group had reached the monastery: Makrouhi, Arsen, and the son of Der Sahag's neighbor. In the monastery they found Der Sahag's family, who had gone there on the first day of fighting. Father Joseph assigned them to a room on the second floor, already occupied by twenty-five others.

Those who remained at Saint Stephen's—said to be about five hundred—died in the flames as the church was burned on the following day. Makrouhi's sister Nevart had fled with her two children to Saint Sarkis Church in the Kumbet Quarter when fighting began. A number of the men who took refuge there were armed, and under the leadership of Sarkis Ghadeyan resisted the attacks of Turkish insurgents for some time. As the forces opposing them grew in number they decided to abandon the church and move to the nearby orphanage, Beitshalom, where eighty French soldiers were quartered. The move was made successfully at night. In the orphanage Nevart found her brother Hovsep among the three thousand Armenians who had sought refuge there. Finding Saint Sarkis without defenders, the Turks looted and burned it.

Safe in the monastery, Makrouhi knew nothing of what had happened to the other members of her large family. At that time her mother-in-law, two sisters, and two brothers were among those who had taken refuge in the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths. Her brother Hovsep, a teacher, had gone to his classes at Beitshalom Orphanage and was unable to return to his wife and three sons. In his history of these events he states that he never saw them again. Another account by Dr. Haroutune Der Ghazarian, surgeon at the German Hospital in Marash, published in the Boston journal Bahag, records that the band which slaughtered approximately three thousand Armenians in that area was composed of Turkish, Kurdish, and Cherkez villagers led by Bayazid Zadé Shukri and the sons of Kadir Pasha.

Also members of Saint Stephen's Church were the Chorbajians. Boghos, one of five brothers, lived with his wife and seven children in the Divanli Quarter close to the home of Abraham Hoja Berberian. Of these only the eldest son, Karekin, survived, for he was not at home when the siege began. Hovsep, son of Baghdasar, who lived near the Belediyé ("Municipal Building") relates his experiences. At the outbreak of hostilities he was in the home of an uncle at Boghaz Kesan and remained there for eight days, helping in the defense. When it became clear that greater security was to be found in the Franciscan Monastery with its garrison of French troops, some of those in the Chorbajians residence agreed to attempt to reach that haven. Since success depended upon moving quickly and silently at night, it was decided that the elderly and the very young should remain in the residence. At nine p.m. fifteen of them set out by way of the Turkish cemetery and reached the Monastery safely. Two weeks later Hovsep was to witness an episode of historic importance.

The Church of Asdvadsadzin

Shortly after the burning of the Church of Saint George and the destruction of the Armenian community in the Sheker Deré Quarter, the chété turned their attention to the buildings in the Church of Asdvadsadzin compound. The defenders were numbered only thirty-one legionnaires, a strange distribution in view of the fact that half a mile distant in the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths was a powerful force of some eight hundred soldiers under the command of Major Marty. Among the latter was Sergeant Krikor Ajemian, who faithfully kept up his diary.

The burning of Sourp Asdvadsadzin was a horrible sight. Two days ago the Turks set fire to the orphanage and burned the three hundred fifty orphans in it. Their cries still pierce my heart. We could not go to their aid because of the barbed wire and the enemy machine-gun fire. It reminded me of the massacre of the two thousand children by Herod. Fourteen of our legionnaires, led by Stephan, and three hundred of the people were able to escape and join us, leaving seventeen legionnaires still there. Sergeant Baghdasar Odabashian, although wounded, decided to stay with the people and kept his seventeen comrades with him even though all had the means to escape. For two days they waved flags signaling for help. Together with other sergeants we asked Major Marty for permission to go to the aid of these people but were refused.

This morning the Turks succeeded in opening two holes in the roof of the church, poured kerosene inside, and set the church on fire. Those who tried to escape were shot by the Turks. Poor Ghazaros Adamian! He came out of the church, fired on the Turks, and then turned back into the fire.

From the Franciscan Monastery across the city, Father Muré watched the conflagration through his field glasses. First he noted the destruction of the presbytery, then on the following day the school, and on the third day the church itself. "The Christians who ran out were slaughtered, while those who stayed perished in the flames. Almost no one of the fifty soldiers and two thousand Christians was saved."

Nishan Saatjian reports that a twelve-year-old girl had volunteered to carry an appeal for help directly to General Quérette and by a miracle reached him safely, but without result. Likewise two legionnaires from the besieged church succeeded in approaching Major Marty to appeal for arms, but they were refused. Knowing that it spelled their end, they returned to the church. One hundred civilians who had taken refuge in the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths volunteered to rescue those in the besieged church if only they could be armed, but Major Marty was unwilling to weaken his own force by relinquishing so many rifles. The next night Major Marty met his own death. While he walked in the courtyard of the Church of the Forty Sainted Youths a sniper's bullet struck his chest. He was buried with military honors next to the tomb of Archbishop Murgerditch Aghavnoun.

The Soap Factory

On their way to the Christmas service at the Apostolic Church of Saint George on 19 January, the family of Ohannes Kusajukian noted that the Turks were digging trenches around the konak, the seat of government for the district of Marash. Ohannes Efendi and his brothers operated an establishment engaged in the production and distribution of soap and of food products made from olive oil and from grapes. The factory, warehouse and stables were located in the Turkish quarter immediately south of the citadel. On one side rose the minaret of Ulu Jami while on the other was a Turkish bath. The buildings faced the Sheker Deré which assured a plentiful supply of water. Across the stream was the Second Evangelical Church in the Armenian quarter. The family residence had been constructed of wood as a second story on the stone walls of the soap factory.

When the fighting began, many friends and relatives of the Kusajukian brothers came to the soap factory for refuge, and soon nearly eighty persons had crowded into the spacious living quarters, where they were assured of food sufficient for a long siege; for below them were the storerooms filled with dried fruits, olive oil, and tarhana (a dried product made from parboiled wheat and yogurt).

For nearly eight days they were not molested but were keenly aware of the devastation across the Sheker Deré where all homes in the Armenian Quarters were burned. They must have witnessed also the burning of the churches of Saint George and Asdvadsadzin, both nearby. It is probable that the location of the soap factory in the heart of the city close to the Ulu Jami and the covered market accounted for the reprieve, for the Turks were busy cleaning up the Armenian residences and strongholds north and west of the citadel. But finally the chété encircled the soap factory and in spite of its defenders broke into a storeroom where they found kerosene. With this they set fire to the wooden second floor, forcing a retreat to the ground floor with its stone walls. The horses in the stable died in the fire, but two iron doors prevented the fire from spreading to the factory area. Here the men blocked the main outside door by rolling the huge cylindrical stone used for pressing oil from olives against it. The women emptied every available vessel, including the jars of the precious oil, in order to carry water and save the lower structure. The Turks, seeing that no one ran from the burning building, concluded that all had perished, and went to new conquests.

Avedis Seferian versus Evliyé Efendi

The area assigned to the Armenian volunteers commanded by Avedis Seferian lay between the konak and the citadel. The Seferian property, enclosed by a wall of mud brick, was situated directly across a narrow street from a similar walled compound owned by Evliyé Haji Evliyé Efendi, the highest ranking of all Muslims in Turkey—the Sheikh-ul-Islam. His nephew, a lawyer also named Evliyé, commanded a group of Muslim fighters from this quarter. Although the two families had maintained good relations as neighbors over a period of many years, the political events in 1920 had placed them in opposing camps. About one hundred fifty Armenian residents of the quarter had taken refuge in the three Seferian buildings. After three days of fighting the Turkish band commanded by Evliyé Efendi had encircled the Seferian compound and demanded the surrender of its defenders. The Armenians understood that surrender meant death, despite the promise of protection. Avedis Efendi took counsel with his group of fifteen fighters and with the leaders of the unarmed refugees. He proposed that they should create a diversion by setting fire to Evliyé Efendi's house. The Turkish fighters would certainly attempt to save the property of the Sheikh-ul-Islam from burning, and this might provide an opportunity for the Armenians to escape either to the Tash Khan in the covered market, or possibly to the Church of Asdvadsadzin.

Avedis and his helpers made several bundles of clothing, each one weighted with a stone, and soaked them in kerosene. One by one these were set on fire and tossed across the street on to the house of Evliyé and his uncle the Sheikh. The house caught fire. Shouting to each other to help, the Turkish fighters set their rifles aside in order to carry water. Evliyé himself directed the fire fighters. One of the Armenians spotted Evliyé and fired. Evliyé disappeared. The marksman insisted that he had hit him.

While this action was taking place, refugees had been slipping out of the Seferian compound to seek shelter elsewhere. Avedis and his fighters remained until the last to cover their retreat. After dark they divided into groups of three or four, altered their headgear to resemble that of the Turks, and sauntered into the street talking like Turks instead of using the somewhat simpler dialect used by the Armenians. They found it impossible to reach any of the churches, which were already under attack, but took shelter in an Armenian house near the Bedesten. Within a few days this was besieged and set on fire. Those who ran out were shot down, and only a dozen of the three hundred in the building escaped. Avedis and two armed companions made a dash for shelter. Two of them fell, but Avedis reached the Tash Khan and only there discovered that his trousers were covered with blood from a flesh wound in his thigh.

The Turkish historian Saral records the following:

Muallim Evliyé Efendi, who had been fighting since the beginning of the Marash events, took with him enough fighters to clean out the French from the Tash Khan and captured it. After this he turned northward and continued the mopping up, one by one, for the houses near the barracks where French and Armenians had taken shelter, but an enemy bullet made this son of a Turk a shehit ("fallen patriot").

The historian was in error about the Tash Khan, which remained in French hands throughout the siege.

Appeals for Help

By the fifth day of the rebellion, General Quérette became concerned over the fact that no help had been sent him by General Dufieux, the divisional commander, in response to the message he had telegraphed by way of Aintab on 21 January. He decided to send couriers to Adana, these being his only means of communication, for the telegraph lines had been cut. On that Sunday afternoon Lieutenant Colonel Thibault and Major Roze des Ordons came to the Wilson house. Mrs. Wilson served them with tea, assuming that they had come for a social call. It had been a very noisy Sabbath with the French artillery in action. We had seen the shelling of the Ulu Jami, pieces of masonry flying as high as the mineret when high-explosive shells landed on the dome of the mosque. The colonel explained that Turkish fighters had been firing from the minaret.

The purpose of the visit was revealed when the colonel turned to Paul, "Mr. Snyder, I understand that you have a German rifle—a Mauser. We need one to complete the disguise of a courier to Isahiyé. Would you be willing to exchange it for one of our French rifles?" Paul agreed to the exchange and brought this rifle. Five of the Turkish-speaking legionnaires had volunteered to make the dangerous trip disguised as Turkish gendarmes. Weeks later we learned that only one of them reached Isahiyé.

Our confidence in an ultimate victory for the French forces diminished day by day as we witnessed one Armenian center after another go up in flames while the French commanders refused to engage their troops in any effort to save the Christian population. American personnel and their relief work were also in danger of destruction, for the French officers were occupying mission property. For some time Dr. Wilson and Mr. Lyman had been searching for a courier willing to carry a message destined for American diplomatic officers in Aleppo or Constantinople. An opportunity came unexpectedly from the most unlikely quarter.

Early on 31 January a stalwart blond Armenian in the dress of a Zeitun mountainer came asking for Dr. Wilson. Nine of these famous fighters had reached Marash, avoiding Turkish forces by using trails across the mountains. They had had several skirmishes with chété during the trip but had known nothing of the major conflict in Marash until they came in sight of the burning city and heard the rifle fire. They had come for rifles and ammunition so that their own people could defend themselves; Zeitun was also surrounded by chété. Villagers around Zeitun had come into the town for protection.

While our visitor was talking with Dr. Wilson, the other Zeitunlis were asking General Quérette for arms which at first he refused but consented to give when he learned of their fame as fighters. They promised not only to defend Zeitun but to take the offensive and put the chété to flight. In gratitude the nine Zeitunlis attacked a Turkish position near the barracks, burned several houses, and claimed to have shot nine of their enemies. Two of them were wounded, but they promised to make another raid that night. Dr. Mabel Elliott recorded in her diary on 1 February:

"Yesterday two Zeitun men came through the trench from the French barracks, both with flesh wounds. They are magnificant men, mountaineers, tall, strong and very proud. They told me, as I dressed their wounds, that the men of Zeitun are fighting again. . . . They want to go back tonight. Zeitun can hold out forever, they say, if only they have ammunition."

Aram Hadidian, an employee of NER who knew that the Americans were looking for a courier, suggested to me that the Zeitun men might undertake such a mission. He brought two of them to me and we discussed the problem. I asked, "What city could be reached where there is an American consul, or a missionary, with access to the telegraph line?"

"Hadjin!" replied one of the Zeitunlis. "Your organization had a station there. There is also a telegraph office."

Hadidian was incredulous. "Hadjin is more than one hundred twenty-five miles from here, and there are several mountain ranges to be crossed. Can you do that in the winter?"

"If we cannot do it, no one can. We can reach Hadjin within seven days."

Together we went to consult Lyman and Wilson, who approved heartily and authorized me to reward the Zeitunlis. The messages typed on thin paper which could be concealed in their clothing, read as follows:

Situation in Marash desperate. Reign of terror in city since January 21. Hundreds of men, women and children massacred daily. No power to stop this as French are distinctly on defensive, forces and munitions inadequate. Americans have little hope if French are overpowered, as soldiers defend from our property. No assurance of help as large forces bar all roads. Leave nothing undone to relieve situation, as lives of all Christians are seriously threatened. Our auto and flag fired on repeatedly January 20. Our institutions under fire and many refugees and orphans wounded. Food short. Notify Arnold and Bristol.

Major Arnold, personnel director for NER throughout Anatolia, had an office in Constantinople, and we felt that a telegram to that city had a better chance of getting through than one to Aleppo. Further, Arnold would undoubtedly pass the message on to Dr. Lambert in Aleppo and to NER headquarters in New York.

I also prepared a draft, chargeable to the Marash station, authorizing payment of twenty Turkish gold lira to the courier on delivery of message. As the Zeitunlis left they said, "Till death! If we cannot deliver the letter, no man can."

We learned later that they carried letters also from the Armenian leaders of Marash and from General Quérette, each appealing for help. Of the five Zeitun men who set out for Hadjin, only two reached the city, delivering the messages on 10 February.

On 13 February Dr. Peet in Constantinople had just put his signature to a letter addressed to Dr. Barton in Boston when a telegram was handed to him, dated Hadjin, 11 February 1920. It had been transmitted in English, identical to the message quoted above. Dr. Peet added a handwritten postscript to his letter, enclosed a copy of the telegram, and stated that copies were being sent to Admiral Bristol and Major Arnold.

At this stage of the siege the Armenian population was concentrated in eight compounds, four of which formed a semicircle: Beitshalom Orphanage to the southeast, The First Evangelical Church, the Franciscan Monastery, and the Armenian Catholic Church. These were close enough to each other, it seems, to have enabled the French detachments quartered in each of them to dominate the area between, provided they could communicate and coordinate their attacks. However, the Kanli Deré which flowed across the city from its source—Kirk Geuz—cut through the semicircle, passing under a bridge just south of the monastery. The French had failed to secure control of this bridge, over which passed the main street between the southern gate of the city and the German Hospital. The Turks placed strong forces in buildings commanding each approach to the bridge, thus cutting communications north and south, and east and west. Major Corneloup commanded large forces in the southern area, where the Church of Forty Sainted Youths housed several thousand refugees.

The course of events at each of these defense posts, where records were made by eyewitnesses, follow. The Armenians in Saint Sarkis Church had already abandoned it, moving to Beitshalom Orphanage. Those in Saint George's, Saint Stephen's, and Asdvadsadzin churches had been killed as these buildings burned.

MASSACRE IN SMYRNA 1922

Issue: The Armenian Genocide during the years 1915-1923 included the great massacre of the burning of Smyrna by the forces of the Turkish Army in September 1922.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. In September 1922, well after World War I ended, the Turkish army burned the Armenian quarters of Smyrna to kill the Armenians living in that city. New York Times, September 15, 16, 17 ("Smyrna Wiped Out, Killings Continue").

2. The era of the massacres continued from 1915 through 1918 and did not end with World War I.

3. The Armenian population remained exposed to mass violence throughout the period of 1915 and 1923.

4. Even Armenians who survived the deportations of 1915 and 1916 were eventually massacred.

CHAPTER XIV

(Auxilium Deus ipse negavit. Even God refused his aid. The Greek historian Christobulus, referring to an adverse wind preceding the fall of Constantinople)

For several days there had been signs in the Armenian quarter that the Turks were preparing a conflagration. 'Today (Monday, 11, September) I saw with my own eyes the Turks taking bombs, gunpowder, kerosene and everything necessary to start fires, in wagonfulls here and there through the streets,' the Reverend Abraham Hartunian had recorded in his diary. That same day Anita Chakerian, a young teacher at the Institute, saw the Turkish guards dragging into the building large sacks, which they deposited in various corners. They were bringing rice and potatoes, the men said, because they knew the people were hungry and would soon have nothing left to eat. The sacks were not to be opened until the bread was exhausted. Such unexpected generosity led one of the sailors to investigate; the bags held gunpowder and dynamite. On Tuesday night, wagons bearing gasoline drums again moved through the deserted streets around the College.

Just after midnight on Tuesday the wind shifted its direction away from the Moslem quarter and a gusty breeze began blowing toward the harbour. A rash of fires broke out within an hour.

At 1:00 a.m. on Wednesday, Mabel Kalfa, Greek nurse at the Collegiate Institute, saw three fires in the neighborhood. At 4:00 a.m. fires in a small wooden hut adjoining the College wall and on a veranda near the school were put out by firemen. At noon on Wednesday a sailor beckoned Mabel Kalfa and Miss Mills to the window in the dining-room. 'Look there,' he said. 'The Turks are setting the fires!' The women could see three Turkish officers silhouetted in the window of a photographer's shop opposite the school. Moments after the men emerged, flames poured from the roof and the windows. 'Like all the other buildings this was burning from the inside,' said the nurse. The soldiers moved on to the Khan, a Turkish hotel with a series of shops beneath. Their departure signalled an explosion and another fire. Said Miss Mills: 'I could plainly see the Turks carrying tins of petroleum into the houses, from which, in each instance, fire burst forth immediately afterward. There was not an Armenian in sight, the only persons visible being the Turkish soldiers of the regular army, in smart uniforms.' Two stone houses with iron shutters were fired next, then the baker's shop. By three o'clock in the afternoon, one entire street was ablaze.

Because the wind was carrying sparks toward the school's laundry rooms, the sailors set some of the refugees to spreading rugs on the rooftops and organized a bucket brigade to wet them down. The Turkish guards ordered the refugees to come down. 'I told them to stay where they were and not be afraid,'' Nurse Kalfa reported. 'But then a Turkish officer came and told them he would shoot them if they did not come down. He said it was forbidden to go on the roof. As our men were anxious to save the school, and as we had refugees in the laundry rooms, they did not listen to the officer. At that, he fired a shot into the air and we told them to come down.'

The Smyrna fire brigade had been working steadily for fourteen hours by this time. A mixed company of Turks and Greeks (the Greek firemen had taken their families to the fire station for safety on Saturday), it was organized and supported by the London insurance firms which underwrote the properties in Smyrna. Fires were not unusual in that city but this, Sergeant Tchorbadjis soon decided, was an epidemic. Between midnight on Tuesday and ten thirty Wednesday morning, he had already responded to six alarms, all in the Armenian quarter and each fire more devastating than the one before.

The ten-thirty alarm on Suyane Street disclosed ten houses ablaze. These fires were barely under control when an alarm came from the Armenian church several streets away. Leaving some firemen at the church, Tchorbadjis hurried on alone toward some flames on Tchoukour Street. 'I climbed to the roof and found bedding on fire,' he testified later. 'Then I went down into one of the rooms and saw a Turkish soldier, well armed. He was setting fire to the interior of a drawer. He looked rather fiercely at me when he saw me, but he left. I caught the strong smell of petroleum.'

According to Sergeant Tchorbadjis there was no keeping up with the fires after that; they broke out so often and burned so fiercely that there was neither enough water nor enough manpower to contain them. Orders came from Fire Chief Grescovitch to try to keep the fire within the bounds of the Armenian quarter.

'In all the houses I went into I saw dead bodies,' Tchorbadjis said. 'In one house I followed a trail of blood that led me to a cupboard. My curiosity forced me to open this cupboard—and my hair stood on end. Inside was the naked body of a girl, with her breasts cut off. At another house there was a girl hanging from a lemon tree in the yard. There were plenty of armed soldiers going about. One of them went in where there was an Armenian family hiding and massacred the lot. When he came out his scimitar was dripping with blood. He cleaned it on his boots and legging.

'On one of the roads I saw a man about forty-five or fifty years old. The Turks had blinded him and cut off his nose and left him on the streets. He was crying out, in Turkish, "Isn't there anyone here Christian enough to shoot me so that I will not get burnt in the fire?"

'We had to evacuate, finally. The streets became too hot to work in and we wanted to get all our gear away before the station burned. At the end, we had to leave it behind.'

Fireman Emmanuel Katsaros was hosing down the Armenian Club to halt the advance of flames from next door when two soldiers went into the building carrying tins of petroleum. Looking through the window, Katsaros noticed that they were emptying the liquid on the piano. He turned to a soldier who was guarding the door: 'On the one hand we are trying to stop the fires, and on the other you are setting them,' he said.

'You have your orders,' said the soldier, 'and we have ours. This is Armenian property. Our orders are to set fire to it.'

It was four o'clock in the afternoon; fires were closing in on three sides of the Institute, and there was still no word from Navy headquarters. The buildings were arranged around a courtyard and as the fires encroached, refugees who had been sheltered in the laundry rooms at the most vulnerable point in the compound were added to the crush in the main building and told to wait for the signal to leave. They could smell the smoke and hear the explosions just beyond the school walls. There were over 2,000 refugees within the Institute by now.

'I stood all afternoon in front of the gate,' Petty Officer James Webster wrote in a letter to his family. 'I had to use the butt of my gun to keep the people away from the door, as the fire was getting closer all the time. But we knew that if we let them out, the Turks would kill them.'

Realizing that evacuation was inevitable but that with only twelve sailors on hand a mass exodus of all the inmates would spell disaster, Miss Mills, after a conference with the Chief, instructed her staff to weed out the 'school family' from the bulk of refugees, so that the sailors might escort the smaller group to the quay ahead of the mob. But the sorting out, which had to be done discreetly to avoid a stampede, was complicated by the fact that the vast majority of teachers, servants, and students refused to be separated from their families. Instructed to gather at the rear gate, they brought their relatives with them and crowded behind Miss Mills and the sailors, accompanied by several hundred alert refugees who were keeping a close watch on the movements of the Americans and taking no chances on being left behind.

The shutters at one end had caught fire just as Ensign Gaylord drove up to the rear gate in a truck, with orders from Captain Hepburn that the sailors were to abandon the building and escort bona fide Americans only to the docks. Miss Mills refused to budge without her students and staff. Gaylord barked an order, three of the men lifted her to their shoulders, and carried her through the back door. 'Girls, follow me!' she shouted. She was still struggling when they put her, along with several dozen students and employees, into the truck and drove away.

Petty Officer James Webster and six sailors remained. 'We cannot be responsible for you once we open the doors,' one of them announced. 'We advise you all to leave together. Stay close together, as close as you can.' Then he opened the gates to lead the way.

Webster had to push his way through the gate. They were miles from the waterfront and none of the sailors knew which way to turn. Some of the streets were on fire, burning rubble was blocking others. Turks were shooting into the crowd behind him. To keep from being stampeded, he had to stop every few moments and fire over the heads of his followers.

Anita Chakerian tried to follow, but the door was narrow and the crush at the exit overwhelmed her. She found herself being pushed and pulled in circles. She stumbled, lost a shoe, and would have been trampled but for two strong arms lifting her and carrying her out the door. It was one of the sailors. 'To this day I will wonder who he was,' she says. 'God bless him for saving my life.' Outside, he set her down and tried to force his way back. There were over a thousand refugees waiting behind the front entrance to the main building.

When the sailor guarding the front door was summoned to the rear gate on Ensign Gaylord's arrival, he had asked the Reverend Abraham Hartunian to take his place for a moment. The minister and his family, with the rest of the refugees massed behind, were still standing obediently behind the door. 'Badveli, what is going to happen?' a friend asked.

'I don't know,' said the clergyman, 'but I feel God is about to do something.'

Suddenly someone shouted, 'The building has caught fire from one side!' Another man, returning from the rear of the building where he had gone to investigate, announced that the Americans and all the sailors had fled.

'We are betrayed!'

They poured out into the approaching dusk. The sky was lit up in a fearful orange glow, and across the road Turkish soldiers were standing with their rifles in hand. Hartunian started to turn back. 'But where am I going? The building is on fire!' He went forward.

Mabel Kalfa, who had come around to the front entrance to find her mother, now found herself stumbling forward with the rest. 'There were shots, and everyone turned back in a panic,' she said. 'Afterwards we came out again but we did not know where we were going.'

Neither did Rose Berberian. Linking arms with her mother, trying to stay with the herd as the sailor had suggested, she found the winding streets a fiery labyrinth. Turks were still shooting into the crowd, killing some, wounding others, pulling the men aside. Flames rose up in sheets, walls crashed, cinders burned underfoot. After weaving about for seveal hours, Rose found that the group had come to the street running parallel to the quay, one short block from the water, and was standing before the French consulate. When Rose saw the Tricolour, and French marines guarding the building, she decided that this was the place to stop. Most of the school crowd moved on.

The street was mobbed with people begging entrance to the consulate, and the marines had linked hands to form a chain around the building. 'I was in rags,' Rose says, 'no shoes, my dress torn, my face and arms black with dirt and dust. I had found two pairs of men's socks—white ones—in the attic of the Italian family and I was wearing these, one pair on top of the other. They were now black, too.

'Fortunately I spoke French fairly well; I had learned it at the Armenian school I attended before entering the Institute. I asked my mother to stay outside and wait for me and I walked up to a marine and began talking to him in French. "For God's sake," I said, "Pour l'amour de Dieu, laissez-moi entrer. I am French. They killed my family. I have no papers, they were destroyed in the fire. My home is burned. Look at me; how can I have papers when I could not even save my shoes? I want to go back to my country. I do not want to stay in this place anymore."

'One of the marines turned to the man beside him, "Lift your hand and let her through."

'But I was hardly inside when over the megaphone they were announcing that everyone had to leave at once. The fire was nearing the consulate. But now we could leave under the protection of the French soldiers! We were escorted to another building, this one on the waterfront. Immediately they set up tables there, and they said, "Ladies first," and people began to line up to obtain papers.

'I was not anxious to be near the head of the line. If I could hear the questions, I would have time to prepare my answers. So I listened; "Name? Age? Nationality? Your passport?" That was all. The answers came in halting, often badly accented French, yet the consuls were turning no one away.

'And so my turn came. "Name?" "Rose Berberian." "Age?" "Sixteen." "Nationality?" "French." "Your passport?" "Burned. Our house burned. We lost everything. I have my mother with me."

' "You speak French very well," the man said, smiling. "Where did you go to school?" And he handed me the paper authorizing our passage to a French battleship.

'It was the wildest scene imaginable on that quay. Women, men, children, weeping, crying. One lady, I remember, had gone mad and was dancing and singing. People were sobbing for their families. It was a scene of horror—all those suffering people!

'I began explaining to everyone near me. "If any one of you speaks French, get on the line. They will give you a paper. Just say you are French." I kept walking through the crowds telling this to everyone. Then, incredible as it seems, I heard my sister calling my name.

'She looked like something out of a bandbox. Dressed in her best clothes, her broad-brimmed straw hat with blue velvet ribbons. For a moment I felt sure that I too had gone insane, but she began talking and quickly explained: After my mother and I were taken away, she and my brother had escaped from the attic by climbing back over the vines to Mr. Aram's house. Then, before the fires had reached our street, they took the chance and slipped over to our own house. There they changed into their finest clothes. The house had been looted—the desk with the money and our jewellery was gone—but they had not touched the wardrobes upstairs, so my brother wore his best suit, and my sister her Easter clothes. He took his cane and even put on his spats. Then she took his arm and they walked casually out the front door and down the street, arm in arm, talking French. In his way my brother escorted my sister to the quay. Since he was a strong swimmer, he decided to try for the nearest ship. Months later, when we were reunited in France, he told us that it was an English ship. When he reached it, the sailors had thrown hot water down on him and on others circling the ship begging to be taken aboard. So he had gone farther out, to an Italian ship. The Italians had pulled up everyone who managed to swim that far.

'I explained to my sister that I had a French pass, and I went back in the line to get one for her. The official was very obliging.

'When I returned to my mother and sister, a poor woman was standing nearby with four small children. "Please," she said, "I don't speak French. Please go once more and tell them that you have found your aunt and cousins. You will be saving our lives."

'This time they laughed to see me coming. "What? You again? And who have you found this time?"

' "My aunt and four small cousins," I said sheepishly. "What can I do?" The Frenchman added their names to the pass.

'Motorboats had been coming to the quay and those with papers were being taken aboard. The French sailors were exceptionally good to us. They fed us, washed us, took care of the wounded and the sick among us. For three days we were on this ship. We discovered that those who could pay their way were being transferred to merchant ships. But we had no money, not a penny. I mentioned this to one of the sailors on the third day, and he said I must speak with the Captain.

'The Captain was a gentle man. He took all our names, including those of my "aunt" and "cousins". "Don't worry, my child," he said, and he wrote a paper for all of us. We and other penniless passengers were authorized to go to Marseilles, where the Sisters of Charity had set up a camp to receive us.'

Virtually everyone saved that evening owed his life to a sympathetic foreigner. Fifteen-year-old Charles Kassabian was following on the heels of one of the sailors. 'I didn't take my eyes off him,' he related recently, 'even though it meant losing the rest of my family. My father had taken out a passport and a visa to bring us all to America. My older brothers were in America. The tickets were paid for, but we ran to the American school the day the Turks came in and there was no boat, nothing after that. And then when the fires started, my father, he had a few hundred dollars with him, he said to my mother, "We'll divide this money in case we lose each other." So my mother pinned this money in a handkerchief inside my shirt.

'So we're running out from the school and I lose them because I'm watching that sailor, and when he goes this way, I go this way. And there are thousands—if I say millions it won't make any difference because it's that crowded—and the streets are burning all over. Buildings burning. Every place burning. Every place! We come to the quay and I don't know how it happens but I see my family. In all that mess we find each other. We can't believe it. Boy, are we happy! But what are we going to do now? My mother is cold, shaking. I pick up a rug right off the ground there and I put it on her shoulders. Then I see this sailor again, and he's taking people to a little boat, and I run to him and try to make him understand. I say, "Brother in America." I say, "Passport." And maybe that makes the difference because he waves his hand, "O.K., come on," and all of us run to the boat. So pretty soon we're safe and alive on this big American ship.

"It's dark. September it gets dark already six thirty, seven. And these people are swimming out to the boats and they're turning the floodlights on them and pushing them back. From the English boats they're pouring water on them. We can't believe it but that's what happened. They didn't pick up the swimmers. They took moving pictures.

It has taken Petty Officer James Webster an hour to get to the docks. He had lost the greater part of his following along the way, but there were still thirty or forty people behind him. He left them at one end of the quay and pushed his way to headquarters to see about getting them on a boat that would take them off to one of the destroyers. The fire, blazing fiercely, was lapping its way to the quay, and Webster noticed that the Turks had guards at the end of the docks to prevent people from moving away. 'It looked to me as though they wanted to burn them up,' he wrote.

John Kingsley Birge spotted Anita Chakerian and a small contingent of students and teachers from the Institute huddled together at the north end of the quay. 'Don't move,' he told them. 'I'll see what I can do.' He managed to find a boat, piled the group in, and rowed to the Simpson. Recognizing him, Hepburn ordered his men to lower the ropes. 'We think Mr. Birge told them we were U.S. citizens,' Anita says, 'because when the Captain realized his mistake, he tried to have us put off, but the Second Mate argued with the Captain, saying he would rather be hanged than let us girls off the boat to a sure death. The Captain kept saying he had no orders. Finally they hid us below decks until we were safely out of the harbour.'

Holding hands, winding their way through the flaming streets, the Hartunians, too, found the quay at last. 'What a hellish scene!' Hartunian wrote. 'The quay was bulging with humanity from end to end. Exhausted! Defeated! Pale! Terrified! Hopeless! The sea on one side, the flames on the other. The fire had spread so rapidly and become so intense that it devoured all before it and advanced with a roar. In a little while the magnificent buildings on the quay would also go up. And what about the people then?'

Half-dead with exhausting and terror, the family found a place to rest on the stones, while Albert, the eldest son, went off to investigate the possibility of rescue and returned with the news that the Americans were taking their citizens aboard a destroyer. At the embarkation point Hartunian discovered that the civilian in charge was Jacob, the YMCA director, who had visited him in Zeytun years before. Hartunian had entertained him and taken him around the area. 'In this or that way I had cast my bread upon the waters,' he thought. And so the Hartunians, too, were rescued. Because they had American visas, there was no problem about keeping them aboard.

Hepburn had been working feverishly all afternoon, directing the evacuation of citizens on the Simpson, by now loaded and ready to lift anchor the moment Consul Horton arrived. The Americans had been grouped in squads in the lobby of the theatre, and as a pair of whale-boats drew up to the sea wall, officers rushed two squads at a time across the road and into the boats. A double file of guards posted from doorway to shoreline kept the desperate refugees from boring into the line. Despite the Captain's misgivings, the operation had gone off without a hitch.

There had been some nervous moments. Against everyone's better judgement, Anna Birge had insisted on bringing eight Greek and Armenian boys along from Paradise, hidden among the luggage. They were the younger 'beneficiary' students at the College, scholarship boys who had been orphaned in earlier massacres and had been living at the school. For three years she had mothered them, and as the cars drove up to take the women and children away, she had called them together and offered them their choice of coming along in the truck or staying behind. There was a risk either way; if they did not come, the Turks might deport them; if they did come, they might be shot. They must decide which risk to take. There was an outcry from the faculty; with all her good intentions, Mrs. Birge was proposing to endanger the entire convoy. But the sailors were willing and she was adamant. 'Where's the baggage?' asked the driver.

'I have human baggage,' said Mrs. Birge, and she turned to the boys. 'Which of you is coming?'

'We were about twenty in number, and it seemed as if each one of us looked on the truck as a lifesaver for a moment, and then the picture changed in our weary imaginations into a funeral procession,' one of the boys wrote later. 'It was a question of life and death, and yet one that required an instant decision. Eight of us declared that we would take the risk and go.

'The men protested to the sailors, but Mrs. Birge won out. We were put on the truck with bags, suitcases, and blankets around and over us. The truck started for Smyrna. In a smaller car, just ahead, Mrs. Birge rode with her three boys and some other Americans.

'As we came to a turn in the road we looked down and saw Turkish soldiers looking up at us with their guns in hand. We expected to be fired on, as they blocked our road. The truck stopped. Everybody was terror-stricken, motionless and almost breathless. I uttered a few English words and tried to look as calm as I thought an American would. Then they cleared our way, and standing by the side of the truck began talking, pointing to a woman who had been shot through the legs and lay groaning by the roadside. Suddenly the engine started and we rushed past in safety. Among the many dead bodies, we saw men, women, and children shot to death, bodies drawn up into horribly strained postures, with expressions portraying the endurance of excruciating pain. A picture of our own fate, we thought.'

Two Turkish officers, one a former student at the Boys' College, stood at the door of the theatre to insure that only Americans entered the building. The theatre was guarded, as well, by sailors from the Litchfield. Recognizing the officer as a former student, Mrs. Birge walked up to him and said, in Turkish, 'Something is going to happen here in a moment, and if you do anything to prevent it you will spend eternity in the hottest kind of hell.'' Rushing her own three boys into the theatre, she found her husband and asked him to watch the children for a moment. 'I want to see someone,' she said.

Captain Hepburn blocked her way at the door. 'Some of my family have not arrived,' she told him and pushed her way out. To the sailors, who tried to urge her back, she explained, 'Some of my sons are arriving.' They stood her against the wall; gun shots were flying wild up and down the street.

The truck drew up and stopped. The boys jumped out. 'Right through the door, boys,' said Mrs. Birge, herding them together. Again the Captain blocked the way. 'Only Americans,' he insisted.

'These are my sons,' said Mrs. Birge.

'Oh?' said the Captain. 'And how long have they been your sons?'

'For three years,' she said.

'That's quite a family to raise in three years. I'm sorry but I can take only American names.'

'All right, then, take this,' said Mrs. Birge: 'H.M. Casparian Birge, Evangelides Birge . . .' Vice-Consul Barnes was calling on the assemblage to group themselves by families. 'Only Americans will be taken abroad,' he announced firmly. Mrs. Birge rushed from one family to another; would each of them adopt one boy as their own? Eight mothers agreed. An hour later, she gathered her sons together aboard the Simpson.

A car from headquarters stopped at the YWCA to collect the guards before they had time to evacuate their gear: 'Hurry up, hurry up, get in, quick.' Melvin Johnson never knew what happened to the refugees, the women and children they had been forced to leave behind; but some had evidently escaped, for on the docks he ran across an Armenian girl he had talked to a lot at the Y. She was a school teacher, 'a very interesting young woman,' he says. 'She spoke good English. Her name was Liberty. That's how it got translated anyway. We called her Liberty. So I took her with me and slipped her aboard ship, and I got two blankets and stood guard over her all night, and I gave her ten dollars; that's all I had just then. She didn't want to take it. I said, "Look. You're going to a strange country and you don't know a soul. There's bound to be an Armenian section in there but you'll need this anyway." So she wrote me two or three letters from Greece, and I finally got one from Boston. Said she'd found her mother in Greece and she gave me the address, said if I ever hit Boston . . . Nyland the street was, but I lost the number.

'And now this is the funny part. We got out so quick I had to leave the gear behind, and for one solid year I had to write a report—what become of the rubber ponchos. Finally I got a chief yeoman to dictate me a letter. I said: "I think you'll find 'em in the ashes in Smyrna, Turkey, if you look for 'em." They stopped bothering me after that.'

Great clouds of smoke were engulfing the consulate when an officer arrived to prod Horton to the ship. In ten more minutes they would be unable to get a car through. Horton, who had been signing safe-conduct passes up to the last available moment, took up his personal files, grabbed a roll of rugs that were still encased in their summer wrapping, and ran to the car with his wife and a Greek servant. His priceless books, paintings, and classical objects, the collection of a lifetime, were left behind.

The spectacle along the waterfront haunted Melvin Johnson for the rest of his life. 'When we left it was just getting dusk,' he remembers. 'As we were pulling out I'll never forget the screams. As far as we could go you could hear 'em screaming and hollering, and the fire was going on . . . most pitiful thing you ever saw in your life. Could never hear nothing like it any other place in the world, I don't think. And the city was set in—a kind of a hill, and the fire was on back coming this way toward the ship. That was the only way the people could go, toward the waterfront. A lot of 'em were jumping in, committing suicide. It was a sight all right.'

The Simpson lifted anchor at 7:45 p.m. Horton, too, was on deck, watching the flames relentlessly down on a human wall nearly two miles long. Banks of smoke rose so high that days afterward travellers on the Sea of Marmara, one hundred and forty miles away, mistook the spectacle for an emmense mountain range. The glow and flame of the burning city were plainly visible for fifty miles, according to passengers on the Simpson.

Among them was reporter John Clayton, whose latest dispatch was at that moment on Chicago news stands: 'After forty-eight hours of Turkish occupation the population has begun to realize there is not going to be any massacre. Remembering the horrors of the Greek occupation in 1919, when more than four thousand Moslems were butchered, the Christian population has been clamouring for protection.' Clayton article referred to a little looting and a few victims of private feuds ('Turks, Greeks, and Armenians'), but announced that 'the discipline and order of the Turks was excellent'.

But now Clayton was pounding a new epic on his portable typewriter, without mincing words: 'Except for the squalid Turkish quarter, Smyrna has ceased to exist. The problem of the minorities is here solved for all time. No doubt remains as to the origin of the fire. . . . The torch was applied by Turkish regular soldiers.' Clayton had a scoop. His story, sent from Athens at dawn, was the first to reach print. Constantine Brown's dispatch in the Chicago Daily News was to be no less frank: 'A crime which will brand the Turks forever was committed yesterday when Turkish soldiery, after finishing pillaging, set this city on fire.'

George Horton thought that only the destruction of Carthage by the Romans could compare to the finale of Smyrna in the extent of its horror, savagery, and human suffering. 'As the destroyer moved away from the fearful scene and darkness descended, the flames, raging now over a vast area, grew brighter and brighter, presenting a scene of awful and sinister beauty,' he wrote. 'Yet there was no fleet of Christian battleships at Carthage looking on at a situation for which their government were responsible.' The Turks had plundered, slaughtered, and now burned the city 'because they had been systematically led to believe that they would not be interfered with.

'One of the keenest impressions which I brought away with me from Smyrna was a feeling of shame that I belonged to the human race.'

Mr. DOLE. Finally, I want to have printed a particularly significant document in the RECORD. This is a document from the British Archives. It is a report on papers that British Intelligence officials took from the archives of the Ottoman Empire. We cannot get to them now. Some say they are being scrubbed; some say they are being deleted, sanitized, catalogued—call it what you will; we cannot have access to them during this period of 1915 to 1923.

One of those papers, which we have in full text, outlines "the 10 commandments." The 10 commandments—think about it—promulgated by Ottoman authorities for implementing the genocide. Let me read a couple of the commandments.

Number 3: Excite Moslem opinion by suitable and special means in places . . . where as a point of fact Armenians have already won the hatred of the Moslems and provoke organized massacres as the Russians did at Baku.

Number 4: Use military disciplinary forces . . . ostensibly to stop massacres, while on the contrary . . . actively help the Moslems with military force.

Number 5: Apply measures to exterminate all males under 50, priests and teachers.

Think about it. These are the 10 commandments for genocide, and they speak for themselves. We believe we have made our case. We are told, yes, everybody is sorry about the Armenians. We wish it had not happened. A million and a half killed. It is a long time ago. Why bring it up now? Why did we bring up after 36, 37 years in the Senate the Genocide Convention? It had been languishing in the Senate for 37 years; 38 years almost. Why did we bring it up? Because sometimes we practice morality over politics in this country and in this Chamber.

We did what was right. We did the right thing. Let us face it: I think we are right back to David and Goliath; Armenia, a small country, a half million homeless, battered by an earthquake less than a year and a half ago, 30,000, 40,000, 50,000 killed, thousands of orphaned children. No American business investment. They do not have any embassy in this country. We do not have any there. They do not have any political influence. They do not have any power. They do not have any paid lobbyists.

They do not have big American business doing business in their country. And here they are taking on mighty Turkey, where American businesses with billions of dollars of investments, have called Members in this Chamber, where the Turks have reportedly broken off negotiations with all American business until we settle this resolution. If that is not intimidation, what is?

And you would think, to listen to some of the debate, that it is not a two-way street between the United States and Turkey, that we have great dependence on them and they do not have any relationship with us at all. Well, they have a $500 million Federal aid check, which is substantial, and they might have gotten more, I might add, under a plan talked about by some of us.

But I want the record to show that it is not a fair match. It is not a fair match. It is like somebody taking on an incumbent Senator in politics, some unknown person in our State with no money and no influence taking on an incumbent. That is essentially what it is.

With reference to taking 75 years to bring this matter before the Senate, the statute of limitations does not run out on murder in America. But this matter was before the Congress in 1920 when we had eyewitnesses and we had people who understood it, and we acted in the affirmative.

All we are asking is the right to go to the merits of what we seek to do. This is not a vote on the merits. All we are voting on is whether or not to proceed to the resolution. Seldom are we denied that opportunity in the Senate, to even go to the resolution, because if we went to the resolution, we could work out amendments, maybe compromise with the majority in this body—maybe not with everyone—because it is not the intent of this Senator or any other Senator to offend our friends in Turkey. This did not happen on the watch of the Republic of Turkey. It happened in the days of the Ottoman Empire. Keep in mind, they were fighting with the Germans against us.

But this sudden deference and almost capitulation to the whims of Turkey further underscores the David and Goliath nature of this effort.

I told the Armenians who came from Atlantic City and Philadelphia and other points in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, it is a tough battle. I doubt that we are going to win. Mighty forces are aligned on the other side and some refuse to listen to any debate. Their minds are made up or they have changed their minds once and they are not going to change their minds again.

If you had a secret vote in this Chamber: Do you think the Armenians were victims of genocide? there would be a clear majority. But we cannot even proceed to the resolution to make that determination.

I happen to share the view of the Senator from West Virginia, as I have said. I will make the statement for the record. I understand the importance of Turkey. I understand the importance of Turkey in the eyes of the distinguished President pro tempore. I went to Turkey at the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who is my friend. I took four other Senators with me. It is an important ally. It is an important country. I would not do anything to disrupt that relationship. But we are not talking about the Republic of Turkey or of President Ozal, who was Prime Minister at the time of my visit. There were Turks and Armenians who lived in peace and harmony and were neighbors. So we are not trying to create problems. We are just trying to address something that happened, and we are trying, as Mr. Havel said just last week, to put morality above politics, what is right and what is wrong, what was right and what was wrong.

In my view, we have made our case. Will we have the votes? Hopefully, yes. Will we demonstrate to the people who care that we made the best possible effort we could? I hope so. Is this partisan? No. In the last vote, I think there was probably pretty much of a split on each side on the issue. So I urge my colleagues who wish to speak for the motion to proceed to come to the Senate floor so that we may continue to make the record. I think the record has been made.

I see the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is here now. He needs just a minute to get organized.

I should say that one of my colleagues said after the last vote:

I do not understand what happened. I cannot understand, we cannot even proceed to the resolution on a commemorative resolution. It is not a matter of cost to our Government.

I may try again today, I say to the Senator from West Virginia, so he will not be surprised, to get unanimous consent to convert the joint resolution to a concurrent resolution, then modify the language, in an effort to reach some compromise. So I hope that we will have that opportunity—or at least I will make the request.

But in the meantime, since we have more time than the Senator from West Virginia, I will yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Illinois, and then 5 minutes or whatever to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague from Kansas for yielding, and I thank him for his leadership on this issue. As I said on one other occasion on the floor of this body, there are not very many Armenians in the State of Kansas, and yet Senator BOB DOLE has been in there fighting for this cause for human rights. I applaud him for doing so. He and his wife went to Soviet Armenia and I think in the process became more attached to a people who have been abused through the centuries.

Maybe we ought to thank the Turkish Government for the fight that has been caused here. From their perspective in opposing this, I think they would have been better off just quietly letting this joint resolution pass. Instead, we have had several days of debate on what happened to the Armenian people. I think there are people around this country who have heard about this debate, who have seen it on television, who have a little more understanding of what the Armenians have gone through.

The argument against adopting this resolution is, frankly, a strategic argument, that we should not do this because of Turkey's strategic position in that area of the world. I simply underscore what everyone has said. We are not attacking this Government. We are not attacking the people of Turkey today. What we are saying is let us not forget this massacre, this slaughter. It was genocide.

There is revulsion from the use of that term, but when hundreds of thousands at a minimum—no one knows the precise number, but at a minimum when hundreds of thousands—are people who are killed because they are Armenians, that is genocide. Those who say it is not in the national interest—and I have great respect for the President pro tempore, and I see my colleague from Wyoming on the floor who will argue that too very shortly—because of the strategic position of Turkey, my friends what is in the national interest is to stand up for human rights consistently no matter what the numbers are and no matter what the situation is. And when we fail to stand up for human rights, that is when we lose ultimately. We ought to stand up.

I recall the story that Clark Clifford tells, distinguished former counsel to President Truman. The decision was whether or not to recognize Israel. The Secretary of State, then General Marshall, came in and said:

> The numbers are not there. The numbers are on the side of the Arab countries. We shouldn't recognize Israel. It is not in our national interest.

Then the Secretary of what was then called the Secretary of War—you are too young, Mr. President, to recall when we called it the Secretary of War—but the Secretary of War, James Forrestal, came in, and said "It is in our strategic interests not to recognize Israel." Again the numbers on the side of the Arab countries. When he walked out, Harry Truman turned to Clark Clifford and said:

> You don't decide issues like this on the basis of numbers. You decide it on the basis of right and wrong.

My friends, that is what this is all about. We ought to decide this on the basis of what is right and wrong. It is not simply to remember those who were massacred in this Armenian slaughter. It is to remind humanity how low we can get, and to make sure this does not happen again.

My strong hope is that we can pick up a few more votes this time, and gradually move in the direction of getting cloture so that we can do what is right and what is clearly in our national interests, and that is to stand up for human rights.

Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time.

Mr. KERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the motion to proceed I know my friend, the very distinguished President pro tempore, will understand the bonds that unite us despite the fact that we disagree on a particular issue and our interpretation of it.

Mr. President, the U.N. convention, ratified by the United States in 1986, defines genocide in terms of particular acts "committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial or religious group." We have been cautioned against making judgments that perhaps only historians should make. But I would very respectfully disagree that that should hold us back from making a judgment historians have already made.

First of all, this judgment has been made already. It has been made by historians. It is part of history. It is part of history because two Presidents had formally acknowledged it, because it has been acknowledged in other international parliamentary bodies, because in fact the Turkish Government itself acknowledged it in the aftermath of the war when it tried the young Turk government for the very acts they had committed, and at that time called it "genocide."

Those of us who support proceeding forward on this resolution have laid out documentation which is now part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In the last statement on the floor I did not think it was necessary to publicly read through all of that documentation nor will I now. But I want to draw on some of those materials in order to underscore the importance of what the United States Senate is debating here today and has been for several days.

As noted previously, the most damning evidence of it comes from the Turkish Government which succeeded the young Turks of the Ottoman Empire—I stress this—is the Ottoman Empire's actions. We are not talking about our friend the Government of Turkey today. The Government of Turkey in fact responded after the fact to some of these events.

As the Senator from Illinois just said, would but the Government of Turkey had simply acknowledged the facts there would not be any need for this resolution. Because it has not, this critical issue is getting far more airing and far more analysis by virtue of this confrontation than it might have otherwise. But the most damning evidence of the Ottoman Empire's involvement in this moment of history came from the new Turkish Government itself which was established in the aftermath of World War I.

It is documented in the indictments which were handed down relating to the genocide in trials which the Turkish Government itself conducted. Following World War I, as Dr. Leo Kuper of UCLA points out, the new Turkish Government instituted court-martials against the young Turk dictators, including the ministers of war, interior, the Navy, and other members of the so-called Committee of Union and Progress. These are the people who perpetrated the genocide against the Armenians.

These proceedings established beyond any doubt that the deportations and massacres against the Armenian people during the war were planned and premeditated. The aim of the policy was clearly, as the indictment said, the extermination of all Armenians in Ottoman Turkish territories.

The evidence gathered and introduced at these trials included official telegrams that were sent by the central government to the provinces, and the accounts by eyewitnesses from various nationalities. The transcripts reporting this evidence are widely available since they were reported in the official gazette of the Ottoman Empire. Yet the Turkish Government has never released the actual evidence. In fact, some of the verified testimony of former officials acknowledges that they were ordered to destroy some of that critical evidence.

At the time these indictments took place there was a specific rejection of the so-called orders from higher authorities argument. In fact, the courts overwhelmingly found those indicted guilty as charged. After World War II, the allies based our proceedings at Nuremberg on this precedent that had been set by the Turkish Government itself with respect to what had happened to the Armenians.

Our Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time of the genocide was Henry Morgenthau, Sr. Henry Morgenthau was so outraged over the persecution of the Armenian people that he devoted a full chapter of his book, "The Secrets of the Boshorus" to this massacre.

Let me just share with the Senate a few of the excerpts from our own Ambassador at that time. He wrote:

In order that they might have no strength to resist and to escape by flight, these poor creatures were systematically starved. Government agents went ahead on the road, notifying the Kurds that the caravan was approaching and ordering them to do their congenial duty. Not only did the Kurdish tribesmen pour down from the mountains upon this starved and weakened regiment, but the Kurdish women came with butcher's knives in order that they might gain that merit in Allah's eyes that comes from killing a Christian. These massacres were not isolated happenings; I could detail many more episodes just as horrible as the one related above. Throughout the Turkish Empire a systematic attempt was made to kill all males who might propogate a new generation of Armenians, but for the purpose of rendering the weaker part of the population an easy prey.

* * * these happenings did not constitute what the newspapers of the time commonly referred to as the Armenian atrocities; they were merely the preparatory steps in the destruction of a race.

In response to the argument that the Ottoman government was only relocating a potentially hostile Armenian community during a war, Morgenthau had this to say:

The Turks never had the slightest idea of reestablishing the Armenians in this new country. They knew that the great majority would never reach their destination and those who did would either die of thirst or starvation or be murdered by the wild Mohammedan desert tribes.

The real purpose of the deportation was robbery and deportation. It really represented a new method of massacre.

When Talaat, as Minister of the Interior, gave the death warrant to a whole race, he understood this well, and in his conversations with me, he made no particular attempt to conceal this fact.

It is absurd for the Turkish Government to assert that it ever seriously intended to "deport Armenians to new homes." The treatment which was given the convoys clearly shows—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KERRY. I ask for 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DOLE. I only have 11 left.

Mr. KERRY. If I can have 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 more minutes.

Mr. KERRY. I will not go through the rest of this evidence except to say the evidence is bone chilling; it is heart rending; extraordinary in the level of cruelty and the clear design for the extermination of a race. And it is clear that the U.S. Senate now has an opportunity to not fall prey to the politics of this moment, which would require us to accept concepts of which George Orwell warned us by which you rewrite whole notions of history.

How can the U.S. Senate take a vote that ignores the reality of what happened when Presidents of the United States have acknowledged it, international bodies have acknowledged it, when our own State Department witnessed and acknowledged it, when history has recorded it? For the U.S. Senate, for some political consideration of today, to support that the history and the past can be rewritten or ignored is to do a kind of injustice which fails prey to an expediency that permits these kinds of massacres to take place.

What then of the people in China and Tibet? What then of the Cambodians or East Timor? What do we say to those who have been subject to the other tragedies of history, which even now as we stand here, some people try to rewrite?

There are those in this world who are willing to support that the holocaust never took place. If the U.S. Senate cannot stand up in favor of the Armenian people and make clear what we all know is reality and still acknowledge our friendship to the Turkish people, who will still get our aid, who will still be our friends because this Government had nothing to do with that, we will make an enormous mistake.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the motion to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. DOLE. I yield 5 minutes.

Mr. President, as we continue to debate Senate Joint Resolution 212, designating April 24 as "The National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923," it is imperative that we not let political consideration of the moment interfere with the truth.

Those of us who support Senate Joint Resolution 212, have laid out a wealth of material documenting the facts that this act of genocide did in fact occur. I would like to draw upon some of the materials that have already been presented which supports the necessity for enacting this resolution.

As noted previously, the most damning evidence of the Ottoman Empire's stated policy of perpetrating genocide upon the Armenian people came from the new Turkish Government itself, which was established in the aftermath of World War I. It is documented in indictments which were handed down relating to the genocide—in trials which the Turkish Government conducted:

Following World War I, the new Turkish Government instituted courts martial against the Young Turk dictators, including the ministers of War, Interior, and Navy and other members of the dominant Committee of Union and Progress [CUP] who had perpetrated the genocide of the Armenians.

These proceedings established, beyond any doubt, that the deportations and massacres against the Armenian people during the War were planned and premeditated. The aim of the policy was clearly the extermination of all Armenians in Ottoman Turkish territories.

The evidence gathered and introduced at these trials included official telegrams sent by the central government to the provinces and accounts by eyewitnesses from various nationalities. The transcripts recording this evidence are widely available, since they were reported in the official gazette of the Ottoman Empire. * * * Yet the Turkish government has never released the actual evidence. In fact, in some of the verified testimony, former officials acknowledged that they were ordered to destroy critical evidence.

Rejecting defenses based on the 'orders from higher authorities' argument, the courts overwhelmingly found those indicted guilty as charged.

After World War II the Allies used these proceedings as precedent for the Nurnberg trials.

Our Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time of the genocide, Henry Morganthau, Sr., was so outraged over this persecution of the Armenian people, that he devoted a full chapter in his book, "Secrets of the Bosphorus," to this massacre. Important excerpts from this chapter include the following, in Ambassador Morganthau's own words:

In order that they might have no strength to resist and to escape by flight, these poor creatures were systematically starved. Government agents went ahead on the road, notifying the Kurds that the caravan was approaching and ordering them to do their congenial duty. Not only did the Kurdish tribesmen pour down from the mountains upon this starved and weakened regiment, but the Kurdish women came with butcher's knives in order that they might gain that merit in Allah's eyes that comes from killing a Christian. These massacres were not isolated happenings; I could detail many more episodes just as horrible as the one related above. Throughout the Turkish Empire a systematic attempt was made to kill all able-bodied men, not only for the purpose of removing all males who might propagate a new generation of Armenians, but for the purpose of rendering the weaker part of the population as easy prey * * * these happenings did not constitute what the newspapers of the time commonly referred to as the Armenian atrocities; they were merely the preparatory steps in the destruction of a race.

In response to the argument that the Ottoman Government was only relocating a potentially hostile Armenian community during a war-time situation, Morganthau had this to say:

The Turks never had the slightest idea of re-establishing the Armenians in this new country. They knew that the great majority would never reach their destination and that those who did would either die of thirst and starvation, or be murdered by the wild

Mohammedan desert tribes. The real purpose of the deportation was robbery and destruction; it really represented a new method of massacre. When Talaat, as Minister of the Interior, gave the orders for these deportations, he was merely giving the death-warrant to a whole race; he understood this well, and in his conversations with me he made no particular attempt to conceal this fact.

• • • It is absurd for the Turkish Government to assert that it ever seriously intended to deport the Armenians to new homes; the treatment which was given the convoys clearly shows that extermination was the real purpose of Enver and Talaat. How many exiled to the south under these revolting conditions ever reached their destinations?

Ambassador Morganthau felt compelled to address this horrendous crime against humanity. In his own words:

My only reason for relating such dreadful things as this is that, without the details, the English-speaking public cannot understand precisely what this nation is which we call Turkey. I have by no means told the most terrible details, for a complete narration of the sadistic orgies of which these Armenian men and women were the victims can never be printed in an American publication. Whatever crimes the most perverted instincts of the human mind can devise, and whatever refinements of persecution and injustice the most debased imagination can conceive, became the daily misfortunes of this devoted people. I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

In comparing the Armenian genocide with previous atrocities of other peoples and races, Morganthau had this observation:

And these earlier massacres, when we compared them with the spirit that that directed the Armenian atrocities, have one feature that we can almost describe as an excuse: they were the product of religious fanaticism, and most of the men and women who instigated them sincerely believed that they were devoutly serving their Maker. Undoubtedly religious fanaticism was an impelling motive with the Turkish and Kurdish rabble who slew Armenians as a service to Allah, but the men who really conceived the crime had no such motive. Practically all of them were atheists, with no more respect for Mohammedanism than for Christianity, and with them the motive was a cold-blooded, calculating state policy.

In 1922, Allen Dulles, who would later become Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, but who at that time was head of the State Department's Near East desk, stated:

Confidentially the State Department is in a bind. Our task would be simple if the reports of the atrocities could be declared untrue, or even exaggerated. But the evidence, alas, is irrefutable and the Secretary of State wants to avoid giving the impression that while the United States is willing to intervene actively to protect its commercial interests, it is not willing to move on behalf of Christian minorities.

In a 1985 United Nations report on Genocide, the international community recognized fully the Armenian case and stated that "at least one million and possibly well over half of the Armenian population are reliably estimated to have been killed or death marched." The report stated further eyewitness reports were • • • corroborated by reports in the United States, German and British archives and of contemporary diplomats in the Ottoman Empire, including those of its ally German. The German Ambassador, Wangenheim, for example, on 7th July 1915 wrote the government is indeed pursuing its goal of exterminating the Armenian race in the Ottoman Empire (Wilhelmstrasse Archives). Though the successor Turkey government helped to institute trials of a few of those responsible for the massacres of which they were found guilty, the present Turkish contention is that genocide did not take place although there were many casualties and dispersals in the fighting, and that all the evidence to the contrary is forged.

On June 18, 1987, the European Parliament approved a resolution stating that "the tragic events which took place in 1915-1917 against the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire constituted a Genocide."

Further, Mr. President, the 65 members of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, voted unanimously to memorialize the Armenian Genocide with appropriate displays and interpretations in the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

Mr. President, the truth is all around us, if we want to acknowledge that the truth exists. What useful purpose do we serve to deny this truth, except to justify the genocide itself?

Yes, the United States has a national security interest in Turkey. Yes, it is important to maintain relations with other countries in the world and to sell our goods abroad. But we also have a paramount interest in preventing genocide. There is a danger inherent when the institutions of government shape facts to fit the needs of the moment. George Orwell saw the rewriting of history as characteristic of totalitarian regimes. However, Orwell also saw the danger that this phenomenon could also become ingrained in what are ostensibly democratic governments.

Are we going to allow politics to cover up the truth? Will we allow ourselves to be victimized by ignoring the truth and becoming a party to rewriting history?

Mr. President, the simple fact of the matter is that unless genocide is seen as a serious problem, action to prevent such massacres will not be taken. If previous examples of genocide are consigned to oblivion, the problem of prevention will lack urgency. If one forgets the atrocities against the Armenians, Cambodians, the people of East Timor, and others, we are in effect rewarding those who have managed successfully to use genocide as an instrument of state policy. Denial strikes at our first defense to genocide—namely the capacity to remember and acknowledge the truth.

On a moral and cultural level, denial continues the genocide. It suggests that the Armenians deserved their fate and that removal of any trace of their existence is justified or at least, acceptable.

This resolution of remembrance is important. It promotes a healing process and a greater sensitivity to genocide as a crime, not only against a particular people, but against mankind. It has deep significance for those concerned with the dangers inherent in the manipulation of history by government, denial, if allowed to succeed, becomes the justification for such an event—past, present, and future.

The argument for justification is subtle and indirect. It consists of three mutually reinforcing propositions: That the Armenians constituted a serious threat to the old Ottoman Empire; that they deserved to die; and that they died so that Turks might live.

Healing is only possible where there is recognition of wrongdoing, particularly when such wrongdoing involved politically imposed mass death. Remembrance involves more than regard for the truth. Remembrance expresses compassion for those who have suffered, respect for their dignity as persons, and revulsion against the injustice done to them. In a much more deeper sense, recognition and remembrance are related not only to what happened, but to the questions of who we are, what society is, and how life and community can be protected. To remember those who have come before us is an expression of ourselves—our care, our capacity to join in a community, and our respect for other human beings.

Will we allow ourselves to be persuaded by politics which deals not so much with truth, but with perceived interests? Will we allow perceived security concerns, access to resources or profits, to stand in the way of our recognition of past events, even when such events involve the horrible and prolonged destruction of a people? Will we allow our government to emulate the Government of Turkey by suppressing the truth? That is the real issue before us—an issue which Senate Joint Resolution 212 appropriately addresses.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I thank the Republican leader. The first issue that each of us must decide in voting on this resolution is whether or not we are satisfied that there was a genocide against the Armenians in the period of 1915 through 1923.

There are many ways we can reach this determination. We can talk to survivors. I think many of us have done that. We can listen to the words of eyewitnesses, and I would hope that each of us would do that.

That same Ambassador that Senator KERRY referred to sent a telegram in 1915 back to our Secretary of State—this is the Ambassador from the United States to Turkey—and he said that harrowing reports of eyewitnesses, from those reports, it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

Ambassador Morgenthau's book is full of eyewitness accounts, and there are dozens, indeed hundreds of other books and tracts of the survivors. A million and a half did not survive, the victims; they are the real eyewitnesses who can never speak. Others must speak for them.

But there are survivors, and we can read their accounts. We should consider the statements of contemporary statesmen of note. Lord Bryce in the House of Lords said that there is not a case in history since the days of Tamerlane where a crime on so gigantic a scale has been recorded, and this is Lord Bryce speaking in 1915. And he said that the horrible policy has been carried out thoroughly by the present Turkish Government.

There have been many references to Ambassador Morgenthau and his book. I urge each of us to read that book. It is a hair-raising book. It is a contemporaneous eyewitness account of the events of 1915.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee at that time, contemporaneously, unanimously said that the testimony adduced at the hearings before it had clearly established the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered. And their resolution was passed by the Senate.

Winston Churchill, a pretty good historian, wrote the following:

> In 1915 the Turkish Government began and ruthlessly carried out the infamous general massacre and deportation of Armenians in Asia Minor. The clearance of the race from Asia Minor was about as complete as such an act on a scale so great could well be.

Then he writes:

> There is no reasonable doubt that this crime was planned and executed for political reasons.

Our Consul Jackson said that there was "a gigantic plundering scheme going on," and listen to this, "as well as a final blow to extinguish the Armenian race."

Ataturk himself, the founder of modern Turkey, was quoted in the Los Angeles Examiner on August 1, 1926, as saying that the earlier Government of Turkey, the Ottoman Empire, should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred.

The European Parliament has adopted the following statement:

> It believes that the tragic events of 1915 to 1917 involving the Armenians living in the territory of the Ottoman Empire constitute genocide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 additional minute.

Mr. LEVIN. The European Parliament has adopted this statement. These are our allies in Europe, who are also allies of Turkey. They said that it believes, the European Parliament, that those events involving the Armenians constitute genocide.

Mr. President, Hitler, when he was planning the extermination of the Jewish people, told his cohorts the world would not notice. In his words, he said, "Who remembers the Armenians?" I believe that a decency, a respect for human rights and history, requires that we participate in remembering the Armenians and proving to Hitler that the world will finally remember the Armenians.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WALLOP. I rise to find myself in an unusual position, Mr. President, on speaking contrary to the direction and philosophy of my leader. I really do not recall another time in which that has taken place.

Be that as it may, I feel compelled to rise in opposition to this resolution. Once more, I take issue with some of what I have heard on the floor here this afternoon. We have not had a debate. We have had the reading of many papers and many quotations.

This resolution asks us to accept one version of events. It, in effect, asks us to legislate history, to put our imprimatur on events that have troubled, as well they might, historians, the large majority of whom has yet to come to the conclusion that the Senate now proposes.

Much of what has occurred on the Senate floor has focused on whose version of events is correct. It is hard to tell; yet, the Senate is being asked to make a profound and moral judgment on very faulty information.

Once again, were it to have been so clear, the case so easily made, why was it that the committee did not hear it?

Why was it that the committee has merely voted it out and presented it to the full floor of the Senate? It is clear that the events of that era were appalling, were repugant. It is less clear after listening to this debate that Armenians were the only ones killed or the only ones who suffered during those dreadful days.

The Ottoman Empire, which the Turks themselves overthrew, was surely bad and was an empire in decline. But it was not simply a matter of going after an innocent population. It was in the middle of war. How many of these people were in revolt, how many died from disease, how many died from famine of the era is entirely uncertain and it further intensifies the complexity of this period.

No one denies, least of all this Senator, that the deaths of Armenians were atrocious as the newspaper reports well described. But if one is to read newspaper reports, one must also read the other reports of that same era in which the suffering of people of that level of the Middle East and south Europe are described in detail.

History has not made the case of genocide. There were at least as many Turks—a large number at the hands of the Armenians, as well as at the hands of the Russian Army—who died. Was their suffering less? Does it matter to this Senate that people of every race and every religion in that region were dying at this time, or that war consumed the entire period of time in question?

It was a period of time when warfare in that region was pretty well continuous, resulting in an enormous death toll among both Moslem and Christian communities and it continues today. Ask those Armenians who live in Azerbaijan, who live in the Gorno-Badakhshan.

Mr. President, the entire history of Moslem-Armenian relations must be studied in depth.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. BYRD. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WALLOP. The study of that is going to take longer than what we can accomplish on the floor of the Senate. Indeed, the floor of the Senate is not a place where study takes place. It is where speeches are made, headlines, and where clippings and quotations of great historians and politicians are read. It is a job better left to historians.

The murders of Moslems must be studied. And again, Mr. President, I say we ought to have had the committee hearing on it. When the Turkish Republic emerged from the ruins of the Ottoman Empire after World War I, it adopted western standards and has continued to live up to those standards. It has been our ally straight through. It has been our ally in World War II; it was our ally in Korea. It is our strongest and longest border with the Soviet Union in NATO.

The World War I peace treaties obligated the Turks to do certain things, and they have done them. At that time the Armenians, whose suffering I do not deny, approached the peace conferences and for all the talks, cables, reports, and eyewitness accounts, the world did not see it that way then and there. They did not order Turkish reparations to be paid to Armenians. So while one cannot minimize the suffering of the Armenians, it also cannot minimize the suffering of other peoples in the region at that time.

I believe that Armenian deaths cannot be seen as separate from the suffering of Moslem inhabitants as well as other Christian inhabitants. Evidence thus far points in the direction of serious intercommunal warfare, like that which exists today. It was complicated then by disease, famine, suffering, and massacres in Anatolia and adjoining areas during the First World War.

I say again, Mr. President, a debate on the floor of the Senate is not a study; it is a place to arouse emotions, elicit sympathies, but it is not the place to define history.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Wyoming for an excellent statement.

Mr. President, I shall begin to sum up the reasons that this motion to invoke cloture ought not be agreed to and why the Senate should not proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 212:

First of all, as we have heard many times from both sides of the aisle and both sides of the issue, Turkey is a very important NATO ally and has demonstrated its dedication, its resolve, its loyalty to NATO, and its determination to live up to its requirements and the expectations of Turkey in that regard.

There are a number of Turkish and other bases in Turkey to which NATO and the United States have access. There is a fuel depot which supplies the ships of the U.S. 6th Fleet with fuel and ammunition, and there are monitoring facilities which will continue to be extremely important to the United States and our own security interests and to the security interests of all the other countries of NATO.

And as the focus on the world stage shifts away from the Warsaw Pact countries, and from NATO, to some extent, that focus will shift to the Middle East, and it is there that we will continue to need the monitoring facilities in Turkey that will be necessary if we are to monitor arms control agreements, and it is of the greatest necessity, as I deem it, that we not act here in such a way as will offend that extremely important NATO ally.

Turkey has a 300-mile land border with the Soviet Union and many more hundreds of miles of sea border.

The Turks have demonstrated their Western orientation, their pro-West attitude in many more ways than one. There is no question that there are extreme fundamentalists today in Turkey who would like to see Turkey turn away from that pro-Western orientation. They would like nothing better than for Turkey to turn its back on the West and no longer be pro-West in its orientation. We saw in the Korean War the extent to which the Turks went in their desire to be aligned with the West and their desire to thwart the advance of communism. We saw them in Korea, when they fought side by side with our own forces, demonstrate great courage and patriotism and loyalty.

There has recently been a book published entitled "The U.S.-Turkish-NATO Middle East Connection" by George McGhee, former United States Ambassador to Turkey, a book that was copyrighted in 1990, this year. McGhee writes as follows on page 77 of his book:

A month after the landslide victory of the Democratic Party on 14 May 1950, the Korean War broke out. For the first time communists and Western forces engaged in battle. At the urging of the United States, the UN sent out a general appeal to members to contribute troops. At this time Turkey had received no pledges from the Western powers regarding its own defenses, but it showed clearly its own commitment to the West. The Menderes government, without consultation with the opposition party, decided in a cabinet meeting in Yalova to send a brigade of 4500 men to join the US forces in Korea.

Turkey was the first nation, after the United States, to respond to the UN appeal . . .

The first Turkish brigade arrived in Korea on 24 October 1950. The next month would witness its greatest triumph. What the Turkish brigade had achieved, during the well-known 'Kunuri' battle, was described by General Walker, then the commander of the Eighth Army:

"The Turkish Brigade, which has been operating with the 2nd U.S. Division, has, by the great courage it has displayed and the delaying actions it fought continuously for 4 days, prevented the defeat and annihilation of the Army. In the 2 days' fighting (from November 28) the strength of the enemy forces in the sector held by the Turkish Brigade was 6 divisions. Despite this, the enemy was unable to penetrate our lines. The Turkish Brigade, together with the 2nd U.S. Division, secured the necessary time to avert the complete encirclement of the whole 8th Army."

Turkish troops suffered the most casualties of the Korean War after South Korea—and the United States, with 706 killed and 2111 wounded, 168 missing and 219 taken prisoner—66 percent of the Turkish representation.

Now, that is an ally. I hold in my hand, from the Department of the Army, July 11, 1951, the general orders that awarded the distinguished unit citation to the Turks. Let me read the citation:

4. The Turkish Brigade a member of the United Nations Forces in Korea, and the following attached units: Turkish United Nations Brigade Advisory Group; Company A, 79th Tank Battalion; Company D, 89th Medium Tank Battalion; 3d Platoon, Battery A, 25th AAA AW Battalion.

Are cited for exceptionally outstanding performance of duty in combat in the area of Kumyangjang-ni, Korea, from 25 to 27 January 1951. The Turkish Brigade and attached units were deployed along a 7-mile front between I and IX Corps, against numerically superior hostile forces defending their vital supply route and their main line of resistance south of the Han River. Enemy-held hills 185 and 156 and Kumyangjang-ni were defended tenaciously and stubbornly against savage and relentless attacks by the Turkish Brigade, but finally fell in dogged and bitter hand-to-hand combat. The success of the savage bayonet assault is reflected in the 1,734 casualties inflicted on the hostile forces during the period. The fanatical defense by well-entrenched communist troops was finally smashed by the gallant, intrepid United Nations personnel engaged in the encounter. This sustained drive carried all strong points for a depth of 10 miles and crushed the defenders of the sector. The fidelity, indomitable fighting spirit, and outstanding heroism displayed by the Turkish Brigade and attached units in this bitter assault are in keeping with the finest and noblest traditions of heroic fighting men, and reflect the highest credit on the United Nations Forces, the United States military service, and the Turkish homeland.

Mr. President, let there be no doubt as to the courage and the patriotism of the Turkish fighting men and as to their dedication to the NATO Alliance and as to their pro-Western orientation.

Mr. President, we have heard much on this floor about Ambassador Morgenthau and what he had to say about genocide. But, as I pointed out earlier today, his tenure in Turkey covered only the first 9 months of the 108 months covered by the resolution.

I have quoted from another American envoy, Admiral Mark Bristol, who, as United States High Commissioner and later as Ambassador, served in Turkey for over 50 percent of the period covered by the resolution; in other words for 59 of the 108 months covered by the resolution. His observations serve to refute Morgenthau's words.

Much has been put into the RECORD by Senators from one source or another. But what it adds up to is that there is no real unanimity among the historians and scholars, among the ambassadors or whatever, as to what really happened and as to whether or not it should be termed genocide. It has been shown that terrible atrocities occurred on both sides during a civil war in Anatolia. That is the reason why I say that we as Senators should not attempt to decide this here on the floor of the Senate on the basis of the flimsy information and the sundry documents that have been selectively chosen to be put into the RECORD by both sides in the debate.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifteen minutes and twenty-six seconds.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. President, I urge that we not proceed to the Senate resolution because to do so would contribute to the unrest, the turmoil, the ethnic hatreds that we are seeing in the Southern republics in the Soviet Union and in much of Central Europe for that matter, in the Balkans and in the Caucasus, a situation which I think we ought to do everything that we possibly can at this time to calm, rather than to exacerbate. And to adopt this resolution would contribute to the animosities and antagonisms that exist, to the ethnic strife that has occurred.

Mr. President, my good friend, Mr. DOLE, continues to refer to this as a David and Goliath match. Well, Goliath of Gath, who was 6 cubits and a span tall, 9 feet and 9 inches, challenged David. He challenged David. He challenged Israel. "Come on out and fight," he said. And David used his slingshot and the 5 pebbles, and with faith in God, killed Goliath and, with Goliath's own sword, cut off Goliath's head.

I hope that from what we hear from my good friend from Kansas we should not infer that he wishes Turkey, the Goliath in this instance, according to my friend, to be killed and have its head cut off.

I think we ought to retreat to our biblical references and, before using them, see just how they might be turned around on us here.

Turkey is not challenging Soviet Armenia. And we certainly do not want to see Turkey receive a fatal blow in this debate.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], said there are not many Armenians in the State of Kansas. There are also not many Turks there, I would suppose. There are also not many in the State of West Virginia. There may be a handful of Turks in West Virginia. But we ought not to decide this matter on the basis of how many Armenians there are in Kansas or how many Turks there are in West Virginia or vice versa. We need to decide this matter on the basis of what is in the best interests of the United States, what is in the best interests of peace in the Balkans and in the Transcaucasus, what is in the best interests of peace in the Middle East.

Mr. President, Turkey is the diplomat of the Middle East and is on good terms with both Israel and with Syria. Turkey has the confidence of both. Turkey is the only non-Arab Muslim country that I know of in the Middle East, that is a friend of Israel, or that has recognized Israel.

So, let us not slap Turkey around. We may need Turkey in the days to come. And Israel may need Turkey in the days to come.

God forbid that Turkey would ever become a second Iran. God help Greece, God help Israel, if Turkey—located on that strategic position, astride the Bosporus and the Dardanelles, the land bridge between Asia and Europe—God help both of those countries if Turkey should ever become a second Iran.

Let us not forget, as I said before, that there are extreme fundamentalists in Turkey who would like to turn Turkey away from its pro-Western orientation and see it become another Iran.

How much time do I have left, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGAMAN). The Senator has 10½ minutes left.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, for years I and other Senators have come to this floor to call attention to the act of genocide committed against the Armenian people. Our purpose in doing so has been to ensure not only the record is clear about what happened to the Armenians but to assure that such atrocities are never allowed to happen again.

Here we are now, one more time, on the Senate floor to retell the story of one of the most tragic episodes in the history of the Armenian people or any people. It is clearly a tragedy that has scarred every Armenian family that is alive today.

We do this to remember the suffering of the Armenian people in order to ensure the accuracy of the historical record and to challenge those who would like to believe that this act of genocide never occurred.

While we consider this somber issue, I want to particularly commend the minority leader for his outstanding leadership in moving ahead with this resolution, despite strong pressure from a number of directions to drop its consideration or water down its pertinent language. So I am pleased to join him in signing the cloture motion. Let us go ahead and vote; I think this is crucial.

Despite overwhelming evidence of the death of between 1 and 2 million Armenians the world has still not acknowledged the suffering inflicted on Armenians by the Turkish Ottoman Empire 75 years ago. With the passage of this resolution, humanity will be more keenly aware of the devastation inflicted on the Armenian people.

In the waning days of the Ottoman Empire, Turkish rulers began to view the growing Armenian nationalist spirit as a threat to the control of their huge domain. Literally, hundreds of thousands of Armenian men, women, and children were slaughtered or starved to death in vicious attempts to quell the Armenian drive for self-determination.

The scope of the inhumanity revealed itself on the night of April 14, 1915, when Turkish police rounded up all of the Armenian intellectuals from their homes in Constantinople, effectively silencing the voice of a generation. Not long after, in a no less reprehensible fashion, Armenians serving in the Ottoman Army were disbanded and disarmed, removing any possible protection for the Armenian minority. Powerless and overwhelmed by the cruelty of their Ottoman captors, Armenians were deported from cities and towns throughout Turkey and Asia Minor. A majority of the deportees perished when forced on long death marches to the deserts of what is now Syria and Iraq.

The end of World War I brought a short period of relief for the surviving Armenians. In 1918, the ill-equipped Armenian Army, comprised of refugees and volunteers from abroad, arose and defeated invading Turkish forces. On May 28 of that year, having thwarted the designs of their invaders, Armenians triumphantly established an independent and sovereign state. Although Turkey and the Soviet Union pledged to respect the independence of the newly formed state, 1918 concluded with the tragically successful invasion of armies from both Turkey and the Bolshevik Soviet Union. Eastern Armenia subsequently was renamed the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic, while Armenians under Turkish rule continued to face butchery at the hands of their former oppressors.

These deliberately perpetrated atrocities, which virtually eliminated the entire Armenian community of the Ottoman Empire, should forever be recalled as one of the most horrific acts of genocide ever perpetrated against an ethnic community anywhere.

Unfortunately many continue to deny the indisputable testimony provided by numerous observers and survivors. At the same time, I agree with the point that those on the other side have made. That is, while we stress the importance of establishing the factual accuracy of the genocide of the Armenian people, it is important to point out that this resolution is not directed against the present Turkish Government and it is not intended to harm the deep ties between the United States and Turkey.

The genocide of the Armenian people occurred long before the current Republic of Turkey was even created.

But there is nothing that so clearly threatens our future than the refusal to recognize the mistakes of the past. Not to acknowledge the full extent of the suffering of the Armenian people is an offense, not only to the victims of that genocide, but also to those who survived in the generations of Armenians that followed. A half-hearted position of the United States Government to the recognition of the Armenian genocide raises a question as to whether we are committed to the spirit of the recently ratified United Nations treaty against genocide.

I think we must align ourselves firmly on the side of truth and human rights and recognize clearly and forcefully and without ambiguity the suffering of the Armenian people.

I want to note as well that the Armenian research and publishing center, the only one that we have affiliated with an American University, is located in my home State in Dearborn, MI. This is a very important center that has helped America and the world learn of the historic relationship between the Armenian and American peoples and will continue to help balance, with objective scholarship, the efforts of those who seek to alter history by denying the significance of the Armenian genocide.

The large Armenian-American community in Michigan—some 60,000 people—has made and continues to make a powerful and positive statement about the vitality of the Armenian people and the validity of their cause. Moreover, as a unified group around the world, Armenians have represented a powerful symbol against persecution and oppression. Their consistent pursuit of the truth has resulted in the resolution before the Senate today which would recognize and remember the genocide of 1915-23.

Others today who spoke before me recalled the words of others; Ambassador Morgenthau, even that of Adolf Hitler. When it was suggested to Hitler that world public opinion would be hostile if he proceeded with his so-called final solution to the Jewish problem he responded, "Who, after all, speaks of the annihilation of the Armenians?"

The world has proven Hitler wrong and we have remembered the crimes against the Jewish people. And it is imperative that we do no less for Armenians. Because ignorance of history is an invitation to repeat it. And I daresay the genocides that we have seen in the years past may be, in part, due to the fact that there was too little attention paid at the time, or since, to the Armenian genocide.

So it is through the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 212 that the Senate can assist Armenians in the United States and abroad in enlightening the world to this tragic act of genocide and in so doing assure that history does not repeat itself.

I think to those who suffered directly at that time and to those who are part of the bloodline that flows from that time forward to today, that we have an obligation to see that these facts are put out into the clear light of day. Some may not like it. It may challenge some centers of power here or there.

I think it's very important that we get the historical record out here, that it be in the clear light of day, that we put this issue to a vote and put the Senate on record.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to my distinguished colleagues debate Senate Joint Resolution 212 over the past few days. And I have been struck by the argument that some of them have made regarding the central question of whether the atrocities perpetrated against Armenians in the Ottoman Empire during the early 20th century should or should not be termed genocide. They contend that judgments about historical events such as these should be left to historians, not politicians.

But those who embrace this view seem to have overlooked one very important fact: The proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212 are not attempting to decide history, rather they are trying to reaffirm it. For this is not the first time this body has deliberated on the question of Armenian genocide.

Nearly 70 years ago, during the period in which the atrocities were taking place, the Senate adopted a resolution on this same question. Senate Resolution 359 was agreed to on May 13, 1920 and read in part:

> Whereas the testimony adduced at the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have clearly established the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered.

After hearings in the relevant committee and debate on the Senate floor, our predecessors, who sat in this body at the time the tragic events were occurring in Armenia, expressed their judgment by agreement to Senate Resolution 359. Just as today, the Senate expresses its views about the massacres in Tiananmen Square or human rights abuses in Nicaragua, Senators in 1920 rendered their verdict about the situation in Armenia. The resolution we are debating now merely reaffirms their views.

Why is such a reaffirmation necessary 70 years after the fact? Unfortunately, in 1982 the Department of State issued a statement that described the record of the massacres as "ambiguous" and declared that "the Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish Government committed as genocide against the Armenian people." Understandably, the Armenian-Americans felt it was important to counter this attempt to rewrite history. They have been fighting since 1982 to get Congress to repudiate the State Department's assertion of ambiguity.

If we are to heal the wounds inflicted against the Armenian people and prevent a recurrence of such a tragic crime against humanity, we must recognize the genocide, as Senate Joint Resolution 212 does. Then we must put this issue behind us once and for all. But to deny that these atrocities ever took place is an insult to human dignity, and assault on history and a gross injustice to the Armenian people.

Innumerable documents and eyewitness accounts that corroborate the occurrence of genocide against the Armenians—in addition to the 1920 Senate resolution—have been cited by proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212. American, French, British, German, and Austrian archives are full of documents that demonstrate a campaign of race extermination that was in progress against the Armenians during the period from 1915 to 1923. Over the last few days, my colleagues have cited reports from our then-Ambassador to Constantinople, Henry Morganthau, as well as countless press reports, which support this view.

Also, I think it is important to stress that Senate Joint Resolution 212 is not insensitive to the feelings of the Turkish people. They are our valued friends and allies. Proponents of this resolution have been careful to point out that it is not aimed at the Government or people of modern day Turkey. Rather, in an effort to ensure that such a tragedy never occurs again, the measure is intended to serve as a reminder of the crimes perpetrated against the Armenians by the leaders of the Ottoman Empire nearly 75 years ago.

Therefore, it is particularly regrettable that the Turkish Government has chosen to make an issue of this resolution and wage an unprecedented lobbying campaign against it in Congress. Ankara has threatened to retaliate by shutting down United States military facilities in Turkey. We cannot cave into pressure and rewrite history by denying the occurrence of the genocide—even to placate an important ally.

And to those who fret that this measure will undermine the NATO alliance, I would just ask: What should NATO stand for, if not the cherished values of truth, justice, and basic human rights that this resolution aims to reaffirm?

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of this resolution and go on record to condemn the terrible atrocities perpetrated against the Armenian people at the beginning of this century.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the issue before the Senate deals with one of the darkest subjects in modern history. The ability of men and governments to perpetrate the most horrific atrocities on each other on behalf of political causes has, more than anything else, blackened the record of civilization in the 20th century.

The tragic events at the end of the Ottoman Empire that resulted in the devastation of the Armenian people are events that should not be forgotten. I think it is a mistake to attempt comparisons between different disasters that have befallen different peoples during this century. Rather we should make sure that attention is given to cases which, in their scale and their characteristics, are representative of avoidable horrors that should never be repeated.

The destruction of the Armenian community of eastern Anatolia is such a case. While the immediate causes of the massacres, and questions of culpability, remain matters of intense dispute, the scale of the tragedy is clear. Whether the total deaths in the Armenian community were the 1.5 million often cited or the 700,000 estimated by some scholars, about half of the Armenian population died. Many of the survivors were scattered to the diaspora—Soviet Armenia, the Middle East, Europe, and the United States.

I believe that this awful chapter in human history deserves a day of commemoration. For this reason I have cosponsored Senate Joint Resolution 212 and support its adoption by the Senate.

In my view this resolution need not, and should not, affect our historically strong relations with the Republic of Turkey, a solid NATO ally. Nor should a day of remembrance of a human tragedy of relevance to all be offensive to citizens of Turkey or Turkish-Americans. The events commemorated in this resolution occurred in the period 1915-23, before the establishment of the Turkish Republic. Today's Turkey—Government or people—bear no responsibility for what happened so many years ago.

We all bear a responsibility to see that such events are never repeated. To me this is the importance of commemorations such as Senate Joint Resolution 212. They serve as reminders of the potential evil in all of us, however well-intentioned, and in our systems of government, however democratic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is advised he has 6 minutes and 41 seconds.

Mr. DOLE. I wonder if the distinguished Senator from West Virginia would mind if we each had 14 additional minutes? We may not use it all.

I ask unanimous consent that each side may have 15 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Maryland and 5 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be postponed accordingly. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise in very strong support of the resolution that is before us. We actually are considering a motion to proceed to consider the resolution. I hope the Senator will support that so we may actually consider the substance of the resolution.

I commend the distinguished minority leader for his efforts over the last few days to keep the historical record correct with respect to this issue.

Mr. President, 75 years ago this coming April began one of the great martyrdoms of modern history, a systematic and methodical campaign, beginning in 1915, to exterminate an innocent people, the Armenians living within the borders of the Ottoman Empire.

There is a long historical record on this issue. And although there are some revisionist efforts now to, in effect, rewrite the history as though this tragic massacre never occurred, what happened is clear from eyewitness accounts, from contemporaneous newspaper accounts at the time, from reports of diplomats on the scene, not only American diplomats, not only Ambassador Morgenthau who later, of course, became a very distinguished Secretary of the Treasury and who wrote at the time when it began in 1915:

> I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres of persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

Winston Churchill wrote in 1929:

> In 1915, the Turkish Government began and carried out the infamous general massacre and deportation of Armenians in Asia Minor, and the clearance of the race from Asia Minor was about as complete of such an act on a scale so great as could be.

Mr. President, this question was alluded to earlier: Why have this remembrance? Why remember the past? I submit that the purpose of remembrance, of refusing to forget, is to make certain we are not doomed to repeat the past. Those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it.

In a moving ceremony right in this building, in the rotunda of the Capitol in April 1981, Elie Wiesel, speaking at a Holocaust memorial service—the days of remembrance—expressed eloquently, I think, for all of us the importance of recognizing the Armenian genocide when he said:

> Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" He was right. No one remembered them, as no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

That is why, as part of coming to terms with ourselves, we seek to acknowledge what has occurred in the past. Coming to terms with the past was part of building for the future. We have done that in our own country. We have tried to come to terms with slavery. In recent years, we sought to come to terms with the treatment of Japanese-Americans at the outset of World War II. We have tried to come to terms with the treatment of Native Americans. Would West Germans be better off today if they had not come to terms with the Holocaust? There have been other occasions on which the Senate has affirmed the proposition with respect to the tragic massacre which took place with respect to the Armenians beginning in 1915.

Mr. President, the issue that will be before us very shortly is whether the Senate should even proceed to consider this resolution of remembrance. I urge the Senate to vote to take up the resolution in order to undertake the sober reflection with respect to this historical occurrence, historical tragedy with which the world has labored for now almost 75 years. I thank the minority leader for yielding me time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, 75 years ago, one of the worst atrocities in the history of humanity began. Over the next 8 years, more than a million innocent Armenian men, women, and children lost their lives in a series of massacres stemming from a cruel and inhuman policy of the government of the Ottoman Empire. The resolution before us would set aside April 24, 1990, as a day of remembrance for those Armenians who died.

The historical facts upon which this resolution is based are agreed upon by virtually all historians who have studied this time period. These facts are that between 1915 and 1923, officials in the government of the Ottoman Empire implemented a policy under which individuals of Armenian ancestry were deported from their homes and villages and subjected to a forced march to Syria.

This policy resulted in the deaths, through massacres, disease, and starvation, of a large segment of the Armenian population.

The resolution does not disparage the modern Government of Turkey, which is a good friend and strong ally of the United States, and which had nothing to do with the tragic events that will be commemorated by the resolution.

What this resolution does do is to honor the courageous and proud Armenian people and recognize their suffering. In doing so, we here today will be committing ourselves to every possible effort to prevent the repetition of such atrocities again in any nation at any time.

All of us were appalled in recent months to learn of the new rounds of violence directed against the long-suffering Armenian people who live in the Soviet Union. The latest brutality is fresh evidence of the need for this resolution. We in America must do all we can to prevent further bloodshed and to halt this festering ethnic and religious strife. The resolution before us can help to make clear our firm conviction that such violence must end.

America is at its best when it stands for human rights and human spirit, not only for our citizens but for citizens of all nations throughout the world.

By adopting the Armenian genocide resolution now, by honoring the victims of these massacres, America stands on the side of truth and justice for all peoples of all races and nationalities.

I urge the Senate to invoke cloture and to pass this long overdue resolution. I yield the remaining time back to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair, and I thank my friend and colleague from West Virginia.

Mr. President, I want to compliment both Senator BYRD and Senator DOLE for the tremendously interesting debate that we have had on this matter. I think this filibuster has been a very gentlemanly one; one of the most gentle filibusters I have seen in the U.S. Senate since I have been here. There have been many impassioned speeches pro and con on this issue.

I just want to say, again, Mr. President, that I have listened with a great deal of interest to the excellent presentations that have been made by Senator DOLE, and the presentations that have been made just a moment ago by the Senator from Massachusetts and also my other friend and colleagues from the State of Maryland. I have heard other statements pro and con on this issue.

As one Senator, I am very much disturbed about what happened 75 years ago. I had heard of it previously, but I had never been brought up to date on it fully, as I have with the debate that has taken place on the floor of the U.S. Senate. So I think that we certainly are all better informed on this tragedy than we were previously.

Time and time again, though, I have heard those who are supporting the resolution and pleading for the 60 votes that would allow the Senate to go ahead and vote on this saying time and time again that this will do no harm to the present Government of Turkey. Mr. President, I think that that probably might be the case in their minds. I am not accusing any of those Senators of not being up front. I think, though, that if they would look back, if they would step back for a moment and listen to the objections that have been clearly enunciated by the present Government of Turkey, members of NATO, the important military allies of the United States of America situated in a particular part of the world that many people think will be the next hot spot, if you will, and the potential for more than one country conflicts, I simply say, coupled with that, and the fact that the Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, has not endorsed the proposed action by the U.S. Senate to endorse this resolution, I think it would be good if and when we vote on this matter and if the U.S. Senate eventually, after breaking the gentlemanly filibuster, does approve the resolution, it is going to salve a lot of consciences about whether or not we are doing the right thing.

From that standpoint, I would agree with this resolution, and under normal circumstances I would be one supporting the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas. But the facts do not sustain the positions they are taking, no matter how well intended. I would certainly think that we should go along with the wishes of the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief. I think it is not in the short- or long-term interests of the United States to take up or even pass this resolution at this particular juncture, as I outlined in more detail when I spoke on this matter last.

Mr. President, I hope a sufficient number of votes will be there when we vote within the hour to not take up this resolution, above all else, for what I think it might adversely do to the national security interests of the United States today regardless of whatever happened 75 years ago.

I yield the floor. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, when I made the request for additional time, I confess I failed to clear it with majority leader. I do not intend to use all my time because I know some Members have made plans to vote at about 4:30. So I will use just a few moments. We have additional Senators who are prepared to speak—Senator PRESSLER, who is a strong supporter of the resolution, and Senator WILSON of California—but they have indicated they would forgo speaking at this time.

WE DESERVE A VOTE

Mr. President, in a few moments, we will have a second cloture vote. For the public, outside the Beltway, cloture votes can be hard to understand.

So let us be clear about the meaning of this vote.

A vote to invoke cloture is a vote to face up to the issue of the Armenian Genocide. It is a vote which says: the Senate cares about the slaughter of 1.5 million people more than it fears the threats of the Turkish Government; more than it buys the blandishments of its high-priced lobbyists.

A vote against cloture is a vote to keep ducking the issue, as many have tried to do for three-quarters of a century. It is a vote which says: The Senate is willing to bury history along with those 1.5 million victims; and to turn a deaf ear to the anguished cry of their survivors—their children and their grandchildren—a cry not for revenge, but only for some simple act of remembrance.

A vote against cloture is a vote which says: The only genocides we can talk about are those which do not embarrass an ally, do not threaten an American company's profit margin, do not require us to spend a few hours studying the facts.

Mr. President, our opponents charge we are trying to decide history.

I think they are trying to avoid it.

Yesterday, I sent a personal letter to each of my Republican colleagues. The letter did not ask for a knee-jerk, support-the-leader vote to invoke cloture. It asked, instead, for this: To look seriously at the record of last week's debate, and to make a fair call—who make a better case about the events of 1915–23, the supporters or the opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212?

I wrote in that letter, and I repeat now: "In all honesty, I believe that none of the significant historical facts and interpretations we presented were even addressed, much less refuted, by opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212."

Mr. President, this is indeed a vote about history. And I am convinced—even more than when this debate commenced—that history, the facts of history, are on our side.

Mr. President, I made a second point in that letter—that I have tried to find a way to keep faith with the victims and survivors of the Armenian genocide, without damaging United States-Turkish relations.

No one can fault the administration's vigor in protecting United States-Turkish relations. But—working with Governor Sununu, General Scowcroft and others—I have worked out a compromise that the White House can accept, and the leadership of the Armenian-American Community can enthusiastically endorse.

That compromise involves changing the joint resolution to a concurrent resolution, and amending its text. Last Thursday, I sought unanimous consent to make that change, prior to our first cloture vote. The distinguished Senator from West Virginia objected, as is his right.

I may seek unanimous consent to make the change again today, in order to reinforce the point that a compromise is available.

I must admit to a bit of surprise that one of the reasons he advanced for that objection was a concern that we not cut out the President on this matter involving our foreign policy—by acting on a concurrent resolution, which would not require his signature.

As I have said, the White House is already deeply involved in this issue, and has been actively engaged with me on negotiations about it. It has not been cut-out at all. The President indicated to me in a letter that he is perfectly comfortable with a concurrent resolution.

In any event, the key point I want to make is this: I am willing to compromise. The President is willing to compromise. The Armenian-American community is willing to compromise.

Indeed, we have made an agreement.

I am disappointed to have to do so, but I fee compelled to say it clearly on the record—it is the stance of the opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212 that is preventing that agreement from being achieved.

It is the stance of the opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 212 that is perpetuating this minicrisis in United States-Turkish relations.

Mr. President, let me make one last point—not as a threat, but as a statement of fact.

Some who will vote against cloture may hope they can avoid a tough, up-down vote on Senate Joint Resolution 212.

I am sorry to rain on anyone's parade, but the fact is this issue is not going to go away on a failed cloture vote.

If we do not get cloture, and then an up-down vote on Senate Joint Resolution 212—a vote we deserve—then we will get a vote on this issue on some other vehicle, at some other time, through some other parliamentary option.

This issue is not going to go away—unless, and until, we face up to it, fairly and squarely.

If we do—if we get an up-down vote and fail—I will concede that additional efforts in the Senate this year would not be fruitful. The only exception would be if the House on its initiative passed and sent us legislation.

Mr. President, we have a procedure for commemoratives. It is a pretty rigorous procedure, as things go around here.

We met every single requirement to have our resolution considered. We obtained the requisite number of cosponsors. We received a favorable judicary Committee vote. We agreed to delay floor consideration, to explore every avenue for compromise, and to give everyone a chance to be heard.

We played by the rules.

And now we deserve a vote, not a muddied-up procedural vote but a clean, up-down vote on the merits of our resolution.

Maybe we would win such a vote, and maybe we would lose.

But we deserve the vote.

We—the author of the resolution; my cosponsors; my supporters—deserve the vote.

More importantly, the survivors of the genocide, their children and their grandchildren deserve the vote.

And most important of all, the victims, the 1.5 million men, women and children slaughtered, starved, mutilated and maimed; 1.5 million human beings killed—murdered—because they were guilty of this crime: that they were Armenian.

Mr. President, they deserve a vote.

I ask every Senator: do they not deserve at least a vote?

Mr. President, we talk about cloture like everyone knows what it is. Some people say, "I never had it. Can you get rid of it in 10 days?" They do not know what it is. We have to get cloture so we can proceed to the resolution. I have to have 60 votes to get there. That is tough in this body.

But normally on a motion to proceed, you can go through the morning hour and avoid cloture on a motion to proceed. I have always felt there should not be unlimited debate on the motion to proceed. I have always felt 2 hours would be enough, and you ought to have an up-or-down vote. We might lose on an up-or-down vote. I still have a vote on the motion to proceed. If that is adopted, then you go to the merits. Then you give those of us who support the resolution a chance, if necessary, to compromise, to amend it, to accommodate some who have maybe justifiable concerns. But in this case it is whether we are going to face up to this Armenian genocide.

I think the Senate cares about the slaughter of 1½ million people more than it fears the threats of the Turkish Government. And I think a vote against cloture is a vote just to keep ducking the issue, thinking maybe it will never come up again, and bury history along with those 1½ million Armenians. "Do not worry; they are already gone anyway. It has been 75 years. What are you doing?" As some just suggested, it has been a long time. They were allies of ours in Korea, and they were brave soldiers, the Turks, no doubt about it. I admire them. They are not the same people who committed the atrocities between 1915 and 1923.

We are going to turn a deaf ear to the anguished cries of the survivors, their children and their grandchildren, and this is a cry not for revenge but for only a simple act of remembrance.

We are saying that we cannot talk about this gencoide; it might embarrass somebody. We can only talk genocides from here on that do not embarrass anybody. "You find me somewhere where they have killed a million people or 500,000 or 100,000 and if they do not embarrass anybody and do not threaten any American company's profit margin and do not require a few hours studying the facts, then we will bring it up and pass it."

They say we are trying to decide history. History was written 75 years ago.

Yesterday I sent a personal letter to each of my Republican colleagues. The letter did not ask for a knee-jerk, support-the-leader vote to invoke cloture. Instead, I sent along this book titled "The Armenian Genocide." That may be misleading to some but, as I have said before, if anybody reads this book and then votes not to proceed, I do not understand what we are doing around here. This is a compilation not of all the stories but of hundreds of news stories from papers all around America, all around the world, talking about deaths of Armenians, slaughter of Armenians, thousands and thousands and thousands. I did not put this together. It was put together between 1915 and 1923.

It seems to me that we ought to address the facts. I think history is on our side. I have tried to find a way to keep faith with the victims and survivors without damaging United States-Turkish relations.

No one can fault anybody for trying to protect those relations, including the administration. But I have been working with Governor Sununu, General Scowcroft, and others. We have worked out a compromise the White House can accept. That compromise involves changing the joint resolution to a concurrent resolution and amending the text.

Last Thursday I sought unanimous consent, which you have to have around here to make changes, and the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who was within his rights, objected. I am going to make the same request in 30 seconds or so and he will probably object again.

But the point I am trying to make for those who have not decided, I am just trying to reinforce the point that we are willing to try to compromise. You cannot compromise history; you cannot compromise the facts. Some say, "Oh, you do not want to cut out the President."

Well, the President has been involved through his staff. The White House is up to its knees in this negotiation. The President has indicated to me in a letter, portions of which I will include in the RECORD, that he is perfectly comfortable with a concurrent resolution.

So I wish we could work it out. I hope we will have more votes today than we had on Thursday. We have met every test for voting on commemoratives. We had the requisite number of signatures. We had 60 Senators. We met every single requirement—we had 20 on each side. We received a favorable Judiciary Committee vote. It is hard to get a controversial commemorative resolution. We have played by the rules. And now we believe that we deserve a vote.

Mr. President, again I indicate to my colleagues, if not on the other side, on this side of the aisle, we are willing to compromise. In the spirit of compromise, I would like to propose—and I will ask unanimous consent later—that Senate Joint Resolution 212 be converted into a concurrent resolution with the wording which I send to the desk and ask to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reading of the amended resolution?

Without objection, the clerk will read.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House assembled, that April 24, 1990, is designated as "Armenian Martyrs Day," commemorating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the systematic destruction of the Armenian people in the period from 1915 to 1923. Congress calls on the people of the United States to join the millions of Armenians and other people around the world to commemorate every April 24th as the anniversary of the Armenian genocide, a day of remembrance of the 1,500,000 Armenian people who were the victims of the Government of the Ottoman Empire of that period. These events occurred prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey, which was in no way involved in any of the activities of that period.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think that wording should meet the objections of the opponents of the joint resolution. This form will not have the force of law. It would only be an expression on the part of the Congress as to its feelings about the events in 1915-1923. It would make clear that the present Republic of Turkey was in no way being held responsible for those events.

So, Mr. President, I quote the third paragraph of the President's letter dated February 22.

The Administration could support a balanced, commemorative concurrent resolution. I have reviewed a draft of a concurrent resolution that properly reflects views I expressed in 1988 as Vice President. I commend that to you as a concurrent resolution, in lieu of the present joint resolution.

So the President is on record. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 212, be converted into a concurrent resolution in the form in which I have submitted.

Mr. BYRD. Mr President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I do not thank the Senator from West Virginia, but I am not surprised. I indicated earlier I would do this.

Mr. President, I again want to advise the Senator from West Virginia that under the consent agreement I had two cloture votes. The only way I can protect myself on the third cloture vote I am advised by the Parliamentarian, is to send a cloture motion to the desk prior to the vote. I am not certain whether there will be a third cloture vote.

Again I have not discussed this with the Senator from West Virginia. I do not want to surprise anybody. But I do intend to send that cloture motion to the desk. I have notified the majority leader. I have never been one to try to surprise anyone around here. But we have had in many cases as many as eight cloture votes, six, seven, five, four. Depending on what the vote is today, that may indicate we are not going to be able to proceed. If we have an increase, we may want to proceed to a third vote. We cannot tell that until after the vote.

Under the consent agreement if I wait until after the vote, I am finished for all practical purposes. It would be wiped out by adjournment. The majority leader could properly go to the National Service Act, the Clean Air Act, which might take 2, 3 weeks. So Mr. President, I send——

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I, of course, hope that the distinguished Senator will not proceed with a third cloture motion. But may I say, as far as I am concerned, if he wishes to wait until after the vote occurs and then send his cloture motion to the desk, that will give him the opportunity to have a little more time and make a determination, as he says, based on the vote. I do not know what the outcome of the vote will be. But I would not object if he asks unanimous consent so that he will not be forced to send his motion up now, in order to retain his option for later.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his usual courtesy. I think he understands I am well-intentioned. So I would make the request, but notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, that I may be permitted the option of filing a cloture motion on Senate Joint Resolution 212 following the vote today on the motion to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I reserve my time but I have indicated to others I will use my time. I think we are prepared to vote.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time does each side have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has 20½ minutes; the minority leader has 1 minute and 34 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am not going to yield back my time; not yet.

Mr. President, my good friend, the distinguished Republican leader, has held up his book on a number of occasions, and he has said today that, if one reads the book and then does not vote for cloture or does not vote to proceed to consider the resolution, he does "not know what we are doing around here."

Mr. President, may I say that I do not know what is in the book. But regardless of what is in the book, that misses the point. We have heard so-called documentations and statements that have been made by various individuals and by Ambassadors and what not to prove this side of the case or that side of the case. I have presented some of those statements on the part of Admiral Bristol, who was Ambassador and U.S. Commissioner in Turkey for 59 months out of the 108 months that are covered in the timespan concerning which this resolution speaks. But we still have not proved anything by all of these statements, quotations, and whatnot.

I heard a Senator say, "when hundreds of thousands of Armenians are killed, that is a genocide." That is not the definition of genocide. There were also hundreds of thousands of Muslims killed in that civil war in Anatolia following the First World War. There were hundreds of thousands killed on both sides of the civil war. But that does not necessarily mean that it was genocide.

I do not doubt that atrocities were committed on both sides.

I decry atrocities that may have occurred there or may have occurred anywhere else in the world. But we are being asked here to go back 75 years and put the label of "genocide" on the Ottoman Empire. What is to keep us from going back 175 years or 200 or 300 years or 400 years and, by a vote here, charge that some other nation or race committed genocide against another nation or race or group at that long-ago time in history? How far back do we draw the line?

I have heard it said that we must stand up for human rights. This Senate has gone on record many times in standing for human rights. It would do so again if there were atrocities being committed today in Turkey against Armenians, against Muslims, against Christians, against whatever. But going on record for human rights now with respect to something that happened, may have happened—we do not know what happened—75 years ago, is quite another matter.

If it is currently going on, the Senate may speak. But even if it were currently going on, the Senate has no authority to determine whether it is genocide or not genocide. Why? Because the Senate has already decided that question. The International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide was ratified by our Government in 1988.

In 1986, this Senate, under the Constitution which gives it the responsibility of approving or disapproving treaties, put its stamp of approval on the International Genocide Convention. Turkey acceded to—ratified—the Genocide Convention in 1950, not in 1986, but in 1950. The U.S. Government actually ratified the convention in 1988—2 years after the Senate gave its approval. Thirty-six years before this Senate, which is so desirous of standing up for human rights, before this Senate gave its approval and before this Government ratified the convention, Turkey ratified in 1950.

Why would it have ratified the Genocide Convention, if Turkey had felt that it was guilty of genocide or if Turkey had felt that its forebears were guilty of genocide? Turkey willingly and voluntarily acceded to the Genocide Convention in 1950, 36 years before this Senate approved it, and 38 years before our Government ratified that convention. That should speak as to where Turkey stands on genocide.

But Turkey, I think, has a right to object to being labeled as a criminal by implication, and that is what this resolution would do. Not only would this resolution by implication do that, but anyone reading the legislative history on this matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will find that Senator after Senator after Senator has stood on this floor and individually branded the Ottoman Empire as having committed the crime of genocide. So there is legislative history to show where certain Senators in this body stand on the question. To them, it is an open and shut case. Genocide is the verdict.

The Senate, when it approved the convention, took the stand that it was approving a mechanism for determining the crime of genocide, and that mechanism was being placed outside this Senate. The convention provides for the codification of international law concerning the crime of genocide. And it provides, along with the implementing legislation, the mechanism whereby the contracting parties in dispute may go to the United Nations, go to the Security Council or the General Assembly, and bring their charges.

For an interpretation of the meaning of the convention and for a determination of the responsibility of a state for having committed the crime of genocide, the contracting parties are to go to the International Court of Justice.

So, in its wisdom, the Senate of the United States in 1986—the distinguished Republican leader from Kansas was the majority leader—approved the ratification of that convention. Each of us said, yes, there is where it should go; that is the mechanism. It should go to the Security Council or to the General Assembly of the U.N. and to the International Court of Justice. That is where such very serious questions as to whether or not the crime of genocide has been committed should be determined.

And now may I say, as I have said time and time and time again, when each side has selectively put into the RECORD this statement or that statement, this document or that document, to prove its case, it is all beside the point.

The point is, that this Senate, in its wisdom, determined 4 years ago, and implemented by legislation 2 years ago, set into place the mechanism whereby the question of whether or not a nation, a group, a race has committed genocide should be decided.

That is why I say that to read this or that or some other book, and to look at these newspaper clippings or other newspaper clippings is not the point. We can all produce documents, and we can all produce books, and we can all produce statements that selectively may, in our own judgment, make the question clear to us. But that is not what the Senate said in 1986.

We said, let up put it where it can be determined methodically, systematically, objectively, based on the facts—and that is not here on this floor. Yet, today we have a resolution on the calendar of the Senate on which there was not any hearing conducted. No evidence was submitted; no witnesses were called to testify. There was only a half hour of debate, as I understand it.

The resolution was reported from the committee to the floor. And now we hear it said that we should go to the resolution and determine it on its merits and make a judgment on the substance. We are only dealing with a procedural motion here, it is said, and that is accurate. It is a procedural motion.

But, Mr. President, we have debated the subject matter, limited though the number of hours may be—and there have only been 16 hours at most, up to this point; but we have debated the substance. We have not debated the motion to proceed. We have not debated the motion to invoke cloture. We have all talked about substance, so that we have had a substantive debate here. It has been a good debate, and I think Senators have spoken with sincerity. They have been conscientious in their beliefs, and I salute them all for it.

I salute the distinguished Republican leader. He feels very strongly about this, and I feel strongly about it. He has said, let us not determine this on the basis of politics. I agree with that. It is not a matter that ought to be determined on the basis of politics. It is a matter that I think we ought to let be determined elsewhere, as the Senate in its wisdom voted to do 2 years ago and 4 years ago.

That wise decision was reaffirmed last Thursday when the effort to secure 60 votes failed. The Senate again, in its wisdom, reaffirmed its judgment of 1986, that this is a matter that has to be and ought to be determined elsewhere.

Who am I to say that genocide occurred? Who am I to say that Moslems committed genocide against Christians? Who am I to say that Christians committed genocide against Moslems? There were killings, and as I read today, our Ambassador, who had been there for 59 out of the 108 months covered by this resolution, Christian killed Moslem. Moslem killed Christian. Atrocities were committed on both sides.

Who are we to determine this fateful decision as to whether or not a friendly ally should be branded a criminal before the world?

I say, let us keep our eyes on what we are doing here, and let us not adopt through passion what reason would reject.

Some Senators say, but it is right; it is right! Mr. President, what is right? Who are we to say what is right, on this question? We determined 4 years ago where that court would be located, and where the evidence would be submitted and where the judgment would be made as to what is right and what is not, regarding a charge of genocide.

Some of our friends believe that the right thing is to reach a determination that the tragic events of the time period at issue constitute genocide.

I believe that even further discussion on this matter on the Senate floor may run the risk of offending a valued and strategic ally, inflaming passions over which we have little understanding and no control. We may be doing the Armenian people a great disservice. Who knows? We may be helping to inflame passions, right on this floor where too much has already been said and where too many have already branded Turkey as a criminal.

They say we are not talking about the present Republic of Turkey; we are talking about its forbears. I would not want my grandfather to be branded a horse thief by this body, and one can understand how the present people of Turkey would not want their grandparents to be branded criminals by this Senate.

My good friend, Mr. DOLE, will say what about the children of the Armenians? I agree with him. What about the children of the Moslems? What about the children of the Christians? What about the children of all those who were killed and murdered on both sides? We surely cannot blame the Ottoman Empire, or the Republic of Turkey for the earthquake that occurred in Armenia 15 months ago, to which reference has repeatedly been made. Our hearts went out to Armenians then, but that has nothing to do with what we are talking about here.

Mr. President, I feel that we ought to get on to other things in this body. There are plenty of other matters that we need to debate but we need to let this matter go where we said 4 years ago it should go, to be determined.

There is not one Senator in this body who has all the facts, or has been able to devote the time to study the facts or who has had access to all of the records. Not one. Not this Senator from West Virginia. Not one Senator can make an objective judgment as to what really happened, and we ought not to try. We ought not to be pretending otherwise. Let the historians do that. The Council of Ministers in the Republic of Turkey have determined only last year that the records of the period will be open, the archives will be open. So let the historians and the scholars go and dig out the facts. The politicians are not equipped to do this.

How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute and 3 seconds.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I objected to the request of the distinguished Republican leader because if this joint resolution were to be converted to a concurrent resolution, that would mean that the matter would not be presented to the President. If the Congress is going to act on a matter as grave and serious as this, it should go to the President. Let him veto it or let him sign it or let it become law without his signature.

Mr. President, a concurrent resolution does not go to the President. But the proposed concurrent resolution will contain inflammatory language just as does Senate Joint Resolution 212.

I took down the words of the distinguished Republican leader. I believe I have a copy of his resolution. He has the words "systematic destruction" of the Armenian people, I believe it is. He also used the word "genocide" in the proposed concurrent resolution.

"Systematic destruction of the Armenian people" is to say there was a genocide. So the language of his proposed concurrent resolution is just as inflammatory. It would be just as upsetting to Turkey, and it would still be turning on its head, the action that the Senate took 4 years ago when we approved ratification of the Geneva Convention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is advised that his time has expired.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I urge Senators to vote against cloture.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will just take about 10 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there is a lot of reference to Admiral Bristol who was Ambassador and High Commissioner. He was asked in an interview one time:

You have been long enough in Constantinople as to have an opinion about the Turks. What do you think about us? I beg you to tell it.

He said:

I would not be right to give quickly an opinion about nations. In principle, there are in a nation always good and bad elements.

Smiling, he continues:

You put this question to me with the intention of getting a good answer, but I really do not know what to say. I think it would be better to be put it aside for a later time, the answer to your question.

But in the public opinion of the world, you have got a bad reputation. In fact, the massacres of the Armenians have made a spot which it is difficult to eradicate. You ought not to have done such things, yes, you ought not to have done it.

I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD additional quotes from the former Ambassador of High Commissioners for Turkey.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From British Intelligence Archives]

SIR: I have the honour to enclose a copy of a verbatim translation of documents relating to the Committee of Union and Progress Organization in regard to the Armenian Massacres, with an explanatory memorandum by Commander C. E. Heathcote Smith, R.N.V.R. The originals are being retained here.

A copy of this letter is being sent to the General Officers Commanding-In-Chief, British Salonika Force and Egyptian Expeditionary Force.

I have the honour to be,

A. CALTHORPE,
High Commissioner.

I beg to hand in a memorandum dealing with certain secret Turkish documents, the most important of which is believed to be the original draft instructions issued by the Committee of Union and Progress relative to their plan for massacring Armenians. It is known as the Ten Commandments of the Committee of Union and Progress.

The man in whose handwriting it is drafted is among those who have been signalled to the Turkish Government as fit subjects for arrest, and revelations may be expected.

I should add that I was first put on the track of these documents by Mr. Percival Hadkinson of Smyrna, one of our ex-Intelligence Agents.

C.E. Heathcote Smith.

MEMORANDUM ON THE "TEN COMMANDMENTS" OF THE COMMITTEE OF UNION AND PROGRESS

Just before Christmas 1918, I was approached confidentially by someone who stated that there was still in the Direction of Public Security, Constantinople, an official who had been in the Minister of the Interior's Department during the whole of the war, and who had charge of the archives relating to the secret measures and orders issued by the Minister of the Interior as a result of the decisions taken by the Committee of Union and Progress. He said that just before the Armistice, officials had been going to the archives department at night and making a clean sweep of most of the documents, but that the original draft of the orders relating to the Armenian massacres had been saved and could probably be procured by us through him on payment of Ltq. £10,000 paper money. He pledged me to secrecy if I went any further in the matter.

In the course of the next few weeks, I followed the matter up. The man who stole or rescued this draft copy is today an official in the Direction of Public Security. I persuaded him without any great difficulty that it would be in his own interests to let us have the documents without payment, and that if in the future he gets into trouble, we would protect him.

There are four documents in this dossier. The first is what is called the "Ten Commandments" and is by far the most interesting. It is unsigned as is the rough draft, but the handwriting is said to be that of Essad Rey, who was at the time one of the confidential secretaries keeping secret archives in the Ministry of the Interior. The second document which is a decypher of a wire from Ahmed Djemal Pasha in Syria regarding the Armenian expulsion is in the actual handwriting of Ahmet Essad and undoubtedly the handwriting of those two documents numbers 1 and 2 in the original Turkish are of that of one and the same man.

There remains therefore only the arrest of this individual to prove up to the hilt the authenticity or otherwise of the draft "Ten Commandments" document. It is extremely important from the point of view of bringing home their guilt to all these responsible for the Armenian massacres, who directed rather than executed them. My informant states that at the meeting when this draft was drawn up, there were present Talaat Pasha, Dr. Beheddin, Shakir, Dr. Nazim, Ismail Jambolet and Colonel Sefi, sub-Director of the Political Section at the Ministry of War; its date is given as December or January 1914 or 1915.

My informants declares that messengers were sent to the different Vali's in the provinces with instructions to read these orders to them and then return the originals which were to be destroyed. Analysis of the documents the "Ten Commandments" numbers 3 and 4 shows that in order to economise their forces, the Turks distinguished between places where they could rely on the population to go ahead with the massacres almost unaided, and other localities where they felt it required the presence of the military in case the * * *

The rest of the instructions are too clear to require any observations.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO COMITE UNION AND PROGRES ORGANIZATION IN THE ARMENIAN MASSACRES

The 10 commandments of the COMITE UNION AND PROGRES.

(1). Profiting by Arts: 3 and 4 of Comité Union and Progres, close all Armenian Societies, and arrest all who worked against Government at any time among them and send them into the provinces such as Bagdad or Mosul, and wipe them cut either on the road or there.

(2). Collect arms.

(3). Excite Moslem opinion by suitable and special means, in places as Van, Erzeroum, Adana, where as a point of fact the Armenians have already won the hatred of the Moslems, provoke organised massacres as the Russians did at Baku.

(4). Leave all executive to the people in provinces such as Erzeroum, Van, Mamuret ul Aziz, and Bitlis, and use Military disciplinary forces (i.e. Gendarmerie) ostensibly to stop massacres, while on the contrary in places as Adana, Sivas, Broussa, Ismidt and Smyrna actively help the Moslems with military force.

(5). Apply measures to exterminate all males under 50, priests and teachers, leave girls and children to be Islamized.

(6). Carry away the families of all who succeed in escaping and apply measures to out them off from all connection with their native place.

(7). On the ground that Armenian officials may be spies, expel and drive them out absolutely from every Govern * * * Armenians in the Army—this to be left to the military to do.

(9). All action to begin everywhere simultaneously, and thus leave no time for preparation of defensive measures.

(10). Pay attention to the strictly confidential nature of these instructions, which may not go beyond two or three persons.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield back any time and I urge my colleagues to vote to shut off debate so we can go on to the resolution.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, under the previous order, pursuant to rule XXII, the Chair lays before the Senate the pending cloture motion, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S.J. Res. 212, a joint resolution designating April 24, 1990, as "National Day of Remembrance of the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923.

Bob Dole, Edward Kennedy, Pete Wilson, James M. Jeffords, Paul Sarbanes, Jake Garn, Arlen Specter, Pete Domenici, Alfonse D'Amato, Larry Pressler, Bill Bradley, John Heinz, John F. Kerry, Nancy L. Kassebaum, Carl Levin, Strom Thurmond.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk announce the names of the Senators as they vote.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the quorum call has been waived.

VOTE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 212, a joint resolution designating April 24, 1990, as "National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923" shall be brought to a close.

The yeas and nays are required. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WIRTH). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 48, nays 51, as follows:

NOT VOTING—1

Matsunaga

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 48; the nays are 51. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE ACT OF 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to consideration of S. 1430, the National and Community Service Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1430), to enhance national and community service, and for other purposes.

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might be permitted to proceed 5 minutes as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RESULTS OF THE NICARAGUA ELECTIONS

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, the elections in Nicaragua last Sunday produced a startling and heartening result: Violeta Chamorro unexpectedly and decisively defeated Daniel Ortega.

Much of the early comment we have heard focuses on the faulty polling data which predicted an easy Sandinista victory, declarations of support for economic aid and assistance, and assertions that this election vindicates President Reagan's legal and illegal war against the Sandinista government. Most remarkably we have heard it said that the election was a statement for freedom and democracy by the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, there is another side to this story.

This morning, I heard a member of the Nebraska delegation, Congressman DOUG BEREUTER, as part of the President Carter observer group, describe the poor and often illiterate people who were willing to risk and endure a great deal in order to cast their vote. He described the efficiency of the election itself and the manner in which the Sandinista government appears willing to turn over power to the duly elected Mrs. Chamorro.

He described peasants walking all day in order to vote. He described the care that was taken to guarantee the citizens the secrecy needed if votes were not to be coerced. He spoke about men and women who thrilled at the freedom they enjoyed on Sunday: The right to vote for whomever they wanted.

Mr. President, the American people should understand that this right to vote originated in an accord which was signed by the Central American presidents on February 14, 1989, under which Sandinistas agreed to political reforms and early elections in exchange for a commitment to draw up a plan to disband the Contras within 90 days.

This diplomatic approach was in striking contrast to the Contra war financed by the Reagan administration which contributed heavily to the death and destruction in Nicaragua.

The United States did not participate in this accord. The Bush administration was, in fact, caught completely by surprise when these leaders reached their agreement. Suddenly, we were on the sidelines. The Bush administration and Congress agreed to continue nonlethal aid to the Contras and stated our qualified support of the elections.

As long as the expectation was that the Sandinistas would win the election, their willingness to freely provide this right was discounted. It seemed beyond the realm of the believable to consider the possibility that the Sandinistas would be voted out from office. Therefore, by definition the election themselves were suspect.

In the end, the Nicaraguan people who have endured years of war, authoritarian rule, and the effects of long distance policymaking, stood up for their freedom and their right to a democratic government.

The United States did not provide the people of Nicaragua with a free election. They did it for themselves. It is theirs to enjoy and savor.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. COCHRAN pertaining to the introduction of S. 2187 and S. 2188 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending amendment by my colleague from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG].

I think it is an important amendment and one that will allow us, I believe, as a nation, to make maximum use of the funds available, which we all agree are very scarce, in order to provide for the needs of so many of the needy in our Nation.

Mr. President, churches and other religious entities provide social services to troubled young people, to homeless, seniors, people with disabilities, and others in communities throughout the country. Because of their demonstrated effectiveness in meeting human needs, religious organizations have sometimes received public funds to help carry out those services.

I think one of the best examples of that, Mr. President, is the Salvation Army which, for example, for many decades has provided effective service to the homeless. It has in the past received funding from Housing and Urban Development to help deliver these services.

I think if we look at an organization where the maximum use of the dollars donated and used go directly to the recipient, we would be hard pressed to find an organization that is more effective because the members of the Salvation Army, as we know, are volunteers who live at bare subsistence levels themselves.

There are many organizations like the Salvation Army that I believe would make use of these funds in a most effective fashion—in fact, perhaps more effectively than some other organizations that are layered with bureaucracies and high-priced employees.

I think one example of the problems that some have experienced in getting some of these funds to the homeless took place in New York City, where the foster care system was unable to cope with the growing caseload and nearly self-destructed from city-imposed onerous requirements on religious foster care agencies.

In other words, we can make it clear with this amendment that religious organizations which engage in many activities that serve clearly secular purposes should be able to receive public funding to achieve those secular ends. This is by no means interpreted as a method to impose any religious belief of any kind, or in any way, on any of the recipients.

At the same time, I believe, and I think the majority of this body will express its opinion very shortly, that religious bodies should be able to help those who are in most dire need of help.

I want to restate that the amendment states that the religious entities that participate in programs under the act are not required to become secular organizations. They can continue to display religious symbols or decorations. They can allow people to pray and to sing religious hymns voluntarily, and I emphasize voluntarily, and they can affirm and promote moral tenets like honesty, dependability, and fidelity.

Finally, this amendment includes provisions similar to those incorporated in S. 5, the Act for Better Child Care, which the Senate adopted last year. These provisions would allow a religious entity that participates in the program to require the participants adhere to the religious tenets and teachings of such organization, and in choosing between two or more prospective participants, nothing shall prohibit such organization from accepting a prospective participant who is already participating on a regular basis in other church activities.

Mr. President, this is a good amendment. I think it is one that would clarify an otherwise tangled legal system, and I appreciate my colleague from Colorado bringing the amendment up at this time.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today as a cosponsor and strong supporter of both the National and Community Service Act and the substitute amendment offered by Senators KENNEDY, HATCH, and others.

As a citizen of the State of Tennessee, the Volunteer State, I understand the value of national and community service. Throughout the history of the United States, Tennesseans have always responded in times of need—when war, depression, or natural disaster demanded that everyone do their part.

Well, Mr. President, now more than ever that Tennessee tradition of voluntarism is needed all across this Nation. Throughout the United States, basic needs in education, health care, child care, and the environment are being neglected. According to a recent study, there are approximately 3.5 million positions as tutors, orderlies, health care aides, and laborers in forests, farms, parks, and neighborhoods ready for civilian service volunteers.

Mr. President, I believe the measure before us will help foster the new volunteer spirit so badly needed in this country. The National and Community Service Act combines the best elements of 10 national service bills introduced in Congress last year. While our legislation provides opportunities for persons of all ages, I believe a crucial aspect of the bill is its emphasis on service by young persons of high school and college age. Our youth represent a tremendous resource to help meet America's volunteer needs—and if we are to tap this resource, we must develop programs that will attract and also benefit young people.

Last spring, I held 4 days of hearings at high schools throughout Tennessee to learn what students, school officials, and community leaders thought about volunteer service and the variety of plans that had been proposed in Washington. I am very proud of the young citizens of Tennessee who are giving their time and their caring to their communities. Through their schools, community, and church groups, and other organizations, these young Americans are involved in a diverse mixture of projects that help people of all ages and income groups. From those hearings I learned something very important—that no matter how students first get involved in community service, their volunteer experience was more rewarding than they ever imagined.

The hearings also helped me to identify several major characteristics necessary for a successful national service program. First, if people are going to make volunteer service a part of their life, they need to be introduced to it at an early age. Second, even when incentives are offered, many young people are reluctant to sign up to volunteer for a full year. Third, high schools and colleges that promote or require community service for credit experience a great deal of success.

I am pleased to say that the National and Community Service Act incorporated the recommendations that I received in my Tennessee hearings. Through the administration of a newly created Points of Light Foundation, competitive grants will be awarded to States and local governments to run a variety of service programs—including one available for students as young as kindergarten age. These programs will offer participants the opportunity to earn a weekly stipend and/or education, training, housing, and other benefits depending on the amount of time served—giving them flexibility as to the extent of service time committed. Finally, the legislation will also provide incentives for colleges to use work-study funds for community service-learning programs and allow college students to pay back their loans through community service.

Mr. President, the genius of the measure before us is that it brings together a tremendous set of public needs with a bountiful pool of human resources. The work done by the volunteers will provide long-term public benefits to the communities of the United States. Volunteers will be working in government agencies, nursing homes, hospitals, libraries, day care centers, schools, law enforcement agencies, social service organizations, parks, wetlands and forests, and depressed urban neighborhoods. And just as important, the volunteer experience will provide our youth with training, work experience, basic and life skills, and instill in them a work ethic and sense of public service.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, I am acutely aware of the limited funds available to address the tremendous domestic problems facing our Nation. Despite tighter budgets, we must find ways to meet the basic needs of our citizens and prevent the deterioration of our public lands and neighborhoods. This bill goes a long way toward providing individuals an opportunity to help America meet her needs—and represents the type of wise investment in America and Americans which is so necessary today.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, the Senator from Arizona has an amendment. If he desires to offer the amendment, then I will ask unanimous consent to temporarily set aside the Armstrong amendment, which is one of the major issues remaining. Hopefully we can address the McCain amendment in a reasonable period of time, dispose of it, and in the meantime see if we can resolve the Armstrong amendment.

Then we have the Gramm amendment and the remaining McConnell amendment. I mentioned that the Gramm amendment will take some time. Whether the leader will want to continue on through the evening, I do not know. But I hope we could address the McCain amendment, if that is possible.

I have talked to the Senator from Arizona. He has indicated he would offer his amendment very shortly. Hopefully we would be able to debate that and dispose of that this evening, and then I think the majority leader will indicate to the membership what the plan will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I would be glad to bring up my amendment, if there are no Members who would like to continue to address the Armstrong amendment. After the Senator from Utah finishes his remarks, I would be glad to bring up my amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 1266

Mr. HATCH. If the distinguished Senator will yield, I will send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to setting aside the pending amendment?

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be set side for the purposes of considering this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah, [Mr. HATCH] for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. INOUYE, proposes an amendment numbered 1266.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In section 241, strike out "to individuals who are new borrowers on that date".

In section 251, strike out "to individuals who are new borrowers on that date".

At the appropriate place, insert the following new sections:

SEC. . GRAND CIRCLE ADVENTURE PASS.

Section 4(a)(1)(B) of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965 (16 U.S.C. 4601-6a(a)(1)(B)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The Secretary shall make such a permit (to be known as the Grand Circle Adventure Passport) available for admission, for a period of at least 7 days, to the group of Arches National Park, Bryce Canyon National Park, Canyonlands National Park, Capitol Reef National Park, Zion National Park, Mesa Verde National Park, and Grand Canyon National Park (north rim), including admission to all monuments in those parks.".

SEC. . EMERGENCY MEDICAL SERVICES FOR CHILDREN.

Section 1910(a) of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 300w-9(a)) is amended in the first sentence—

(1) by striking out "not more than four";

(2) by striking out "in any fiscal year"; and

(3) by striking out "in such States".

SEC. . PHYSICIAN'S COMPARABILITY ALLOWANCE.

The positions of the Assistant Secretary for Health, the Deputy Assistant Secretary for Health, the heads of the Public Health Services agencies, and other positions that are compensated under subchapter II of chapter 53, of title 5, United States Code, relating to the Executive Schedule, when employed as physicians shall be defined as "government physicians" for purposes of eligibility for physicians comparability allowance as defined in section 5948 of title 5, United States Code.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this amendment is acceptable to both sides. It is a set of amendments proposed by myself, Senator BUMPERS, Senator KENNEDY, and Senator INOUYE.

These amendments represent refinements and additions to make this legislation better. We have agreed on language that I believe would be acceptable to virtually every Senator.

I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will accept the amendments.

EFFECTIVE DATE FOR LOAN CANCELLATION PROVISIONS

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, under the bill as reported from the Labor Committee, the modest cost of the loan cancellation provisions is not felt until 1993 because the loan cancellation provisions apply only to "individuals who are new borrowers" 30 days after the date of enactment of the bill. Thus, the loan cancellation provision would apply only to students who had never obtained Federal Government loans. This is what the "new borrowers" limitation means.

If this limitation remains in the bill, we will have to wait for at least 4 or 5 years before many people could qualify for the loan cancellation provisions. A student would have to enter college, take out some loans, graduate from college, begin voluntary service, and then complete at least 1 year of service before he or she would qualify for any loan cancellation benefits.

Senator KENNEDY and Senator HATCH have agreed that this limitation is overly restrictive and we have reached an agreement to modify the limitation. The modification provides that the loan cancellation provisions apply to new loans, even for borrowers who have previously taken out some loans.

The Congressional Budget Office has found that this change in the effective date still leaves the cost of the loan cancellation provision at less than $500,000 in the first 2 years of the program. This cost level leads to an asterisk in the CBO cost estimate tables.

In making this change, we are not providing loan cancellation for young people who have already begun their service; they made their decisions to serve without regard to the loan cancellation provisions. But any student who enters service after the loan cancellation provisions go into effect, and after they have taken out new loans, is likely to be aware of the loan cancellation benefits and is likely to be relying on them as an inducement to service.

PARK FEES IN UTAH

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have talked with my friend from Arkansas, Senator BUMPERS, regarding an issue that comes within the jurisdiction of the subcommittee of which he is the chairman, the Subcommittee on Public Lands, National Parks and Forests.

The issue is whether the National Park Service will be given the authority to implement a plan to charge one fee for a 7-day pass to the national parks situated in Utah. Senator BUMPERS has said that he would like for me to introduce a bill to this effect, that his subcommittee will act on this matter expeditiously, that he'll do all he can to move this through the subcommittee and committee in an attempt to implement this plan for this summer's park visitors. He sees no reason why he would oppose the idea. He simply wants me to introduce the proposal as a bill so it can be sent to the Park Service and other interested persons for comments. He does not want to set the precedent of setting park fees with amendments on the Senate floor to an unrelated bill.

I ask Senator BUMPERS, have I stated the substance of our conversation correctly?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes, the Senator has. I agree with everything that my friend from Utah, Senator HATCH, has said. I am happy to take expeditious action on his proposal and believe it may be an excellent idea that might even be applied nationwide, not just in Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment (No. 1266) was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In my capacity as a Senator from the State of Colorado, I note the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question? Is it my understanding that the Armstrong amendment has been laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is still pending.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I thank the Chair.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, if I might ask my colleague from Massachusetts, I understand that it is his desire to lay aside the pending Armstrong amendment in favor of consideration of my pending amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. That would be my request. We have done it for three other amendments earlier in the day. We have been looking for the Senator from Colorado. I have for the last hour, quite frankly, and we looked for him prior to the Republican caucus. So we are trying to move the process forward. We have a number of amendments.

The Senator from Arizona has been extremely accommodating and has some very important measures. What we are trying to do is accommodate, at least have a vote on that, and let the majority leader announce the rest of the schedule. In the meantime, we could try to contact the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I say to my friend from Massachusetts that I will want to speak on the Armstrong amendment at the appropriate time. I will not agree at this point on any time arrangement. I thank the Chair. I do not ask to lay it aside at this time.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending Armstrong amendment be set aside at this time.

AMENDMENT NO. 1267

(Purpose: To make the benefits paid under the bill comparable to benefits paid to persons for service in the Armed Forces of the United States)

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. McCAIN] for himself, Mr. GORTON, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. COATS, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. GRAMM, proposes an amendment numbered 1267.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of subtitle F of title I add the following new section:

SEC. 182. LIMITATION ON PAYMENTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) No participant or former participant in a program under this title may be paid benefits under this title, in the form of educational and training benefits or in voucher form, or both, in any amount that would exceed the amount of educational assistance benefits paid to a person under chapter 30 of title 38, United States Code, or under chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, as determined by the Secretary of Defense in consultation with the Chairperson of the Board of Directors of the Foundation.

(b) LIMITATIONS ON USES OF BENEFITS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, vouchers provided under section 146 may be used for the purposes set forth in clause (A) or (B) of subsection (d)(1) of that section only if educational assistance payments made under chapter 30 of title 38, United States Code, and under chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, are permitted to be used for the same purposes.

Mr. McCAIN. On behalf of myself, Mr. GORTON, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. COATS, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. GRAMM, I propose this amendment, which I will briefly describe.

Mr. President, this amendment simply incorporates the principle that postservice benefits under the national service program, which is embodied in the bill, S. 1430, shall not exceed the postservice benefits we provide to the men and women who volunteer and risk their lives for our country in the Armed Forces.

I want to restate that I have been a strong supporter of the concept of national service. I believe in it, and I believe there is a wide variety of services that can be provided by all American citizens on behalf of this Nation. But I also feel that we are making a grave mistake if we propose postservice benefits which would exceed that of the men and women who serve in the military.

Mr. President, S. 1430 would provide postservice benefits to national service volunteers that exceed those that serve in the military. S. 1430 offers a voucher of $5,000 per year for full-time national service, and $2,000 per year for part-time national service. Additionally, the pending legislation would allow national service volunteers three options for use of the vouchers. The vouchers can be used for payment of student loans from Federal and non-Federal sources; downpayment or closing costs associated with purchasing a first home; or tuition at an institution of higher education on a full-time basis, or to pay the expenses incurred in the full-time participation in an apprenticeship program approved by the appropriate State agency.

Mr. President, on April 3, 1989, I introduced S. 781, the National Service Act of 1989. In this legislation, which was also introduced in the House by Mr. PORTER of Illinois, we attempted to draft legislation that was balanced and fair. A bill that looked into the future and tried to address the question of national service from the standpoint that we, as a nation, and those of us in Congress, have as a primary responsibility—I emphasize primary responsibility—the defense of the Nation.

At the same time, we believed that the idea of national service could include certain forms of community service. The basis of our legislation was that every citizen has a responsibility of service to the Nation. To this end, we drafted S. 781 to reflect the need for a quality military force, while introducing a part-time community service program that was a demonstration project designed to observe and evaluate how national service would be received and how it would operate.

In addition, we knew that the idea of national service deserved a close and thorough review by the Congress and the President. We knew that the President needed sufficient time to consider the impact of a bill with such wide ranging implications.

S. 781 called for the President to transmit to the Congress by February 15, 1991, a plan that would implement a comprehensive national service program. The program that the President recommended was to include a plan that had a military service component and a part- and full-time community service component, applied to young people between the ages of 16 and 26, include provisions to encourage national service by retired persons and was to be consistent with the following findings:

One, that the principal responsibility of the Federal Government is to provide for the defense of the United States.

Two, that an obligation of citizenship in a democracy is service to the Nation.

Three, that while most citizens of the United States view national service as a membership in the Armed Forces, national service also includes community service.

Four, that the obligation of national service, whether military or community service, should be shared equally by all citizens of the United States, regardless of race, creed, ethnic origin, or socioeconomic status.

Five, that the recent high quality of volunteers to the Armed Forces should not be allowed to diminish as a result of demographic declines or economic upturns.

That service in the Active or Reserve components in the Armed Forces or full- or part-time community service should be considered as necessary to fulfill the national service obligation.

I add that our bill did not call for the elimination of educational loans or grants. So you see, I am one who strongly believes a national service program is possible. I am also one who strongly believes it is imperative that we maintain a relative balance between the recognition of service in the military in the form of the Montgomery GI bill education benefit and the benefit of service in the community service side of national service.

It is on this point that I take exception with S. 1430. Title I, subtitle (d), of this bill would give a full-time community service volunteer a postservice benefit of $10,000 for 2 years of service. This national service voucher could be used for educational loan payments, future education expenses, or a downpayment on a first home. Contrast this with the current Montgomery GI bill for the U.S. service man or woman, a basic education voucher of $10,800, of which he must contribute $1,200. The military receives a yearly benefit of $3,200 per year for a 3-year service requirement. The Reserves and National Guard benefit is $900 a year.

Mr. President, this is clearly not a fair situation. We ask our military to serve 3 to 6 years, to move out of their home, to go to boot camp and to be assigned to anywhere the military chooses to send them, to respond to the orders of higher authority, with the possibility that we will ask them to risk their lives in the defense of freedom for peoples throughout the world. For all of this, the Government contributes $3,200 per year to their postservice educational benefit.

Compare this to what we are offering in this bill, a $5,000 a year benefit to stay at home and work a 40-hour workweek with no risk, no disruption of lifestyle, no moves, no Uniform Code of Military Justice, no separation from family, no risk of life in combat. In addition to being able to use the voucher for education, the national service volunteers are given a tremendous option of being able to use the voucher for the downpayment on a first home, or to pay off an education loan. The part-time voucher is $2,000 a year.

Mr. President, the differential in postservice benefits between military and community service must be fair. It must be equitable. We must recognize the sacrifices of those who serve in the military. This amendment would make the benefits more equitable. This amendment will make the postservice benefits no greater for national service than that for the Montgomery GI bill recipient.

Mr. President, some would like to compare military service with national service. They would try to show how much more compensation the military service man or woman makes than a national service volunteer. They want to somehow equate them. Apparently, they do not understand what the country asks of our military forces. When a person enlists in the military, they sign a binding contract for service in the defense of the Nation. They have their background scrutinized to ensure they are of the quality required in the military. They are required to take remote tours, away from family, for extended periods of time.

They are uprooted from their home and community every 2 to 3 years, their children are pulled out of school and sent to wherever the military wants to send them.

They perform peacekeeping duty in the Sinai Desert or with the UNIFIL contingent in Lebanon.

They stand guard duty at the stark, critical outposts along the Korean DMZ.

They are deployed on board ships for 6 months at a time.

They stand midwatch on the fan tail of a destroyer in 50-knot winds and 20-foot seas.

They conduct interdiction operations against a murderous drug cartel.

They do night recovery operations on board an aircraft carrier.

They are required to be on call 24 hours a day, 7 days a week.

They are trained and ready for combat.

They are aware that they could be in combat in a matter of hours as they were recently in the Panamanian operation.

They always know that their chosen profession could leave their wife a widow and their children fatherless.

Mr. President, the mothers and fathers, the wives and children of those who serve in the military know the sacrifices of which I speak. They know that their son or husband, their brother or father may well be asked to give his life in the defense of our Nation.

Those who pretend that you can equate what is being called for in this bill in the way of national service work with what we ask of our military do not understand that military service comes at a much higher cost in terms of personal and family sacrifice. It is naive to try and equate picking up trash along a roadside with the sacrifices made by the men in the Marine Corps, the Navy, and the Army who were killed in action in Panama.

That is in no way a denigration of the outstanding and wonderful contributions that men and women who engage in national service will perform in behalf of this country. My point is that the roles and missions we ask them are significantly different.

Mr. President, those who go into the military know what they are being asked to do. We pay our military based, in part, on the risk, the responsibility, the personal sacrifice, and the family disruption that they will experience during their career. Let us not mock their dedication by trying to make some wild proclamation that national service is worth some percentage of combined in-service and postservice benefit of military service. Mr. President, it was stated that the military receives 40 percent more benefits than this bill will offer national volunteers. They should, Mr. President; they should. In fact, they should receive much more than that.

Mr. President, how can we quantify the sacrifice of those killed in Panama? Go to Arlington Cemetery and give me some percentage of how much more they were paid. Try and compare their sacrifices with the national service jobs in this bill and tell me that it is worth 40 percent more.

Mr. President, the All-Volunteer Force is a very professional, very dedicated and very necessary part of our ability to protect our way of life. The All-Volunteer Force is a career force. Trying to compare an in-service stipend of the national service volunteer program with the compensation of our military force falls short of logic and understanding.

To use military in-service benefits to justify this bill's obvious shortcomings is unfair to the men and women who daily make great sacrifices to protect our Nation and the free world.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I say to my friend from Maryland I have about 60 more seconds and then I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland. Go ahead.

(Mr. DODD assumed the chair.)

Ms. MIKULSKI. I am very happy to wait for the Senator to complete his statement. I just have a few questions to clarify the amendment in order to respond at a later time. The questions are not in the nature of a debate.

Mr. McCAIN. Good. I will conclude very soon, and I will look forward in trying to respond to the questions of my friend from Maryland.

Mr. President, there are many good reasons to change this bill when you look at the impact on the relationship to young Americans in the Armed Forces. But about all, the one decisive reason that I base this amendment on is fairness. It is unfair to provide greater benefits for people participating in this bill's National Service Program, as worthy as that program is than the young Americans in the Marine Corps, Army, Air Force, Navy, or Coast Guard, in the Active and Reserve Forces and the National Guard.

The question we should ask ourselves is are we going to provide American youth more in post-service benefits for national service than those serving their country in the military?

I believe that this disparity needs to be rectified and I believe that this amendment will make sure that at least equal benefits are provided for those who serve in the military as those who will engage in the very worthwhile and important endeavor of national service.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a few questions?

Mr. McCAIN. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Since we dispensed with the reading of the amendment, is it in the Senator's amendment; does he drop the ability for that voucher to be used, not only drop the ability to use that voucher toward first time homeownership? In the original bill the voucher either part time or full time could be used to reduce student debt or as a kind of housing or nest egg first time homeownership. Does the Senator drop the housing part?

Mr. McCAIN. If I may respond to my friend from Maryland, yes, it does. If the Senator from Maryland would like to revise her legislation so that those who presently serve in the military receive that benefit of a first home nest egg as she describe it, then it would certainly be something that I could support. But again I go back to the fairness issue. I am sure that those young men and women who are in the military also deserve every consideration to have that nest egg as well.

My answer is yes, it does preclude that.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I promised the Senator I will not use the questions to debate. I will make those comments later.

Those wonderful, gallant men and women who serve in the military do have access to Veterans' Administration mortgages upon completion of the military with no downpayment even though the administration is currently circulating an idea to change the requirements for VA mortgages requiring a substantial down payment, and I look forward to joining with the Senator from Arizona destroying such an unpatriotic idea.

But at the same time, if we could just then think of this: What would be then the voucher under the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, what would then be the voucher received for full-time service and part-time service under the community service under the Senator's amendment, the actual dollar amount? It is a complicated formula, and I am not very good at that.

Mr. McCAIN. First of all, as far as the veterans eligible for home loans, as the Senator points out, first, they have to qualify for that. Second of all, many veterans would attest to the fact that it is not exactly a good deal given the interest on the home loan mortgages are up to 10 percent and the possibility of them going higher.

Again, I would like to restate if the Senator would like to have that as part of the national service voluntary program, I would certainly be supportive of changing her legislation to include those same benefits which our veterans now receive rather than cut it out for all.

The voucher, as outlined in my amendment, would result in $61.54 a week $3,200 a year full time.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Excuse me. With the conversations going on, it was difficult to hear. How much a year? I could not hear the Senator.

Mr. McCAIN. $3,200 a year for full time, $5,400 total for part time.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Excuse me; $3,200 for the full time?

Mr. McCAIN. Yes.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Of course, that is taxable under the Senator's amendment. Or is it tax exempt?

Mr. McCAIN. That would be nontaxable, just like the veteran's VA loan.

Ms. MIKULSKI. In the course of our amending the legislation and in the process of conciliation with the others concerned about it, we dropped the tax-exempt status. But anyway what would be the part-time voucher?

Mr. McCAIN. $5,400 per year, total.

Ms. MIKULSKI. $5,000. No, I am talking about that part of the bill modeled on the National Guard.

Mr. McCAIN. Excuse me, $900 a year, part time.

Ms. MIKULSKI. $900.

Mr. McCAIN. It is $900.

Ms. MIKULSKI. $900 and then that is taxable?

Mr. McCAIN. As I informed the Senator, not taxable.

Ms. MIKULSKI. So the Senator's amendment would be nontaxable.

Mr. McCAIN. Yes.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I thank the Senator. That clarifies my questions.

Let me restate, if I might, before I give up the floor, if the Senator wants to raise the benefits of those in the military to make them the same as the part-time or full-time national service volunteers, I am absolutely totally in favor of it. But again I would restate unequivocally, to give people, as wonderful and as admirable as the work is for national service volunteers, to give them larger postservice benefits than those who serve in the military in my view is something that has to be rectified. Given the parameters of this legislation, the only option I have is to, of course, have an amendment which puts them on an equal basis for postservice benefits.

I would eagerly join both my friend from Massachusetts, who is a member of the Armed Services Committee, as well as the Senator from Maryland, in seeking to increase those benefits for our men and women in the military as far as postservice benefits are concerned. As it is, the only option I have on this amendment is to make sure that they are at least treated on an equal basis so far as postservice benefits are concerned.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, is intending to come over to the floor shortly and has been necessarily detained. But he has announced his strong opposition to this amendment and outlined very briefly the reasons for that. I would like to bring those issues to the attention of the Senate and ask for Senators' attention to these observations.

He opposes the amendment of Senator MCCAIN lowering the voucher levels for post-service benefits and requiring that the post-service benefit for national service be no greater than the post-service benefit for military service under the Montgomery GI bill.

Some of the fundamental principles about national service and military service bring the sponsors of the bill in complete agreement with the sponsors of this amendment.

First, while military service is one form of national service, we must also remember that it is different from most other forms of national service because of the sacrifices we ask of those who serve in the military.

As we have seen recently in Panama, military members live with the possibility that they will be sent into combat and asked to risk their lives for their country.

Second, for several reasons military members should receive more compensation than we give to people who perform other forms of national service.

Military service involves greater risks to the individual.

The military services must be able to attract sufficient numbers of high quality youth into service.

And finally, any national service program should assist the Department of Defense in recruiting young people to enter the military, and not compete with the military services recruiting efforts.

The national service demonstration programs in this bill recognize these important aspects of the relationship between military service and other forms of national service.

Senator MCCAIN is concerned that the postservice benefit for some people in the national service demonstration programs could be higher than the postservice benefits for some military members under the Montgomery GI bill.

Under S. 1430 as amended this could happen in some instances. But this concern misses a key point: The overall compensation for military service—the combination of inservice and postservice benefits is substantially higher for military service than the overall compensation for civilian national service.

This includes the basic pay, the retirement pay, disability benefits, health care in service and after service, preferential hiring as veterans, housing allowances, group insurance, veterans home loans, spousal employment preference, and day care programs.

The in-service compensation for full-time military service is more than two times greater than the level of in-service compensation for full-time national service participants.

The postservice educational benefit for most 2-year enlistees in the military is $9,000, which includes a $1,200 contribution by the member.

The main point is that the overall compensation—in-service pay plus postservice benefits—is substantially higher for 2 years of service in the military than it is for 2 years of civilian national service.

Another way to look at this question is to compare the weekly compensation of military service and civilian national service.

A 2-year enlistee in the military receives an average of $287 a week in compensation. The value of his post service benefit is worth $86 per week of service, for a total weekly compensation of $373.

A 2-year civilian national service participant receives about $162 per week. The value of his postservice benefit is $96 per week of service, for a total of $258, approximately two-thirds of the value of the total compensation of his military counterpart.

Mr. President, this is even more dramatic in the part-time service. We have worked very carefully to ensure that the national service demonstration programs complement rather than compete with recruiting programs for the military service. The overall compensation in service pay plus deferred postservice benefits is much higher for full-time and part-time military service than it is for full-time and part-time civilian national service.

Mr. President, these numbers have been calculated by the Armed Services Committee which as reviewed all of these various items. It reviewed in great detail the McCain amendment. For that reason the chairman of the Armed Services Comittee believes very strongly that our program presents no competition really for the GI bill which he has also supported. He has revised his own program in a very significant way to try and ensure that it would not.

We have reviewed very, very carefully the comparison of the total benefit package. We will submit those items for the RECORD. But they indicate, Mr. President, that this total package versus both the full-time and part-time national service are not even comparable to the kind of benefit package that is included in the military. For that reason we are opposed to the amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I seem to have missed something in this bill. I just heard my friend from Massachusetts pointing out the value of civilian national service at $231 a week. I thought this was a bill about voluntarism.

I noticed that the report on the bill starts off: "Background and Need. Service to others is an ideal that has served America well throughout history." Then it goes on to talk about John Winthrop, the first elected Governor of Massachusetts Bay Colony, who captured the idea of voluntarism in words that still ring true three-and one-half centuries later.

All we are trying to do by this amendment is to see that people who are in the armed services, not people who go home at night as they do in civilian national service—the Senator from Massachusetts forgot to mention those going home at night—are treated equally. When you are in the service you are away from your family, you are away from your home. It is a difficult, different thing altogether.

What the Senator from Arizona says is that the benefits to people who are essentially volunteers should not be greater in any sense or in any aspect than the benefits that accrue to people who have been in the Armed Services of the United States. Young men and women who get involved, unfortunately, from time to time, in activities that put their lives in jeopardy, as was mentioned, most recently in Panama.

Then I hear my friend from Maryland talk about the home mortgage. As I understand this bill, there is some mortgage credit given, some monetary credit that can be applied to the purchase of a house. As I recall I had a VA guarantee on my first mortgage, they did not give me anything. I took out a rather long mortgage and paid the going rate and I had to qualify. None of these things apply to the civilian national service person. There are some great differences here, and the Senator from Arizona's amendment is very much in order. There are differences just in the nature of what people are being called on to do.

As I look at this report, the next sentence after what I read begins, "In this spirit, volunteers have served the Nation in times of crisis—in war, depression, national disaster."

All throughout this report, Mr. President, it talks about voluntarism. And now I am told that individuals will receive more benefits in this bill than if they leave their homes and serve in the Armed Services of the country. This bill is about setting up some compensation to compensate volunteers. What this amendment is about is that these volunteers should not receive greater benefits in any way than the people who serve in the armed services.

The difference is, in my judgment, very meaningful. There is a postservice benefit differential between this bill and the current Montgomery GI bill that really is the reverse of what it should be. Some of those things have been pointed out by my friend from Arizona.

Title III of this bill gives full-time community service volunteers postservice benefit of $10,000. The GI bill authorizes only a $10,800 postservice education voucher for a serviceman or woman, of which the volunteer has to put up $1,200 of his own, as the Senator from Arizona pointed out.

Community service volunteers under this bill are only required to serve for 2 years to qualify for their benefit, the military volunteer must serve 3, 4, or 6 years. I mean, there are some great differences.

The amendment of the Senator from Arizona is well founded and it should be adopted. This bill is going to underwrite voluntarism, a contradiction in terms, in my judgment.

When the Senator from Arizona says that the members of the armed services should at least receive the same amount of benefits that these so-called volunteers get, he is told by the manager of the bill that the inservice benefits—and I am not sure if he counted the uniforms and the food and the housing in figuring the inservice benefits—that the inservice benefits are more for servicemen than they are for civilian national service volunteers. "Volunteers," I emphasize again, community service volunteers. They can use their postservice vouchers for education costs, or to forgive previous student loans, or for the down payment on a first home. The military volunteers may use their vouchers only for education costs.

Under the Montgomery GI bill military volunteers serve 3 to 6 years, do a boot camp, move to wherever the military assigns them and they do not come home at night. They are subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice and face the real possibility that they will risk life and limb to protect vital U.S. interests.

Under S. 1430, national service volunteers, would serve for 2 years, stay at home, work 40 hours a week, suffer no grave hardships, encounter no risks to life and limb, essentially endure no interruption of lifestyle, and are not subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice. For this, they receive a $10,000 voucher for their education or for their first home.

Clearly, many will ask: What should I do? Should I go into community service or military service? Many recruits are armed service volunteers because of the postservice educational benefits. Many of my constituents have told me they enter the service so they can, indeed, get a postservice educational benefit.

For example, 70 percent of the Army rangers who served in Grenada were enrolled in the Army college fund. Better benefits will make community service more attractive to those recruits than military service. Mr. President, that is just plain wrong. It will impose additional burdens on our military recruiters.

Call a local recruiting station and ask them what S. 1430 would do to their ability to recruit quality high school graduates to our armed services. Clearly, this bill would become well known in the high schools and colleges of our country and do a great disservice to those who are trying to recruit graduates to our armed services.

Some argue that the manpower pool from which the military and national service would recruit is so large that both services would enjoy adequate levels of recruits. They argue that there are 30 million high school graduates in the recruiting age group for both these services. Since title III is mainly a demonstration program, it should have no impact on military recruiting.

But, subtract from the 30 million all those who are not mentally, physically, or morally qualified and fit for military service. Subtract high school graduates who go immediately on to college. Consider that the vast majority of military recruits enlist within 1 year of high school graduation and most are males. Then the real population for military recruits shrinks to about 1 million, perhaps somewhat more, but around 1 million.

Even if military recruiting goals are reduced from 300,000 to 225,000 to correspond to the reductions in Armed Forces manpower from 2.1 to 1.8 million, the military must still recruit one out of every four qualified high school graduates. Community service becomes considerably more attractive when you can stay at home, and receive benefits that apply to education that are as meaningful or more meaningful, indeed that are more flexible than the types of benefits that are offered to people who go into the service.

The military recruiters are going to have their problems. We simply will not be able to recruit the exceptional volunteers that comprise today's armed services.

I recall, Mr. President, when I came to the Senate, the difficulty we had in recruiting people to the armed services. At that time people in the armed services simply were not being paid enough.

When I came to the U..S. Senate, half a million members of the armed services and their spouses and dependents qualified for food stamps. We do not want to return to that once again.

This bill would not necessarily return us to it, but why create a competitive situation that would undermine recruitment to the armed services? Why create a situation where one gets paid for volunteering? Volunteering goes right back to the Massachusetts Bay Colony. It has played a major role in the development of our country.

I have been the head of many volunteer organizations. For 3 years, I was the head of the American Cancer Society in Minnesota. For 3 years, I was the head of the Kidney Foundation in Minnesota and the Dakotas and for a year, I was chairman of the Minnesota Mental Health Association. Mr. President, I have worked with volunteers.

I do not believe that volunteers should be paid, but if they are, their benefits should not be better than those who volunteer to serve in America's armed services. I support the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona and thank him for bringing it to the floor. I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I would like to rise in opposition to the McCain amendment, yet at the same time acknowledge the very fine points made by the Senator from Arizona as he outlined the rather substantial sacrifice that military service calls for from our men and women.

There is no doubt that a career in the United States military is hard, is arduous, and there can be no compensation adequate to meet those demands often placed upon them.

We salute the U.S. military, and I can tell my colleagues, as one of the principal architects of this bill, there is no intention in any way to undermine the ability of the U.S. military to both recruit and retain adequate personnel, either now or in the future.

Our commitment is to the U.S. military, and that is why so many of us have been aggressive in supporting the Montgomery bill, and also adequate funding in appropriations for veterans benefits that I will comment on in a minute or two.

One of the things that I think our bill, the current Kennedy-Mikulski-Nunn bill does, is actually do a demonstration project, which I know the Senator from Arizona would like.

We are talking about a bill that, by the way, will only be authorized for 2 years. We are talking about a bill, which the Senator from Arizona perhaps does not realize, is only authorized for 2 years, and we have to authorize it. If, in the course of that 2-year period, we see a drastic slump in military recruitment, we can jettison the bill. That is No. 1.

Second, if the bill continues along the demonstration proposal, we are talking about 35 States over a 5-year period.

I bring out the significance of this because, in order to participate, a Governor must submit a plan. No Governor is going to submit a plan that negatively impacts upon the military and, in the course of the first 18 months, we will again know the consequences of this in terms of this demonstration project over a 5-year period. That is why we will find out what its impact is. We do not anticipate a negative consequence because of the way we have carefully designed this bill.

Let me go to this much-criticized voucher program and what really the men and women who participate in this will actually get.

First, for those who participate on a full-time basis, either in Peace Corps, in VISTA, a conservation corps, or so on, they will get a $5,000 taxable benefit. They will go away from their home; they will live in Bangladesh; they will work in South Africa; they will work in neighborhoods that are as terrorizing as any foreign country that they could ever work in in the Peace Corps. For that, there will be a skimpy subsistence level with no other backup. For that, yes, they will receive a $5,000 voucher. And then, whatever full-time program they participate in, they will leave with their heads up high, but they will not leave with their pockets filled. There will be no other benefit than this one-time-only voucher.

For the part-timers who live at home, Mr. President, that is a $2,000 voucher, and it is presumed the young men and women will be working in the community as well as volunteering. We are going to ask two weekends a month out of them, or the time equivalent, plus two weekends during the summer. At 9 hours a week, with the $900 voucher of the Senator from Arizona, it is going to come out to something like $1.91 an hour. Mr. President, our kids can do better selling shoes at a mall than they can delivering weekend Meals on Wheels under this program.

That is not the point of the program. The point of the program is to give a jump start to these young men and women. By the way, if they pay taxes in the 15-percent bracket, this voucher will come in at $1,800, and, also, under the urging of Senator HATCH and our Republican colleagues, we have made it even more flexible, Mr. President, because a Governor can submit a State plan making the voucher lower as long as it is not below a year's tuition cost in his own public college.

So we think we are not creating a bill that is a new pot of gold for people. We also do not think that that in any way is a distraction to the men and women who want to serve in the National Guard.

Two last points on housing. Mr. President, not every kid in this country is going to go to college. Not every kid in this country wants to go to college. Not everybody wants to work on a Ph.D. or get a law degree. What many of them want to do is go to our technical schools and, in the end, they want to volunteer. They want to be voluntary firefighters in rural areas, where we are running a shortfall; they want to build houses for habitat for their community, like Garrett County that has the severest housing shortage of any part of my State. While they are going to the Garrett Community College, they might not have a tuition bill, but through their own sweat equity, they might want to accumulate that nest egg for first-home benefits.

This takes me to veterans' benefits. The Senator from Arizona is right, the veterans' package has, indeed, been austere. I chair the Appropriations Subcommittee on VA, HUD, and Independent Agencies. I had to go against the whole White House and OMB to squeeze more money to put money into veterans' health care, and they deserve it, and they deserve more. I am glad the President this year is catching up with the Democratic Congress of last year.

We are taking a look at the veterans housing programs and the VA mortgage. While we are seeing how we can strengthen them in the Appropriations Committee, out comes this new ad out of the administration to want downpayments from our veterans. Sure, some of them might not qualify, but most would. I want to work with any and all in this U.S. Senate to improve veterans' benefits. But do not penalize the good kids who are going to want to do national service because there are potholes in the current Veterans Administration program. Let us not make two wrongs to make a right. And at the same time, I do believe the veterans' package is substantially better than one would indicate.

At the same time, our kids in civilian service will not get veterans' preference in jobs, and they should not. They should not qualify for a VA mortgage, and they will not. They will not qualify for veterans health care and a variety of other things, but that is OK. They will perhaps learn the habits of the heart, and, with the skimpy voucher we provide them, maybe they can go on having access to the American dream.

Mr. President, let me just conclude with one fact. There is a new study out in Washington that talks about how 25 percent of the black men are now in prison. Twenty-five percent of the black men are now in prison. There are more black men in prison than there are in colleges. That is a heartbreaking circumstance.

I want to say yes to the kids who say no to drugs, no to getting pregnant, who want to make something out of their lives. Mr. President, this is an opportunity for that 75 percent who see no opportunities for them, and I hope we defeat the McCain amendment. Honor our military in the veterans and defense programs, but let us also honor the volunteers in this program.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will just take a couple of moments here to indicate to the membership effectively what we are talking about with this part of the program. Basically, what we are talking about is that the stipend for those who are going to volunteer for full-time service is effectively the poverty wage. That troubles some when you calculate it and find out how much it is a week. It bothers some to say we have volunteers, and we are truly paying them a poverty wage. Some Members of this body think that any remuneration—even for those in full time service that lasts a year—is too much. I disagree. Anybody who commits a year should get some minimal living allowance.

What we are telling these people is simply this: if you are willing to spend an extended period of time involved in community service at basically a poverty wage for a period of time, that at the end of that service—some modest resources may be available to help them meet college costs or to help them purchase a home.

Mr. President, I know that there are some who think service should only be available to those with resources to volunteer. Who are going to be those people? It is just going to be the very wealthy. Our proposal provides a small stipend and vouchers to enable young people to do this. Our proposal also recognizes that an education benefit is something that benefits not only the individual but also benefits the country as well.

I see now the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. He has worked extremely hard and long on this bill. He has been a real leader in the development of this proposal. He has commented that the full time service participant would get 60 percent of the benefit going to a military enlistee. I hope the Senate will listen to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee whose proposal we are addressing at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. As I said yesterday, I thank him for his leadership on this issue. I want to, first, agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. If we want nobody but the rich people or the upperclass in this country to volunteer, then let us kill this bill and go on about our business and hope we will have rich people who will be willing to spend their time in sufficient numbers to do the job we need in social services.

This bill has a different philosophy and a different concept. This bill says that there are a lot of people out there—middle-income people, lower income people, and even poor people—who would like to do something for their community. They would also like to get an education and be a contributing member of society.

I do not know how many people focused on it, but we have had a 25-percent decrease in low-income students going to college since 1985, including minorities but not limited to minorities—something like a 25-percent decrease at the very time when we are trying to get more competitive in our society to be able to compete in the world.

Before I say why I am against the McCain amendment, which I am opposed to—I vigorously oppose the amendment—let me talk about a couple of things on which I agree with the Senator from Arizona because the philosophy behind the amendment is something with which I think we all agree.

The philosophy is that the military ought to be paid more than people in these jobs we are now making available for civil and community service. I agree with that. The military takes risks that civilians do not take. In Panama, we had people in the military down there who not only risked their lives but who gave their lives. So I do not think anyone quarrels with that principle. The military should be paid more, substantially more than people who are serving in community-based activities, although they are also serving the country, and we should make no mistake about that.

Military service must be able to attract sufficient numbers of high-quality youth in the service. There is no doubt about that. And a national service program, any national service program should take into account the recruiting capabilities and potentials and problems and challenges of the military, and this bill does that. So we all agree on that point.

But I think everyone ought to understand that if this bill passes and becomes law, 2-year enlistees in the military will be receiving 31 percent more than these people in these jobs, because we are paying them very low wages. The main thing we are trying to do is stimulate young people to serve in exchange for an educational benefit.

Now, if the amendment of the Senator from Arizona passes, you can wipe this program out because they are not going to get enough educational benefit to really be able to complete their school work or to go to school, and you are not going to have the incentive to get people to go into very low-income jobs in order to get the educational benefit.

The main part of this carrot is not the wage and the compensation. The main part of this carrot is really the educational benefit. What the amendment of the Senator from Arizona says is you get no more in part service benefits than 2-year enlistees in the military are getting. But what he does not do is raise the wage of the civilian national service participant to compete with that military wage. And we do not want to do that either, because we want to attract people who are interested not primarily in making money but primarily interested in serving their fellow man and also getting an education. That is what we are trying to appeal to.

So what we have to emphasize to our colleagues is, this amendment looks good on its face but what it does not tell you is that we have already calibrated that differential between the military and this civic volunteer. The military will be making 31 percent more. And it is even larger than that if you compare the part-time volunteer with the part-time reservist. It is much more than that because the part-time volunteer does not get paid anything. Their whole compensation is in the form of the educational voucher—they don't receive any pay while they are serving.

One other point, Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona does not point out that there are much larger benefits available in the military than what his amendment is geared to. He has geared his amendment to the minimum educational benefit in the military. He has not geared it to the larger benefits that are available.

The 2-year civil volunteer under our program would be able to get about $10,000 in educational benefits. A 2-year volunteer in the military, normal program, can get $9,000, approximately $9,000, minus $1,200 that they contribute themselves, which gets down to $7,800. So it is $7,800 versus $10,000.

But guess what? If that same military member decides he wants to get more educational benefit and decides to go into combat arms or other types of endeavors, they can get $18,000 in benefits, a lot higher than anybody can qualify for under this program. But he does not address that because he gears his amendment simply to the lowest benefits that are available if you sign up for scholarship. And if someone serves in the military for 3 years and decides to go into certain specialties where you get additional benefits, they can get up to $25,800.

So what the Senator is doing here is ostensibly comparing apples to apples in this amendment. We are not comparing apples to apples at all. We are comparing two different philosophies, two different programs that have already been calibrated but have been calibrated by paying the civic volunteer much less overall than we pay the military counterpart.

We also are not comparing apples to apples in terms of what is available to the military, which is up to $18,000. In fact some 20,000 people in the military get supplemental educational benefits because they go into certain critical skills.

So I hope that this amendment will be voted down because it, in effect, as the Senator from Maryland has already said, would gut this program. If you do not want the program, vote against the bill. But let us not do it by the back door. Let us not kill it by making it so low in terms of educational benefits that we defeat the whole purpose of the bill, which is to get young people to go to school and to further their education and to help America become more competitive.

If this same type of amendment had applied back when we were trying to entice people into the military, we never would have signed them up. We have tried to make the military much more lucrative, not simply by educational benefits but by the total pay package. I do not think anyone ought to be deceived. The military has a total package. It includes all sorts of benefits, including housing benefits, including food benefits, including a lot of things that are not part of this rather austere pilot program. So I would hope that we would vote down the McCain amendment.

Mr. McCAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I certainly am impressed by some of the remarks of the distinguished chairman. I hope he recognizes that the Department of Defense is in strong disagreement with many of the points he just made, including the fact that the Department of Defense points out major objections which clearly refute some of the statements the distinguished chairman of the committee was making.

In the words of the Department of Defense:

> This legislation appears to offer significant competition to military recruiting in the test areas without recognizing that the national imperative of the military recruiting objectives be met.
> The legislation appears to rely upon flawed test designs and will not permit proper assessment of national impact. The bill fails to require coordination programs of military activities likely to be affected. The bill does not make use of existing resources when counseling potential applicants on service opportunities.

The Department of Defense states, Mr. President, that "the net result of this legislation is to tip the playing field, particularly military recruiting programs, at a distinct disadvantage," with which I obviously agree.

Mr. President, the issue is fairness. I thought we were talking about inducing people to volunteer, not trying to compete on a salary basis with men and women in the military, who are asked to risk their lives. The distinguished chairman of the committee simply points out that a member of the military is paid more than this national service program. That certainly should not surprise or astound anyone. But the fact is that the benefits postservice for national service would exceed those of a person who serves in the military and risks his life or, tragically, sacrifices his life and never gets to enjoy those benefits with which we provide him.

Mr. President, equating national service to military and the fact that a member of the military is paid more, I would hope that all of us would see how appropriate that is. I would also point out that the Department of Defense is deeply concerned about tipping the scales against the military, and that is why they oppose the bill.

I also want to say in addition to that, Mr. President, that $1.91 an hour for volunteer work, although low, may not be entirely inappropriate if we are talking about people who are volunteers and people who are going to receive substantial posteducational benefits.

The distinguished chairman points out about large amounts of money for posteducation benefits for certain numbers in the military. He fails to point out that these are very, very limited programs. They target programs. They target scarce and demanding skills that are used to manage the force. The majority of those that enter the military have a Montgomery GI bill benefit of $10,800 of which the service man or woman is required to contribute $1,200. I might point out there is no contribution on the part of any of these national service volunteers to help defray the costs of the posteducation benefits that are provided.

Mr. President, I would not like to go home to the VFW post or the American Legion or the DAV and tell those veterans who have served and sacrificed that we now have a program that is going to provide greater benefits to people who do not serve in the military.

The purpose of this amendment is to level the playing field. I am not even seeking less for those who are engaged in national service. I am asking for equal and equitable and level playing field numbers for those who engage in national service as well as those who engage in service in the military and defense of this Nation and freedom.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I wonder if we have forgotten the reason why the GI bill of rights education benefits were restored a decade ago? Perhaps some have forgotten but I remember quite vividly during the last half of the seventies our military was falling apart. We were hearing the most dire predictions about the inability of the Navy particularly, and to a lesser extent the Army, to fill its critical skills. The Secretary of the Navy actually beached some ships because they could not find enough qualified seamen to sail them. We read day after day reports in newspaper accounts of the declining education levels of military personnel, including those in both the Army and the Navy, and to a lesser extent the Air Force.

The manuals which were given to soldiers to run these complicated sophisticated weapons, and we should remember that a modern tank which is operated by a crew of high school graduates is far more complicated than the World War II airplane for which we required a college educated person to fly. These manuals related to sophisticated complex weapons were being written down from 12th grade standard English down to 8th grade English.

At one point, if memory serves me correctly—I do not think I have forgotten the main issue. I do not have the statistics. If I recall correctly at one point we reached the point where the educational achievement of recruits had fallen so low that there really was a growing movement to reinstate the draft.

It was about at that point that as one Member of the Senate I concluded something had to be done. I had long believed that peacetime conscription is an evil that should be avoided. That conscription is a great imposition on any person and should only be restored to in a free country under the most extreme circumstances—in general only at time of war.

So with the prospect and a growing clamor for peacetime conscription, ships being beached, and hollow units showing up in the Army, and with a trend apparently almost irreversible of the least capable persons being the only ones who would seek entry into the armed services, we realized something had to be done.

People like Prof. Charles Moskos of Northwestern University and others came forward and said you cannot buy, or spend enough in salary to attract and hold the kind of people in the armed services you want. The only way that we could think of to do so was the GI bill education benefit because that benefit was precisely the kind of incentive that would be attractive to the type of people we were seeking to bring into the military; that is, the upward mobile people who would be attracted not so much by $10, $50, or $100 a month more in pay but who would have a tremendous incentive to come in to get the education benefit.

In short, Mr. President, we did not reinstitute the GI bill benefits for any abstract or altruistic reason. We did it because our military services were crumbling, crumbling all around us. We needed to do so to attract and hold the quality of people that we needed in the service.

How has it worked out? The answer is as Senators know, it has worked out great. It has fulfilled everything that we expected for it. The military services have reported to us over and over again on the success of the program. But not only are we filling the numbers that we need of new recruits, but we are attracting and holding highly qualified, capable people who are necessary to make a modern military machine function properly. So the program has worked.

Mr. President, it appears to me that if we fail to adopt the McCain amendment we are just asking for trouble. I know at this point perhaps the military is going to be entering a period when it is not as fashionable as it was. Peace is breaking out all over the world. It appears the cold war is over, and in effect we have won the battle. So it is natural that military service is not going to be as popular, as glamorous, as much as in the center of the limelight as it is at times of great tension or even during times of war.

We have seen that before. We went through it in the thirties with disastrous results when World War II came along. Perhaps it is inevitable we are going to do that again.

Mr. President, it seems to me that Senators should be the last ones to fall for that kind of trendy thinking. This is not a moment to undermine the attractiveness of our military service by offering to a new class of Federal employee, and that is really what we are talking about. We call them volunteers, but they are in effect a new class of Federal recipients, at least, whether they are technically employees. To undermine the GI bill benefits which have proven to be a successful recruiting and retention program by offering right out of the box something that is more attractive to a different class of volunteers seems to me to be a great mistake.

Whether it is just or not I leave to others to discuss. I am disposed to believe, as Senator McCain has said, that it is unfair. Whether or not we are offering enough to the volunteers I leave to others to debate. It seems to me that we are offering plenty.

But I would ask Senators to consider as they think of this amendment the probable practical effect on our ability to recruit and hold highly qualified people in the military. It seems to me there is no urgent, compelling reason for us to fool around with the program that is working well or to set up in competition with it something which will make it less attractive.

So I am going to vote for the McCain amendment.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I speak in support of the amendment before us today because of my concern for Americans who are not mentioned in the proposed bill. Americans whose interests are directly and indirectly affected by its provisions. I speak because of my concern for America's veterans.

The Congress expresses the will of the American people, and the American people have long insisted that the unique hardships and risks of military service be recognized by appropriate benefits for those who have served.

Those benefits, Mr. President, have frequently blazed a path for programs to serve nonveterans.

At the end of World War II there was no generally available program of low, or no, down payment long-term mortgage finance. The VA home loan guarantee program demonstrated the benefit of such a program and started this country down the path to becoming a nation of homeowners.

At the end of World War II, opportunities for higher education were limited. But then the colleges and universities of America were flooded with veterans making use of the GI bill. This country has never been the same.

Most Americans can only dream of the safety net which would be provided by a guaranteed minimum income. Wartime veterans who are 65 years of age or older, or who are disabled, from any cause, enjoy such a safety net. A VA pension will pay them the difference between their actual income and $6,767 per year.

This year, VA will provide free impatient hospital treatment to over 1.1 million veterans and, in addition, almost 23 million outpatient visits.

Mr. President, many of these veterans benefits now have parallels available to non-veterans. But never has the comparison been so direct, or unfavorable, as that between the benefits proposed in title III of this bill and those available to the young men and women who serve in our Armed Forces.

A young person entering the Armed Forces desiring post-service education benefits must elect to endure, during the first 12 months of service, a $100 per month salary reduction.

This service member must then successfully complete his or her enlistment and receive an honorable discharge to receive benefits. The basic benefit for 3 years military service is $300 per month for 36 months or $10,800. The basic benefit for a 2-year enlistment is $250 per month or $9,000.

In comparison, a 2-year volunteer participating in the title III pilot program would receive vouchers valued at $10,000.

Mr. President, I will leave it to the Committee on Armed Services to evaluate the effect on recruiting should a program similar to the title III pilot become law. I admit that it defies commonsense to expect that there would be no adverse impact.

My concern, as I noted earlier, is to America's veterans. I believe that enactment of this bill would be interpreted as a congressional judgment on the relative worth, and the relative hardship, of military and domestic service.

Frankly, I can't agree with the judgment that this bill would make.

Based on the benefits provided, this bill values domestic service more highly than military service. I agree that hospital, literacy, and other domestic tasks are of value. But, their value pales against the value of the freedom secured and defended by the members of our armed services. We are currently basking in the warm glow of a world apparently liberated from a cold war.

I urge the Senate not to forget that liberation was in large measure secured by the service of young men and women who endured difficult service to ensure that our adversaries knew there was no viable armed solution to the inevitable internal contradictions of communism.

Incredibly, based on the benefits provided, this bill places a higher premium on domestic service than military service.

This would be the case even though a domestic service volunteer could live at home, eat "mom's home cooking," enjoy the companionship of his or her friends and the atmosphere of his or her hometown. A service member lives on a ship or in barracks, eats messhall chow, has an NCO to keep him in line and endures the hardship of remote bases or long deployments. And, of course, a service member is committed to follow, without question or hesitation, orders which may lead to death or injury.

Mr. President, the relative benefits, hardship, and commitment of domestic service and military service are not consistent with the relative rewards of the benefits which would be provided should this bill become law. The Congress could respond by initiating a bidding war for the services of America's youth. I submit that a better course would be to put domestic service back on a true volunteer basis. We do not need to create what would, in reality, be a new domestic publicly funded jobs program.

We didn't provide veterans' benefits to those who served in the WPA. I believe we should not provide them to the participants in the public works program proposed by this bill.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, just one brief word. I listened carefully to my friend from Colorado. I know how hard he is working on making the volunteer military work, because he is exactly right. I remember when he stood on the floor and pointed out the inadequacies of military pay. His leadership had a lot to do with some of the restoration that was made. But let me just throw out a few figures here. I cannot really see how anyone believes that this bill could possibly undermine military recruiting, if you look at the numbers.

I mean, forget the argument about compensation which I have already made. Forget about the argument that the full-time national service participant earns only two-thirds of the total compensation of most 2-year enlistees in the military.

Forget those arguments for a minute. Just look at the numbers. There are 700,000 people that try to get in the military each year that apply. They can only take 300,000. I will be the first to say some of that 700,000 is not qualified, or cannot meet the standards. But only 300,000 are accepted by the military; 700,000 apply.

When you look at the number of jobs we are talking about here, we are talking about no more than 1,400—not thousands, not 140,000—1,400 full-time pilot project jobs. Anything else has to come back to the Congress. We are talking about no more than 7,200 part-time jobs.

How can anyone believe that 1,400 full-time jobs where they earn 31 percent less than they would earn in the military can affect in any significant way 700,000 people who now apply to the military? I just do not even understand the arithmetic of that. I do not understand the logic of it both from the point of view of compensation, and from the point of view of numbers.

The purpose of this program is to find out some things. One of the things we want to find out is the attractiveness of these positions versus the attractiveness of normal work versus the attractiveness of the military. We have to test this to be able to know what to do on the national basis. That is the test program.

So I urge my colleagues again not to vote for this amendment. If they are against the program, vote against the program, but do not gut the program with the McCain amendment. That is what that would do.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, we have the highest respect and regard for the distinguished chairman and his many years of involvement in manpower issues, and, of course, it is always a great privilege to work with him on a wide variety of issues.

He does not see how anybody could object to this amendment or bill on grounds of recruiting. I say in response that the Department of Defense, and I quote, says, "The net result is a tip in the playing field that places the military recruiting programs at a distinct advantage." That is the view of the Department of Defense. I happen to share it.

My argument on this amendment is not recruiting; it is not anything except fairness. Fairness is what I seek here, and fairness is what the men and women of this country deserve, those in the military. It is not fair to give people greater benefits, who do not serve in the military, than those that do. That is the reason for my amendment, not because of recruiting, not for a variety of other reasons, but simply on the grounds of fairness.

I hope that we will vote affirmatively on this amendment. I look forward to working with the Senator from Massachusetts and the wonderful Senator from Maryland, who has devoted much of her time in trying to help those men and women who have served and are serving in the military. This sends a wrong message, Mr. President, to the men and women who are serving and those who did serve, and we tell them compensation will be higher in a post-service fashion than those who serve in the military.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the Senator will yield, I am not trying to have the last word, but it sure as thunder does affect recruiting. If somebody thinks that potential recruits or potential reenlistees in the services will fail to be sensitive to the meaning of this, which is to say we value service under the new program of volunteers more than we value your service as a member of the Military Establishment, I just think they underestimate the perspicacity of people who are or are thinking about joining the Army, Air Force, Navy, or Marines. They are going to know it, and they will say the emphasis the country and Congress puts on the new program is greater than the old program. It is not just the 1,400 who may or may not join the new program. That is not going to stay at 1,400 if we enact this thing. It will go up. Everything else does around here. It is the message we are transmitting, and it will have an effect on recruiting, and do not kid ourselves about it.

Mr. McCAIN. I might add, our All-Volunteer Force.

Mr. KASTEN. I rise in strong support for the Senator of Arizona and ask that I be made a cosponsor of this amendment.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is my hope that we will dispose of the McCain amendment and the Armstrong amendment. I understand now that there will be a perfecting amendment by the Senator from Colorado, and then we were going to put in the RECORD a very brief exchange regarding its interpretation and then it is my understanding that the desire of the majority leader for the convenience of the membership is that we vote on both these measures back to back. That is what we would like to be able to accomplish.

So if the Senator from Arizona would permit us to go back to the completion of the Armstrong amendment with at least our understanding that we will have back-to-back votes, either on the amendments or on some motion related thereto.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I think we can do that in perhaps a few seconds.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the underlying Armstrong amendment be in order at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1268 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1262

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. HATCH, proposes an amendment numbered 1268 to his amendment 1262.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed in amendment 1262:

On page 8, line 2, after the word "needs" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 8, line 9, after the words "secondary school" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, private sectarian and nonsectarian schools";

On page 10. line 6, after the words "public or private agencies" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 36, line 3 strike "any religious function" and insert in lieu thereof, "the use of funds provided under this title by program participants and program staff to give religious instruction, conduct worship services, or engage in any form of proselytization".

On page 69, line 7, strike the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", but nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent any church or other religious entity from—

(A) displaying religious symbols or decorations;

(B) allowing persons to pray voluntarily, whether silent or vocally;

(C) allowing persons to sing religious hymns; or

(D) affirming or promoting any moral tenet that may be based on religious precepts;".

So long as no funds provided under this Act are used by program participants and program staff for such activities and so long as these activities are conducted in a manner consistent with the Constitution.

On page 70, line 6, after the word "affiliation" insert the following: ", except that nothing in this Act shall prohibit a church or other religious entity from requiring that participants adhere to the religious tenets and teachings of such organizations and further, such organizations may require that participants adhere to rules forbidding the use of drugs or alcohol".

On page 70, line 7, redesignate subsection (c) as subsection (d) and insert after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) QUALIFIED APPLICANTS.—If two or more prospective participants are qualified for any position with a church or other religious entity that is funded under part A of title I or titles II or III, nothing in this Act shall prohibit such organization from accepting a prospective participant for such position who is already participating on a regular basis in other activities of the church or other religious entity.".

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, this has been worked out with the managers and the staff of the managers and by my staff. It satisfies some concerns which the managers raised and does so in a way which is consistent with my intent. Frankly, it is partly styled, and I believe the explanation of the amendment which I previously submitted still applies. However, it is, I think, the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts to submit a colloquy.

And with that explanation, I ask for adoption of the amendment to the amendment, and then the yeas and nays on the underlying amendment that have been ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it appeared as though the responses to this particular amendment are that we follow the pattern that has been accepted with other legislation dealing with the church-State issue, and we wanted to deal with that issue in a particular way. The Senator from Colorado prefers to list certain kinds of activities. We have dealt with that. But I believe that is a constitutional way.

Some adjustments have been made in the Senator's amendments. It seems to me that this is a satisfactory way of proceeding.

Does the Senator desire a rollcall vote on the amendment as amended?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I do.

I think the business now is the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Is there further debate on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. This has been worked out over a long period of time. I think it worked out to the satisfaction of all parties.

It is my understanding that after this amendment is adopted, we will vote on the Armstrong amendment and have a back-to-back vote on the McCain amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that that be the order.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is my understanding that we would vote on the Armstrong amendment, and I think the Senator from Georgia intended to make a tabling motion for the McCain amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, this amendment will authorize a reduction in benefits in national service to be lower than military.

Mr. President, I agree with my colleague from Arizona that there should be some concern over the impact of this legislation on the military. And, none of us who have been involved in the drafting of this legislation want to see other important programs hurt. This legislation is intended only to expand the opportunities for all Americans from all different backgrounds to serve.

In fact, this legislation requires an evaluation of the impact of this program on VISTA, the Older Americans Volunteer Programs, the regular Armed Forces, the Reserve Armed Forces, and the Peace Corps. We already have thousands of volunteers working in these efforts and I am sympathetic to those who have concerns that this new service program will drain people from our existing corps of volunteers.

We should do what we can to encourage more participants in existing volunteer programs, but still work to develop new ways for all Americans to have the opportunity to serve.

I believe Senator MCCAIN has made an important point. We should not make military service an unattractive option to other programs.

My sole concern with this legislation is the limiting of the vouchers, to education benefits only. However, I am very sympathetic to all these issues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to his own amendment?

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, Senator ARMSTRONG has raised the church-state issue with respect to the various grant programs in S. 1430. I want to briefly comment on the church-state issue as it applies to the loan deferment and cancellation provisions of the legislation.

Since 1980, the Higher Education Act has provided that student borrowers may defer repayment of student loans if they perform full-time, low-paid community service with tax exempt community service organizations. In implementing this deferment, the Department of Education has ruled that student borrowers may perform this service for organizations which are tax-exempt because they are religious organizations under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. However, students who serve in religious organizations may not give religious instructions, conduct worship services, engage in religious proselytizing, or engage in fundraising to support religious activities.

The regulations promulgated (35 C.F.R. 674A(B)(4)(V); 682.508(D)(5); and 683.58(D)(5), conform with the intent of Congress in authorizing the deferments in 1980 to avoid violating the constitutional provisions for separation of church and state.

Students who serve with tax-exempt religious organizations should be eligible for loan deferments and loan cancellation benefits under the national services bill, just as they were under the loan deferment program of the Higher Education Act of 1980.

The amendment (No. 1268) was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCAIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Is there further debate on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado?

If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber desiring to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 91, nays 3, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 1267

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] is recognized.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, what is the pending business now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending business is the amendment of Senator MCCAIN, amendment No. 1267, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator ROBB and myself, I move to table the McCain amendment.

NOT VOTING—5

Bentsen	Pryor	Simon
Matsunaga	Sasser

So the motion to lay on the table the amendment (No. 1267) was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 1430, the National and Community Service Act of 1989.

I am particularly pleased that we have worked to include strong language to prevent job displacement. We all agree that the community service bill should expand options so people can work for the public good—not replace existing workers with federally funded volunteers.

The antidisplacement provisions in S. 1430 are the product of lengthy discussions between majority and minority staff, employees and employer groups.

These provisions will ensure active community support, cooperation, and creativity as volunteer programs are implemented.

And active community support from local business, labor, education and other community leaders is essential.

When we first considered S. 1430, organized labor alerted us to the potential for the displacement of paid workers by volunteers, especially in local jurisdictions under financial pressure. I felt strongly—as did organized labor and many of my colleagues—that bitter disagreements between sponsoring employers and their employees would be detrimental to a well-run volunteer program. And we were clear that we did not want to see a federally funded volunteer program result in the loss of paid jobs.

The antidisplacement provisions in this legislation establish the clear intent of Congress to prevent displacement of both existing workers and paid jobs. They also prohibit the conduct of activities that duplicate activities already performed in the jurisdiction.

To achieve speedy resolution of any disputes that might arise, S. 1430 also includes an expedited grievance procedure for resolving any antidisplacement disputes. I am hopeful that, by including such a process, the volunteer program will be protected from protracted disagreements that would cause longlasting animosities. Instead, differences can be resolved promptly, and energies can be focus on the true intent of the program—voluntarism.

In addition, by prohibiting duplication of activities already performed, this bill will guide volunteer programs toward creative activities that meet local needs that are not being met. We do not regard volunteer programs set up under this bill as a replacement for local and ongoing activities. Rather, our intent is to encourage the participation of local volunteers in the development of volunteer activities.

Mr. President, I commend Senator KENNEDY and his staff for their assistance on these antidisplacement provisions. The Senator from Massachusetts, along with Senators DODD, MIKULSKI and PELL, have shown a great deal of leadership in bringing about consensus.

The National and Community Service Act will provide interesting and meaningful community experience for many Americans. It will give us a good indication of how we can best tap into the public spirit and good will of our people. I salute those individuals who will take up the cause of helping others as a result of this bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Senator GRASSLEY is to be commended for his efforts to include in the substitute language to authorize the use of the vouchers for the start of a small business or a farm. Senator KENNEDY and I appreciate his assistance on this fine amendment and we were happy to include it in the compromise.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to address an amendment of mine which the committee has included in its substitute amendment. This amendment, which I was prepared to offer on the floor today, would have been cosponsored by Senator HATCH. I thank him for his support and I thank the committee for including my language in their substitute amendment.

The bill provides a voucher to full-time and part-time work for young adults in the national service program. The bill as first reported from the committee allowed the vouchers to be used for the purchase of a home and for educational expenses.

My amendment simply expands the allowed uses for the voucher to include the purchase of a farm or small business, as defined by the Small Business Administration, including production of food, fiber, livestock, aquaculture, and other agricultural industries, as well as most other small business concerns up to $500,000.

Mr. President, beginning farmers and entrepreneurs have difficulty obtaining seed capital for starting up businesses. Banks are frequently unwilling or unable to make unguaranteed loans to small businesses with terms and conditions suited to their needs.

Commercial lenders consider new business ventures as poor risks, as they are usually supported only weakly with collateral and equity. Equity for small business startup is generated from personal savings and home equity about two-thirds of the time.

As you know, Mr. President, new farmers and businessmen usually have little home equity or personal savings built up. My amendment would help farmers and small businessmen obtain capital, enabling them to better meet lenders' requirements.

This capital gap is particularly prevalent for new and smaller businesses. Further, startup capital is an even bigger problem for businesses owned by minorities and women. Women typically begin business with about half as much capital as do men. Venture capital, instead, is attracted to larger, established businesses.

The $10,000 that would be available to participants in the full-time national service demonstration project would go a long ways to getting people started in business or farming. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the average business owner begins with less than $15,000. If national service participants combine their resources with other partners, their capital will go even further in starting up the business.

Sufficient capital is not necessary only to obtain financing, it is also significant for ultimate success. According to an article in the Journal of Small Business Management, undercapitalization is a major cause of small business failure.

In recognition of the steady flow of people and income from rural economies, Congress has been working on rural development legislation. Much of the focus of the legislation has been for alternative financing sources.

Such financing, especially for beginning farmers, ranchers, and businessmen, is the one rural credit need admitted by the Task Force of Agricultural Finance.

This voucher, Mr. President, would help young people build the down payment necessary to get that first loan.

The benefits of my amendment would flow not just to the individuals receiving the vouchers. Their communities would reap significant economic and social rewards from investment in businesses and farms. Economically distressed areas of the country face tremendous challenges in attracting business or encouraging the startup of new ones.

Providing financial backing is critical to reinvigorate development in these areas.

Again, Mr. President, I thank the bill sponsors for their cooperation and insight into this matter.

LABOR DISPLACEMENT PROVISIONS

Mr. HATCH. I am a little concerned about the nonduplication and nondisplacement provisions in section 176. While I absolutely agree that we do not want to turn the National and Community Service Act into a public service employment bill—and that includes replacing municipal employees with participants who are stipended under this bill—I do not want to make the provisions in section 176 so strict that we do not allow legitimate volunteer organizations to support causes which may overlap with the duties or work performed by state or municipal employees.

Let me first ask the Senator from Massachusetts about section 176(a)(1). I understand the intent of this paragraph is to avoid duplication of existing programs. I agree with that. We do not necessarily want group A, which is assisted with funds provided under this act, to compete with group B, which has had to raise its funds privately.

However, the term "activity" as it is used in this paragraph is ambiguous, and I hope the sponsor of the bill can shed some light on what is meant here. For example, if the Cache County blood bank operated a bloodmobile 1 day a week, that would be a specific activity. Would this provision prevent assistance under this title from being used to operate the bloodmobile for 2 days a week? Arguably, this is not an additional activity, but rather an expansion of an existing activity. Would this provision prevent assistance provided under this title from being used by an organization to expand an existing activity?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, it would not prevent expansion of an existing activity such as the one described by the Senator from Utah so long as the nondisplacement requirements in subsection (b) are met. It would prohibit funds from going to another organization to operate a bloodmobile program if that organization is not now operating one.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate that explanation. Now, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts about section 176(a)(2) and the related requirements in section 176(b).

Subsection (a)(2) states that assistance under this title may not be given to private, nonprofit entities to conduct activities that are the same or substantially equivalent to activities provided by a State or local government agency that such entity resides in, unless the requirements of subsection (b) are met. I understand that subsection (b)(1) and (b)(2) require that a private nonprofit agency cannot receive funds if State or local government workers are displaced from their jobs or if promotional opportunities are infringed upon. I agree with the thrust of these requirements.

But, who is responsible for making the determination that the requirements are met? Let's say the Sierra Club of Salt Lake City has organized an ongoing project to pick up the litter along Utah's scenic highways. That would normally be a function of employees at the State highway department. Is it the responsibility of the Sierra Club to secure assurances from the Utah Highway Department that no workers will be laid off as a result of their organization's cleanup project? And, what is the Sierra Club's liability if, in fact, the State highway department improperly reduces wages or hours anyway?

Mr. KENNEDY. It is not our intention to subject volunteer organizations to unreasonable burdens of proof or liability for violations that are not deliberate or that are not within the control of the organization.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator. Now, on a related point, paragraph (3) states that no assistance may be provided to a private nonprofit organization if the services it will provide duplicate any services "that would otherwise be performed" by government employees. This appears to mean that the Sierra Club project to pick up litter would be disallowed since the State highway department performs this function. This provision would also eliminate literacy programs if school district employees also teach such programs or youth recreation programs if the city parks or school districts offer such programs. I am sure there are dozens of other overlapping services. Do the bill's sponsors intend a strict interpretation of this provision?

Mr. KENNEDY. The intent of the provision is to discourage State and local governments from viewing the National and Community Service Act as a means to finance the public duties they are already committed and obligated to perform. The National and Community Service Act should not sanction the substitution of unpaid labor, or labor that is stipended at a minimal amount, for regular employees who are entitled to normal wages and benefits.

The standards set forth in section 176(b)(3) are intended to be enforced in a reasonable manner. It is not our intent to discourage the Sierra Club and other volunteer organizations from performing public service functions which do not displace workers.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate that response. I have one final inquiry that also has to do with section 176(a)(2) and (b)(3). Subparagraph (C) lists a set of additional circumstances under which volunteers assisted by the bill may not substitute for employees of State or local governments. I find these are quite reasonable provided we are talking about a long-term substitution. For example, I agree that a volunteer should not be substituted on a long-term or indefinite basis for a worker who has resigned or been discharged. However, I wonder if the Senator from Massachusetts objects to volunteers filling in on temporary basis. For example, if the ambulance dispatcher in Moab, UT, is on sick leave or vacation, would this bill prohibit a community action program receiving assistance under this title from helping out for a time? Clearly, in a case like this, there is no harm to the employee and no intent on the part of the city to make a permanent substitution.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Utah understands the purpose of the provision. Subparagraph (C) is intended to enumerate the conditions under which improper substitutions could not take place. Once again, it is subject to a reasonable interpretation. In the case mentioned by the Senator from Utah, I do not see a problem because, as the Senator stated, the employee would not be disadvantaged nor would this action supplant the hiring of employed workers.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator very much for his answers.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would like to confirm the intention of the Senator from Colorado with respect to part (c) of his amendment. It would provide that nothing on the act shall prohibit a church or other religious entity from requiring that participants not violate the religious tenets of the organization while participating in programs funded by the act. So, for example, a kosher Jewish soup kitchen could bar volunteers from distributing ham sandwiches. But the institution could not require participants in the volunteer program to convert to the religion. Do you agree with this interpretation of your amendment?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes. The Senator is correct. As the Senator knows, this language is taken from S. 5, the A-B-C child care bill. The brief legislative history of the provision in S. 5 shows that a religious institution cannot require a participant to profess to any religious principle or convert to any creed. However, the amendment allows a religious organization to set rules based on its religious precepts and to require participants under this act not to violate those rules. The Senator from Massachusetts cites a dietary rule. I would add that churches can set rules relating to alcohol use, drug use, sexual activity, and other matters that are of deep and abiding concern to religious organizations.

Mr. KENNEDY. I also want to state my own understanding of part (b) of this amendment. The bill, even with the Armstrong amendment, bars the use of Federal funds in programs that give religious instruction, conduct worship services, or engage in any form of proselytization. The amendment simply makes clear that activities conducted by a church or other religious entity—such as displaying religious symbols or decorations; allowing persons voluntarily on their own to engage in prayer or sing religious hymns; or affirming or promoting any moral tenet based on religious precepts—do not endanger the entity's funding under the bill so long as they are conducted separate and apart from the programs funded by the bill, and not as a part of the program itself.

NONDISCRIMINATION

Mr. HATCH. There is one clarification I would like to make in section 174(a) concerning nondiscrimination. All of the listed civil rights statutes, as well as regulations issued under such statutes, apply to activities carried out under this title. Am I correct that the regulations that apply will be those which are in effect at any given point in time? In other words, if the regulations implementing any of these civil rights statutes are changed in the future, programs assisted under the National and Community Service Act must abide by the new regulations, not those which are in effect today or on the day of enactment.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SECOND CLOTURE VOTE ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 212

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I still think "David" won the debate—but it is pretty clear that "Goliath" won the vote.

So—whatever the merits of our position—it is clear after two tries that we do not have the votes to prevail on cloture, at least on the current form and text of Senate Joint Resolution 212.

I will not seek a third cloture vote and so advise the Senator pro tempore, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

I want to say a special word of thanks to those who led the floor effort for the resolution—on both sides of the aisle.

From outside the Senate, I want to take special note of the following people, who have been very helpful.

Congressman PASHAYAN of California has worked very hard trying to find an acceptable compromise, and deserves a lot of credit for moving the administration toward a position acceptable to the Armenian-American community.

California Governor Deukmejian, and two of his close associates, Carl Samuelian and Greg Kahwajian, have also been actively involved in our discussions with the administration, and in urging support for the resolution. I thank them for their efforts from long distance.

Officials from the Armenian assembly—one of the major Armenian-American groups—have also worked with us every step of the way, and have provided great support during this debate. I would mention three in particular: Ross Vartian, Van Krekorian and Rouben Adalian.

I also want to commend those who have been working around the country, those senior Armenians who made the trip today from Philadelphia and Atlantic City. As I said, the eldest in the group is 99, and they have told us a number of incidents, stories that have been brought to the attention of some of our colleagues.

I also want again to commend the distinguished President pro tempore, Senator BYRD. As usual, he was extremely effective in managing his forces and making his case; and, as always, he was a gentleman.

As I indicated several time during the debate—there may be other legislative options open in the future. We will be exploring those.

I remain hopeful that a vote on the amended text I sought to offer, either in concurrent resolution form or as a sense-of-the-Congress amendment, might garner a better vote. I also will want to consult with some of my friends on the House side, to explore the potential for action on an appropriate resolution there.

I hope we fought a good fight. I know it was an important fight. Perhaps it will be a fight that will be fought again.

I still believe it was a question of right or wrong. I believe in this instance, those who supported the motion to proceed were in the right. I will repeat, as I said many times, this was never an effort to offend the Turkish Republic, President Ozal, or the Ambassador to the United States, or anybody else connected with the present Turkish Government. I hope they will understand that has been my position. My position has not changed.

I have been in that country. I know its importance. I know it is a friend and ally. I also believe in this instance we were correct, and we will persevere. Perhaps it will be a fight that will be fought again because I do believe it says something about the institution, something about America, something about human rights, something about commitment to human rights and I hope—in fact, I will say we will not abandon what I believe is a correct course of action because, for the time being, I think it will be futile to proceed any further in an effort to obtain cloture on a motion to proceed.

Again, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his courtesies, for his moving to proceed to the resolution and all others who participated in the debate on either side of the issue.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business, with Senators permitted to speak not to exceed 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IRISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH—A TRIBUTE TO THE SHARED TRADITIONS AND VALUES OF THE UNITED STATES AND IRELAND

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join Senators SIMON, KERRY, MOYNIHAN, KENNEDY, and others in introducing legislation to pay tribute to the contributions that Irish-Americans have made to the United States.

The United States enjoys a long-standing and friendly relationship with Ireland, due in large measure to the strong Irish strands in the fabric of America. Indeed, at the last census count, more than 40,000,000 residents of the United States reported that they were of Irish descent. Irish-Americans have made an indelible mark on the many diverse aspects of American culture, and they have played an important part in our Nation's history.

The legislation we are introducing would designate March 1990 as Irish Heritage Month. It would also reaffirm the special relationship between the United States and Ireland at a time when events in Europe warrant a coherent response by the United States and its Western allies.

Earlier today, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hosted a private meeting with Irish Prime Minister Charles J. Haughey, who is visiting Washington in conjunction with Ireland's ascendancy to the presidency of the European Economic Community. The Economic Community will likely emerge as one of the primary actors in the formulation of a new order in Europe. Ireland, as president of the Economic Community will play an important role in that process. It is thus particularly timely that we in the United States reflect on our deep ties with Ireland and our common bonds with the Irish people.

Mr. President, it is clear that the United States has a real interest in designating March 1990 as Irish-American Heritage Month. Not only would the celebration be a fitting tribute to the contributions that Irish-Americans have made to United States society, but it would also solidify our friendship with a signficant ally in Europe. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this timely and important legislation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. JOHNSTON, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S. 2179. A bill to maintain funding for State and local law enforcement programs in the war against drugs and crime; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FUNDING FOR STATE AND LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT PROGRAMS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce important legislation that will maintain funding for State and local law enforcement programs that are crucial to our efforts in the war against drugs and crime.

Mr. President, our Nation is faced with a terrible crisis. While government studies report a decrease in casual drug use, there are more people using dangerous drugs like cocaine, and its derivative crack, in greater quantities than ever before. The ravaging effects of illegal drug use and drug abuse do not discriminate between young and old, rich or poor, black or white. We, as a nation, are all victims.

There are many tactics that can be used to fight against illegal drug use. I have vigorously supported education and user accountability programs to attack the demand side of the drug problem. We must also make inroads on the wide distribution and availability of illegal drugs, by supporting law enforcement efforts against dealers and distributors.

The frontline in the war on drugs is at the local level. State and local law enforcement personnel put themselves at risk every day as they pursue dealers and distributors.

One source of funding for many of these efforts is the Federal Government. The Department of Justice, through the Bureau of Justice Assistance, distributes block grant funds to support many antidrug abuse programs carried out by State and local law enforcement agencies. States administer the overall programs, distributing the block grant funding to support local law enforcement. Currently, this funding is based on a 75 to 25 cash match. That is, local governments must pay 25 percent of the program costs, while the Federal Government pays the remaining 75 percent.

Beginning with fiscal year 1991, the matching formula will be decreased to 50-50. This means that local governments will have to pay for 50 percent of program costs. Thus, local governments will be required to pay significantly more to maintain even the same level of antidrug programming. The Illinois Criminal Justice Information Authority, as well as many representatives from local law enforcement, tell me that local authorities truly depend on the Federal passthrough aid. While the bulk of program funds are provided by this aid, local units of government are still dedicating significant resources to these efforts. It their share of the financial burden is increased, many communities would be forced to end their participation in the State-administered program. That is exactly what we do not want to have happen, and why I am introducing legislation today to maintain the 75 to 25 matching formula.

The President's 1991 budget provides $490 million for this antidrug abuse block grant. In my own State of Illinois, $18,668,000 would be contributed to the program. The 75 to 25 formula would result in local government payments totaling $6,222,333. If the Federal share of the match is reduced, that total would be $18,668,000, a difference of $12,445,667. The loss of this support would force many communities to end their participation in the program—they would simply be unable to afford these increased costs.

Mr. President, now is not the time to pull the rug from under the feet of our men and women in local law enforcement. My proposal will ensure their continued participation in the Block Grant Program, thereby ensuring the people of Illinois and the rest of the Nation protection from drug dealers and the crime that comes with them. I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

S. 2180. A bill to remove certain prohibitions to the licensing of a vessel for employment in the coastwise trade of the United States for the vessel Arctic Sounder; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS FOR THE VESSEL "ARCTIC SOUNDER"

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would restore coastwise privileges to the U.S.-flag research vessel Arctic Sounder, O.N. 569927.

The Arctic Sounder was built in the United States in 1944 for the U.S. Navy and later served as a research vessel for survey and seismic research work under the ownership and operation of the University of Oregon. The vessel has unique research capabilities including seven laboratories with regulated power, purified water, and atmospheric controls, as well as two moon pools and substantial accommodations for research personnel. The vessel lost its coastwise privileges when purchased by a Canadian company and redocumented under the Canadian flag where it was employed in oil seismic research for several years.

In July 1989, Jim and Beverly Hanson of Seattle purchased the vessel and redocumented it under the U.S.-flag. Last summer and fall the vessel was on charter to Exxon in the biological effects monitoring program conducting research activity to assess the environmental effects of the Exxon Valdez oilspill. The Customs Service ruled that these research activities do not constitute coastwise trade. Nonetheless, the continued employment of the vessel in the Exxon environmental studies will require some oil recovery capability necessitating the incidental coastwise carriage of oil containment booms and recovery personnel. This is necessary in the event residual oil deposits are encountered during research activities. In addition, the incidental movement of occasional related cleanup and scientific equipment will facilitate the efficient and flexible employment of the vessel in its research work.

The legislation I am introducing today would restore to the vessel its coastwise privileges which were lost when the vessel was owned by the Canadian interests.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2180

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding sections 12105, 12106, 12107, and 12108 of title 46, United States Code, and sections 27 and 27A of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920 (46 U.S.C. 883, and 883-1), as applicable on the date of this Act, the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating may issue a certificate of documentation for employment in the coastwise trade of the United States for the vessel Arctic Sounder, United States official number 569927.●

S. 2181. A bill to authorize the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to purchase approximately 8 acres of land at the Fort Sumner Municipal Airport, De Baca County, NM; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

WEATHER BALLOON LAUNCH SITE ACT

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill that would authorize the National Aeronautics and Space Administration [NASA] to purchase approximately 8 acres of land at the Fort Sumner Municipal Airport in De Baca County, NM.

The National Scientific Balloon Facility in Palestine, TX, has been used by NASA as the primary domestic launch facility for a variety of atmospheric studies. Safety considerations associated with the high populations to the east of the launch site required NASA to find alternate locations for approximately one half of their balloon launches.

To find a suitable launch site, NASA completed numerous studies and tests. Each concluded that a site at Fort Sumner, New Mexico met the requirements of the program. In 1987 NASA began use of a site at the Fort Sumner Municipal Airport.

Use of the site confirms that the location meets the needs of the program. However, the lease on the facility NASA has been using expires this spring and they must relocate. There are no other facilities available to lease and, as a result, NASA is willing to build the necessary facilities. It is critical that a new facility be available prior to the fall of 1990 if the research programs are to be maintained. To facilitate these needs, the Village of Fort Sumner has worked with NASA to find a suitable site for the facility. Congress must authorize acquisition of the land before NASA can proceed.

If the site is acquired, NASA plans to develop the site over a 2- or three-year period. The initial phase would include acquisition of the land and construction of a building which would be completed prior to the fall of 1990. Completion of the initial phase will allow for balloon launches to continue this fall.

Mr. President, this legislation simply allows NASA to acquire the lands required to continue their atmospheric research studies at the Fort Sumner Municipal Airport. Funds for land acquisition and building construction would come from funds already appropriated in the fiscal year 1990. I stress that no additional appropriations for this project are required.

Senator DOMENICI has cosponsored this legislation and similar legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman STEVE SCHIFF.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2181

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Weather Balloon Launch Site Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. PURCHASE OF LAND FOR BALLOON LAUNCHING FACILITY.

The Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration may purchase, with funds appropriated to the Administrator for fiscal year 1990 under the heading "Construction of facilities", approximately 8 acres within Section 16, Township 3 North, Range 26 East, N.M.P.M., De Baca County, New Mexico, to use as a balloon launching facility.●

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague from New Mexico, Senator BINGAMAN, in introducing the NASA Weather Balloon Launch Site Act. This bill would authorize NASA to purchase 8 acres of land near the municipal airport in Fort Sumner, NM. This land transfer is necessary for NASA to continue its data collection on such critical issues as global warming and ozone depletion. Without this legislation, NASA's research is going to be homeless.

NASA has been launching balloons at Fort Sumner since 1987. Carrying payloads of approximately 6,000 pounds, these balloons provide a relatively inexpensive means to collect atmospheric data. Presently, NASA averages 50 launches per year from Fort Sumner. As it becomes more important to study the atmosphere and to determine the critical parameters associated with global warming, we must look to all possible means to study this complex scientific problem. The scientific balloon launches from Fort Sumner provides important data for the study of climate change.

NASA's project is currently housed in a hanger at the municipal airport in Fort Sumner. The village of Fort Sumner however, has developed plans to utilize this facility for industrial development, and as a consequence, NASA must move their operation to this new site.

Ownership of this land would give NASA a permanent site upon which it can construct buildings and expand their operations. In addition, there are plans to construct a downrange tracking station for similar operations conducted from the National Scientific Balloon Facility at Palestine, TX.

The purchase of this land by NASA will perpetuate a cooperative effort between NASA and academia. New Mexico State University manages and operates the Palestine, TX facility. As a result, graduate students are intimately involved in day-to-day experimental work.

This legislation will not increase Federal expenses, as the funds for this transaction as well as the initial phase of building construction have already been appropriated in the fiscal year 1990 budget.

I am pleased to cosponsor this legislation and look to its enactment. I ask unanimous consent that a letter written by the mayor of Fort Sumner be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VILLAGE OF FORT SUMNER INC.
Fort Sumner, NM, January 9, 1990.
Hon. PETE DOMENICI,
Dirksen Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: On January 8, 1990, representatives of NASA and the National Scientific Balloon Facility of Palestine, Texas met with the Village Council of Fort Sumner, New Mexico.

NASA representatives expressed a desire to build a building on the Fort Sumner Airport Facility. The intent of NASA is to establish this facility and location as their permanent western site for launch of scientific balloons as well as a down range tracking station for balloons launched from the Palestine, Texas facility. They intend (if anticipated revenues continue) to update the initial building over a period of 2 to 3 years.

Their desire is to own the property on which they build. Village officials agreed to sell the proposed site and a price has been agreed upon. The situation requires that all the paperwork be completed in time to construct the facility for early fall of 1990 balloon launchings.

Their acquisition of lands requires an Act of Congress. It is our mutual desire that this be possible. The level of presence of NASA in the community, region and state should be enhanced by their commitment to this site and this program. Our hope is that our congressional delegation might be helpful in expediting the land acquisition process.

We are presently working out the details of land description as well as a Memorandum of Operation. This phase should be complete within 10 days or so and the finality would await consent of Congress.

We will assist with necessary information, etc., as you require.

Sincerely,

DAVID BAILEY, Mayor.●

S. 2182. A bill to increase the amounts authorized to be appropriated for the Colorado River storage project, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CENTRAL UTAH PROJECT COMPLETION ACT

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to complete the Colorado River storage project [CRSP] and the central Utah water project [CUP]. The bill is crucial to the economic well being of the people of Utah.

Utah is the second driest State in the Union. The CUP was authorized as a major component of the CRSP. Originally, the project was divided into several units: The Vernal unit, the Jensen unit, the Upalco unit, the Ute Indian unit, and the largest unit of all, the Bonneville unit. Construction began on the municipal and industrial [M and I] features of the Bonneville unit in 1965 after elections were held committing those M and I water users to repay to the Government, the cost of that water.

The Bureau of Reclamation completed the Vernal, Jensen, and Uintah irrigation project, but has trudged along with the Bonneville unit. In 1986, Bonneville unit M and I users in 12 counties vote—by a 73 percent plurality—to raise the amount they would repay to the Government from approximately $150 million—1965 amount—to over $550 million to complete the project. Delays due to low requests by various administrations, low funding by the Congress, and especially poor management by the Bureau of Reclamation have been terribly frustrating to the people of Utah.

The Bonneville unit was originally authorized for approximately $800 million in 1956. It was reauthorized for $2.1 million in 1972. It is under this authorization ceiling that the M and I provisions of the Bonneville unit will be completed in the next 5 years. The main feature, the Jordanelle Dam will provide 320,000 acre feet of storage capacity, or enough water to provide 400,000 Utahns with culinary drinking water.

Mr. President, the bill Senator HATCH and I are introducing today is designed primarily to raise that authorization ceiling so that central Utah farmers will receive their irrigation water. This was a promise the Government made to rural areas of Utah in tandem with the promise to provide M and I water to the urban areas. We propose raising the ceiling by a total of $550 million to accomplish this and the unfinished environmental mitigation features of the project.

To assure better productivity at lower costs we are proposing that a separate commission be created—apart from the Bureau of Reclamation—to assure environmental compliance and importantly, we propose to have the Central Utah Water Conservancy District build the remaining irrigation features in the Uintah Basin and the central Utah areas.

Finally, Mr. President, this is a consensus bill between several members of the Utah delegation. It has a strong environmental section, a strong Indian section, and fulfills the Government's age-old commitment to construct the irrigation features of the project. I hope the Congress will act expeditiously on the bill and give it fair consideration.●

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. CHAFEE, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 2183. A bill to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources, to authorize the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Civil Works Program to construct various projects for improvements to the Nation's infrastructure, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the bill I introduce today, with the support of our distinguished chairman, Senator BURDICK, ranking minority member, Senator CHAFEE, and Senator SYMMS, the Water Resources Development Act of 1990, continues the practice of biannual authorizations for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. We returned to this practice with the passage of Public Law 99-662, the Water Resources Development Act of 1986.

There had been a 10-year wait for this legislation. The 1986 bill established our current requirements for water projects which center on cost sharing, user fees, and environmental protection.

The next step in this process was the Water Resources Development Act of 1988. This legislation was signed into law on November 17, 1988.

As in 1988, we intend to proceed with deliberation this year. We plan to maintain the system of authorizations that have been successful in 1986 and 1988. With this in mind, and in keeping with the goal of a biannual authorization, I am pleased to introduce a 1990 water bill.

Mr. President, the legislation I offer today along with Senators BURDICK, SYMMS, and CHAFEE, represents a consensus of our committee's needs, as evident from the bipartisan support it has received. The bill authorizes 18 Corps of Engineers projects, all of which have completed the corps planning process. Projects for navigation improvements, recreation, storm damage reduction, and flood protection are included in the bill. They all have a positive benefit to cost ratio. All have complete and favorable environmental impact statements.

In addition to these project authorizations, the legislation contains seven project related provisions and eight general provisions to provide additional management guidance to the Corps of Engineers. I believe them to be noncontroversial and important for the continued operating effectiveness of the corps.

Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Water Resources, Transportation, and Infrastructure will hold a hearing on this bill on March 1. It is my intention to have this bill reported to the Senate by the Environment and Public Works Committee with dispatch. And I hope we will soon see it favorably considered by the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2183

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Water Resources Development Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. For purposes of this Act, the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Army.

TITLE I—PROJECT AUTHORIZATIONS

SEC. 101. The following projects for water resources development and conservation and other purposes are authorized to be carried out by the Secretary substantially in accordance with the plans, and subject to the conditions, recommended in the respective reports designated in this section:

(1) Bayou La Batre, Alabama. The project for navigation for Bayou La Batre, Alabama: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated August 3, 1989, at a total cost of $16,230,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $4,490,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $11,740,000.

(2) Clifton, San Francisco River, Arizona. The project for flood control, Clifton, San Francisco River, Arizona, authorized by section 401(d) of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986, is modified to authorize the Secretary to construct the project substantially in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers, dated September 6, 1988, at a total cost of $12,510,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $9,150,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $3,360,000.

(3) Nogales Wash and Tributaries, Arizona. The project for flood control, Nogales Wash and Tributaries, Arizona: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated February 28, 1989, at a total cost of $7,260,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $5,440,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $1,820,000. The Secretary shall cooperate with the Government of Mexico as necessary to provide for flood warning gauges in Mexico.

(4) Coyote and Berryessa Creeks, California. The project for flood control, Coyote and Berryessa Creeks, California: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated February 7, 1989, at a total cost of $56,300,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $39,000,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $17,300,000.

(5) Miami Harbor Channel, Florida. The project for navigation, Miami Harbor Channel, Florida: Report of the Chief of Engineers dated September 25, 1989, at a total cost of $65,700,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $41,920,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $23,780,000.

(6) Martin County, Florida. The project for storm damage reduction, Martin County, Florida: Report of the Chief of Engineers dated November 20, 1989, at a total first cost of $9,400,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $3,850,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $5,550,000. In addition, periodic nourishment costs are estimated at $5,220,000, with an estimated Federal cost of $2,140,000, and an estimated non-Federal cost of $3,080,000.

(7) Fort Wayne, St. Mary's and Maumee Rivers, Indiana. The project for flood control, Fort Wayne, St. Mary's and Maumee Rivers, Indiana: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated May 1, 1989, at a total cost of $16,300,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $12,100,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $4,200,000.

(8) Boston Harbor, Massachusetts. The project for navigation, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated May 11, 1989, at a total cost of $17,960,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $8,250,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $9,710,000.

(9) Ecorse Creek, Wayne County, Michigan. The project for flood control, Ecorse Creek, Wayne County, Michigan: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated August 8, 1989, at a total cost of $7,280,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $4,560,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $2,720,000.

(10) Coldwater Creek, Missouri. The project for flood control, Coldwater Creek, Missouri: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated August 9, 1988, at a total cost of $22,380,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $15,500,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $6,880,000.

(11) River Des Peres, Missouri. The project for flood control, River Des Peres, Missouri: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated May 23, 1989, at a total cost of $20,550,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $15,270,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $5,280,000.

(12) Passaic River Main Stem, New Jersey and New York. The project for flood control, Passaic River Main Stem, New Jersey and New York: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated February 3, 1989, at a total cost of $913,500,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $674,600,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $238,900,000.

(13) Rio De La Plata, Puerto Rico. The project for flood control, Rio De La Plata, Puerto Rico: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated January 3, 1989, at a total cost of $56,990,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $34,780,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $22,210,000.

(14) Myrtle Beach, South Carolina. The project for storm damage reduction, Myrtle Beach, South Carolina: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated March 2, 1989, at a total cost of $59,730,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $38,820,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $20,910,000. In addition, periodic nourishment costs are estimated at $13,500,000, with an estimated Federal cost of $8,780,000, and an estimated non-Federal cost of $4,720,000.

(15) Mill Creek, Nashville, Tennessee. The project for flood control, Mill Creek, Nashville, Tennessee: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated April 21, 1986, at a total cost of $14,500,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $7,250,000 and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $7,250,000.

(16) Buffalo Bayou and Tributaries, Texas. The project for flood control, Buffalo Bayou and Tributaries, Texas: Report of the Chief of Engineers dated February 12, 1990, at a total cost of $544,604,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $309,313,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $235,291,000.

(17) Ray Roberts Lake, Greenbelt, Texas. The multiple purpose project, Ray Roberts Lake, Greenbelt, Texas, authorized by section 301 of the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1965, is modified to authorize the Secretary to construct recreation features substantially in accordance with the Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated December 24, 1987, at a total cost of $4,620,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $1,730,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $2,890,000.

(18) Upper Jordan River, Utah. The project for flood control, Upper Jordan River, Utah: Report of the Chief of Engineers, dated November 16, 1988, at a total cost of $7,900,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $5,200,000, and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $2,700,000.

TITLE II—PROJECT RELATED PROVISIONS

SEC. 201. (a) The Congress finds that the historic community of Belen, New Mexico, and its population suffer chronic flooding problems that originate in the watershed and mesas west of Belen.

(b) The Congress finds further that a major canal, the Belen Highline Canal, is located immediately adjacent to Belen, New Mexico, and that a serious danger exists to life and property in the event that flood waters breach the canal.

(c) The Congress, therefore, authorizes a project for flood protection for the city of Belen, New Mexico. Such project shall include measures to increase the capacity of the Belen Highline Canal so that it will function as a conveyance system to divert flood waters safely around the city of Belen, as well as irrigation facility.

(d) Subject to the provisions of section 903(c) of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662), the Secretary is directed to undertake the flood control measures described within subsection (c) of this section in order to protect the city of Belen, New Mexico, and its residents, at a total cost of $19,576,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $12,130,000, and and estimated first non-Federal cost of $7,446,000 including lands, easements, rights-of-way, and relocations.

SEC. 202. Section 1114 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (100 Stat. 4232-4235) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1114. CROSS FLORIDA BARGE CANAL.

"(a) The barge canal project located between the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean is not authorized for the purposes described in the Act of July 23, 1942 (56 Stat. 703) after the date of enactment of this Act.

"(b) Notwithstanding section 203 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 and any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Army is directed to transfer all lands and interests in lands acquired by the Secretary and facilities completed for the project described in subsection (a) to the State of Florida without consideration, except as provided in subsection (c) if the State agrees to hold the United States harmless from all claims arising from or through the operations of the lands and facilities conveyed by the United States.

"(c) Actual transfer of the lands and management responsibilities shall not occur on the constructed portions of the barge canal project lying between the Atlantic Ocean and the Eureka Lock and Dam, inclusive, and between the Gulf of Mexico and the Inglis Lock and Dam, inclusive, until 24 months following the date of enactment of this Act.

"(d) In the intervening 24 months following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Army shall carry out any and all programmed maintenance on the areas outlined in subsection (c).

"(e) The exact acreage and legal description of the real property to be transferred pursuant to subsection (b) shall be determined by a survey which is satisfactory to the Secretary and the State of Florida. The cost of such survey shall be borne by the State of Florida.

"(f) All lands and interests in land acquired for the barge canal project lying between the Atlantic Ocean and the western boundaries of Sections 20 and 29, Township 15 South, Range 23 East, shall be used by the State of Florida for public parks, conservation or recreational uses only.

"(g) With respect to the remaining lands and interests in land acquired for the barge canal project, lying west of Sections 20 and 29, Township 15 South, Range 23 East, the State shall preserve, enhance, interpret, and manage the water and related land resources of the area containing unique cultural, fish and wildlife, scenic, and recreational values, as determined by the State, for the benefit and enjoyment of present and future generations and the development of outdoor recreation.

"(h) The State of Florida shall pay to the counties of Citrus, Clay, Duval, Levy, Marion, and Putnam a minimum aggregate sum of $32,000,000 in cash or, at the option of the counties, payment to be made by conveyance of surplus lands selected by the State at current appraised values.".

SEC. 203. (a) Subject to the provisions of sections 906(e) and 1135 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) the Secretary, in consultation with the Pyramid Lake Indian Tribe and the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized and directed to develop a plan for a project with a total cost of $25,000,000 to rehabilitate the Lower Truckee River.

(b) The plan of the project authorized in subsection (a) shall include designs to—

(1) restore the riparian habitat and vegetative cover;

(2) stabilize the course of the lower Truckee River and minimize erosion damage;

(3) provide the best possible spawning habitat for the cui-ui fish; and

(4) provide improved spawning habitat for the Lahontan cutthroat trout to the extent deemed feasible.

(c) Subject to the provisions of sections 906(e) and 1135 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662), the Secretary, in consultation with the Pyramid Lake Indian Tribe and the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to develop a plan for facilities with a total cost of $20,000,000 to enable the efficient passage of cui-ui and Lahontan cutthroat trout through or around the delta at the mouth of the Lower Truckee River to obtain access to their upstream spawning grounds.

SEC. 204. Section 1149 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) is amended by adding the following sentence at the end of the section: "On or before June 1, 1991, the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary shall make a recommendation to Congress on the method of payment to be employed for cost sharing purposes, and the identification of eligible project sponsors pursuant to section 101 of this Act.".

SEC. 205. The Secretary of the Army shall not proceed with the divestiture of locks and dams numbered 5 through 14 of the Kentucky River, Kentucky, pursuant to section 301(a) of the Water Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) until he has complied with the terms of the Memorandum of Understanding between the United States Army Corps of Engineers and the Commonwealth of Kentucky, as approved by the Louisville District Engineer on February 22, 1985, at a total cost of $3,500,000.

SEC. 206. (a) The Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Governor of the State of New York, acting jointly, shall convene a management conference for the restoration, conservation, and management of Onondaga Lake. The purpose of the management conference shall include but not be limited to—

(1) developing, within the 180-day period following the date of the enactment of this Act, a comprehensive restoration, conservation, and management plan that recommends priority corrective actions and compliance schedules for the cleanup of Onondaga Lake; and

(2) coordinating implementation of the plan by the State of New York, the Army Corps of Engineers, the Environmental Protection Agency and all local agencies, governments, and other groups participating in the conference.

(b)(1) The members of the management conference shall include, at a minimum, the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Governor of the State of New York, and a representative of—

(A) the Attorney General of the State of New York;

(B) Onondaga County, New York;

(C) The City of Syracuse, New York;

(2) The members of the management conference may designate a permanent representative to attend meetings of the management conference and otherwise represent and vote on their behalf on the management conference.

(3) The management conference shall include the following ex officio members:

(A) the United States Senators from the State of New York; and

(B) the member(s) of the United States House of Representatives within whose congressional district(s) lies Onondaga Lake.

(4) There shall be two standing committees of the management conference:

(A) the Citizens, Advisory Committee; and

(B) the Technical Review Committee.

(c)(1) Not later than 120 days after the completion of a plan and after providing for public review and comment, the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works and the Administrator shall approve such plan if the plan meets the requirements of this section, and the Governor of the State of New York concurs in such approval.

(2) Upon approval of the plan under this section, such plan shall be implemented.

(d)(1) The management conference, with the approval of the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Governor of the State of New York, is authorized to make grants to the State of New York and public or nonprofit private agencies, institutions, organizations, and individuals.

(2) Grants under this subsection may be made for—

(A) research, surveys, and studies necessary for the development of the plan under this section, except that grants to any person under this paragraph shall not exceed 70 percent of the costs of such work and that the non-Federal share of such costs are provided from non-Federal sources;

(B) conducting activities identified in the plan developed pursuant to this section, except that grants to any person under this paragraph shall not exceed 70 percent of the costs of such work and that the non-Federal share of such costs are provided from non-Federal sources; and

(C) gathering data and retaining expert consultants in support of litigation undertaken by the State of New York to compel clean up or obtain clean up and damage cost from parties responsible for the pollution of Onondaga Lake.

(3) In-kind payments shall qualify for the purpose of meeting the non-Federal matching requirements of this subsection.

(e) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency such sums as may be necessary to carry out this section.

SEC. 207. (a) The Secretary, in conjunction with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, is authorized and directed to conduct a reconnaissance study for the purpose of providing plans for the design and construction of a wastewater treatment project in Cranston, Rhode Island. The scope of such study shall include, but is not limited to, a review of the wastewater treatment needs of the City of Cranston focusing on the prevention of groundwater contamination and an investigation of innovative and alternative technology to demonstrate the feasibility of transporting leachate from a sanitary landfill and wastewater from a new waste-to-energy solid waste facility to the City's existing sewage treatment plant.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary such sums as necessary to carry out this section.

TITLE III—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 301. The "Federal interest" in water resource development projects of the civil works program of the Army Corps of Engineers shall be determined only through the application of:

(1) benefit/cost analysis; and

(2) an Environmental Impact Statement or Assessment, whichever is appropriate.

SEC. 302. (a) Any changes in eligibility criteria for a water resource development project of the civil works program of the Army Corps of Engineers proposed in rule or regulation shall be submitted, for informational purposes, to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives at least one year prior to its issuance.

(b) Any change in eligibility criteria for a water resource development project of the civil works program of the Army Corps of Engineers proposed by the Secretary in rule or regulation shall not be considered in the evaluation of any water resource development project, or separable element thereof, for which the reconnaissance study has been initiated prior to the issuance of such rule or regulation.

SEC. 303. Not later than December 31, 1991, and every two years thereafter, the Secretary is directed to provide the Congress with a management report on the conduct of the civil works program in each of the Corps of Engineers Districts and Divisions.

SEC. 304. Section 105 (b) of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "This subsection shall not apply to planning and engineering of projects for which the non-Federal interests contributed fifty percent of the cost of the feasibility study.".

SEC. 305. Section 402 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence at the end of the section: "The recommended level of protection for a Corps of Engineers flood control project shall be that level of protection which maximizes national economic development benefits or the 100-year level of protection if the benefits of providing the 100-year level of protection exceeds its cost, whichever provides the greater level of protection.".

SEC. 306. Section 101 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 (Public Law 99-662) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) MILITARY BENEFITS.—The Secretary shall reduce proportionally the percentage share of navigation project costs required of the non-Federal sponsor of such project equivalent to the percentage of direct benefits of the navigation improvements which are credited to agencies of the Armed Forces of the United States.".

SEC. 307. Section 33 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1988 is amended by inserting "acquisition of real property and associated improvements (from willing sellers), and monetary compensation to affected landowners" after "including maintenance and rehabilitation of existing structures,".

SEC. 308. (a) In developing water control plans which propose to change the operation of Federal water projects from the operations established in the existing water control manuals in accordance with existing congressional project authorizations, the Secretary shall—

(1) solicit comments from the appropriate Federal, State, local, and regional agencies in States affected by such change, and from interested persons who are or could be impacted by project regulation. Copies of such comments shall be made a part of the comprehensive statement required by subsection (b), shall be made available to the public as provided by section 552 of title 5, United States Code, and shall accompany the proposal through the existing agency review process; and

(2) prepare a comprehensive statement prior to implementation of the plan which sets forth—

(A) the Corps' authority to make such a change pursuant to the project's congressional authorization;

(B) all reasonable alternatives to the proposed change;

(C) any changes in the originally authorized project purposes caused by the proposed change, or any of the alternatives available to accomplish the intended result; and

(D) the costs and direct benefits of the proposed change in comparison to the cost-benefit analysis upon which Congress authorized the project, and the effect of the proposed change on the project repayment schedule, including an identification of the source of revenue for any new repayment schedule.

(b)(1) Upon completion of the comprehensive statement, the Secretary shall issue a finding.

(2) If the Secretary finds that the proposed change will—

(A) significantly affect the originally authorized purposes of the project;

(B) alter the initial cost-benefit ratio upon which the project was authorized so as to alter the feasibility of the project; or

(C) alter the repayment of project costs such that the United States Treasury's ability to recover the costs of building, operating, and maintaining the project are impeded or threatened, the Secretary shall submit his comprehensive statement to the Congress, together with recommended legislation for a change in the authorized purposes of the project.

(3) If the Secretary finds that the proposed change—

(A) is in accordance with the project's congressional authorization;

(B) is in the public interest;

(C) will result in greater direct economic benefits to the public;

(D) provides an equal to or better cost-benefit ratio than was submitted when the project was authorized; and

(E) will enable the United States' Treasury to recover the costs of building, operating, and maintaining the project in the same timeframe as initially authorized, the Secretary shall send the comprehensive statement to the Congress and implement the proposed change.

(c) The Secretary shall review existing water control plans, administrative regulations, and current policies and procedures for the purpose of determining whether there are any deficiencies or inconsistencies therein which prohibit full compliance with the purposes and provisions of this Act, and shall propose to the President, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, such measures as may be necessary to bring its authority and policies into conformity with the intent, purposes, and procedures set forth in this Act.

(d) Nothing in this Act shall permit the Secretary to make changes in project operations which extend beyond each project's specific congressional authorization.

(e) Nothing in this Act forbids any person to bring suit under any other statute challenging a change in project operations.

SEC. 309. (a) The Secretary of the Army is authorized to develop a pilot program to design and construct a high-speed magnetic levitation system to be integrated with the interstate highway rights-of-way and other appropriate rights-of-way.

(b) To carry out subsection (a), the Secretary of the Army is authorized to expend funds appropriated by Public Law 101-101 for such purpose and any funds made available to the Army by any law enacted after the date of enactment of such public law for such purpose.

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY ON THE WATER RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1990

Section 1: Short Title and Table of Contents.

Section 2: Defines the term "Secretary" for the purposes of the act as the Secretary of the Army.

TITLE ONE—PROJECT AUTHORIZATIONS

Section 101: Authorizes the Secretary to construct seventeen water resource development projects in accord with plans approved by the Chief of Engineers. All of these projects have completed the entire Corps of Engineers planning process; have been found to be economically and environmentally sound, and engineeringly feasible by the Chief of Engineers. Three of these projects are for the purpose of providing navigation improvements, one project is for the purpose of recreation, two projects are for the purpose of storm damage reduction, and eleven projects would provide flood protection. The total cost of these seventeen projects is $1,595,200,000, with an estimated first Federal cost of $1,137,200,000 and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $458,000,000. All projects are to be constructed in compliance with the cost sharing provisions of the 1986 Water Resource Development Act. The following is a summary of these projects.

[In millions of dollars]

Project and State	Total cost	Estimated Federal cost	Estimated local cost
Bayou La Batre, Alabama	$16.2	$4.5	$11.7
Clifton, Arizona	12.5	9.1	3.4
Nagles Wash, Arizona	7.3	5.4	1.8
Coyote Creek, California	56.3	39.0	17.3
Miami Harbor, Florida	65.7	41.9	23.8
Martin County, Florida	9.0	3.8	5.6
Fort Wayne, Indiana	16.3	12.1	4.2
Boston Harbor, Massachusetts	17.9	8.2	9.7
Ecorse Creek, Michigan	7.3	4.6	2.7
Coldwater Creek, Missouri	22.4	15.5	6.9
River Des Peres, Missouri	20.6	15.3	5.3
Passaic River, New Jersey	914.0	675.0	239.0
Rio De La Plata, Puerto Rico	57.0	34.8	22.2
Myrtle Beach, S. Carolina	59.7	38.8	20.9
Mill Creek, Tennessee	14.5	7.3	7.2

Upper Jordan River, Utah	7.9	5.2	2.7

TITLE TWO—PROJECT RELATED PROVISIONS

Section 201: Belen, New Mexico. This project has been reviewed by the Corps of Engineers and is authorized subject to the cost sharing requirements of section 903 (c) of the 1986 Water Resource Development Act.

Section 202: Cross Florida Barge Canal. This section modifies section 1154 of the 1986 Water Resources Development Act to provide for the deauthorization of the Federal Barge Canal project and the transfer of all project related lands and facilities associated with the project to the State of Florida. Such transfer would occur two years after the date of enactment of this legislation subject to a survey of project related lands satisfactory to the Secretary of the Army and paid for by the State of Florida.

Section 203: Sections 906 (e) and 1135 of the 1986 Water Resources Development Act authorized the Secretary to review existing facilities to determine if modifications could be made which would enhance environmental quality. In the early 1960's the Corps of Engineers constructed a flood control project in Truckee Meadows. At the present time this project interferes with the natural spawning cycle of two endangered species of fish and contributes to the degradation of Pyramid Lake, one of the most unique biological environments in North America. This provision authorizes the Secretary to plan and install such facilities as are found necessary to remedy these environmental deficiencies. The total cost of the facilities authorized in this section is $45,000,000.

Section 204: This section modifies Section 1149 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1986 to provide that if the Secretary of the Army and the Chief of Engineers fail to make a determination on how a direct beneficiary of the Lock Replacement at Sault Ste. Marie can provide to the Federal Government the required cost sharing on this project, that the project shall become eligible for full federal funding.

Section 205: This section directs the Secretary not to proceed with divestiture of Locks and dams numbered 5 through 14 of the Kentucky River until such time as the Corps of Engineers complies with a memorandum of understanding on the divestiture approved by the State of Kentucky and the Louisville District Engineer on February 22, 1985.

Section 206: This section establishes a management conference for the restoration, conservation, and management of Onondaga Lake. The Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works is a member of the conference.

Section 207: This section authorizes the Secretary in conjuncture with the Administrator of the EPA to conduct a reconnaissance study for the purpose of providing plans for the design of a wastewater treatment project in Cranston, Rhode Island.

TITLE THREE—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 301: Provides that the "federal interest" in water resource projects is to be determined only through an evaluation of a prospective projects economics and environmental impacts.

Section 302: Requires that administrative changes to the eligibility criteria for water projects be submitted to the relevant Committees of Congress for oversite review at least a year prior to their implementation; and further provides that any changes made in the eligibility criteria for water projects shall not apply retroactively to projects which have been under study prior to the implementation of new criteria.

Section 303: Requires the Secretary to provide the Congress with a report on the management of the civil works program in each district and division of the Corps of Engineers. It is expected that such report will include an evaluation of the execution of the civil works missions of the Corps of Engineers, an evaluation of resource management in the execution of civil works missions, an assessment of the District and Division Commander's performance as a civil works manager, an assessement of the strengths and weaknesses of the civil works program in each district and division, and recommendations for the improvement of the management of the civil works program specific to each district and division.

Section 304: Amends Section 105(b) of the 1986 Water Resources Act of clarify original congressional intent. In the 1986 Act a number of projects were authorized only for preconstruction planning, engineering, and design, when they had not had any work associated with the feasibility study phase of planning. "Preconstruction planning, engineering, and design" are normally activities done with construction funds and not part of the feasibility process. At the time, it was the intent of the Committee to have the sponsors of these projects authorized only for this "preconstruction planning, engineering, and design" contribute half of the cost of such work, similar to the cost sharing which was imposed on the sponsors of feasibility studies. It was not the intent of the Committee to require a fifty percent cost share for "preconstruction planning, engineering and design" of projects which follow the normal authorization and planning process. The sponsors of these projects contribute half the cost of the feasibility study and whatever the appropriate cost share is for the construction of the project.

Section 305: Provides that the recommended level of protection for a Corps flood control or storm damage prevention project is to be at least the 100 year level of protection, provided that such protection can be provided economically. There is at present an inconsistency between the governing policy of the Federal Emergency Management Agency which looks to the 100 year level of protection as a national "standard" and the Corps of Engineer policy to provide this level of protection only if such protection "maximizes" economic benefits. This provision would require the Corps to recommend the 100 year level of protection provided that it was economic to do so, but removing the requirement that the economic benefits be "maximized".

Section 306: Amends section 101 of the 1986 Water Resource Development Act to reduce the local cost sharing required for a navigation project to the extent that the benefits of such project accrue to the armed services of the nation. A version of this provision was approved by the conferees on the 1986 Water Resource Development Act and inadvertently omitted from the final legislation.

Section 307: Amends Section 33 of the 1988 Water Resource Development Act to permit the acquisition of real property and associated improvements and monetary compensation to affected landowners whose property has been eroded on the Missouri River due to the operation of the reservoirs on the river by the Army Corps of Engineers.

Section 308: Establishes a procedure for Secretarial review of operational changes made at Corps of Engineer projects.

Section 309: This section directs the Secretary of the Army to develop a pilot program to design and construct a high-speed magnetic levitation system to be integrated with the interstate highway right-of-way and other appropriate rights-of-way.●

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues on the Environment and Public Works Committee to introduce the 1990 Water Resources Development Act.

When Congress passed the historic 1986 Water Resources Development Act, the Committee on Environment and Public Works made a commitment to work for regular biennial water resources authorizing legislation. Today we continue to fulfill that pledge.

This legislation is fully consistent with the cost-sharing and user-fee reforms of the 1986 Water Resources Act and authorizes only new projects which have completed planning by the Corps of Engineers, are economically sound, and have no known environmental issues.

This legislation also addresses in a limited way a number of management related issues which have been brought to the committee's attention. I believe that since 1986 the Corps of Engineers has made remarkable progress toward refocusing its mission on environmental engineering. However, I am concerned about other administrative practices of the corps; in particular the use of "discretionary authority", negotiation practices with local sponsors, and Army imposed changes to the technical economic criteria used to evaluate projects which are not subject to public review and comment.

I hope to address these issues in the future.●

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues on the Environment and Public Works Committee to introduce the Water Resources Development Act of 1990. The 1986 Water Resources Act ended a 17-year dry spell in which Congress was unable to pass authorizing legislation for the Army Corps of Engineers, and the bill we are introducing today represents our commitment to renewing the regular 2-year authorization cycle for corps projects.

In 1986, Congress finally resolved the thorny issues of cost sharing and user fees that had prevented passage of a water resources bill since 1970. The bill we introduce today continues our commitment to those fundamental principles.

It is a straightforward authorization of 18 water projects around the country with an estimated total cost of $1.852 billion and an estimated Federal share of $1.232 billion. There are 11 flood control projects, 3 projects to provide navigation improvements, 2 for storm damage reduction, and 1 for recreation. Details remain to be worked out between the Corps of Engineers and sponsors with respect to several of these projects, but I hope and expect a satisfactory solution can be reached during the course of committee deliberations on the bill.

There are very important provisions in titles II and III, some of which may elicit concern from the corps. I look forward to hearing administration comments on those provisions and will do everything possible to work out an agreement on legislation the President can sign this year.●

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join with my colleagues on the Committee on Environment and Public Works in introducing the Water Resources Development Act of 1990. Introduction of this bill represents a continuation of the commitment to report authorizing legislation for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers civil works program every 2 years.

As you know, Mr. President, the 1970's and early 1980's saw a departure from the previous practice of approving omnibus bills and predictable appropriations to fund the construction of water projects. In 1986, however, we broke the logjam. After years of legislative-executive policy confrontations over the role of the Federal Government in water policy, the 99th Congress approved the Water Resources Development Act of 1986.

The 1986 act was truly landmark legislation in the area of water policy and formed the basis of the Water Resources Development Act of 1988 and the bill we are introducing today. Most importantly, the 1986 act contains a number of provisions for increased local cost sharing for beneficiaries of Army Corps projects. I support those provisions wholeheartedly. The intent of cost sharing, I might add, is not to prevent the construction of a particular project but rather to recognize our limited Federal resources and the financial responsibility of local project sponsors.

The bill we are introducing today is straightforward. Title I authorizes 18 water resources projects from across the country at a cost of $1.8 billion, with an estimated first Federal cost of $1.2 billion and an estimated first non-Federal cost of $600 million. Twelve projects would provide flood control, three entail navigation improvements, two provide for storm damage reduction and one for the purpose of recreation. All of the projects have completed the corps planning process. Furthermore, the Chief of Engineers has determined that the projects are both economically and environmentally sound.

Title II contains seven project related provisions, with title III dealing with policy changes to the 1986 and 1988 Water Resources Development Acts. Let me say here at the outset, however, that I do have concerns with a number of provisions in title III that, in my view, inhibit the ability of the Army Corps to effectively manage operations at water project sites. It is imperative that the corps have the flexibility to manage and respond to a changing water environment.

The goal of this legislation is to authorize a steady flow of sound projects for the Army Corps of Engineers. As my former colleague Senator Stafford said in 1988, if the water bill "becomes a magnet for * * * ill conceived policy initiatives, the experiment will have been a failure and we will have learned something about Congress' ability to successfully regularize the Corps of Engineers authorizing process." The key is to remain faithful to the provisions of the 1986 act.

The Committee on Environment and Public Works has scheduled a hearing on this legislation for March 1. I look forward to the testimony of Mr. Robert Page, Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works and Maj. Gen. Patrick J. Kelley, Director of Civil Works for the Army Corps of Engineers, especially with regard to title III of the bill.

Mr. President, I intend to work closely with my colleagues on the committee to report an economically sound and environmentally sensitive piece of legislation.●

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I commend the leadership of the Committee on Environment and Public Works for moving ahead with this important legislation. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a provision in this bill that would authorize construction of a major flood control project along the Passaic River Basin in New Jersey.

This project is sorely needed. Every year, flooding in this basin results in tens of millions of dollars of damage. Tragically, that flooding has, from time to time, also resulted in a loss of life.

The project, as now described in this bill, would be a multifaceted effort to control and protect against flooding in the area. It would include the purchase and setting aside of land for flood water retention. The focus of much of the attention to this project has been on the tunnel that would carry flood waters away from problem areas.

As proposed by the Corps of Engineers, this tunnel would have its outfall in the Passaic River near Nutley, NJ. Because of the concerns of local residents over possible impacts on their area from this outfall, I support an extension of the tunnel south to Newark Bay. This was an option considered by the Corps of Engineers in its general design memorandum of December 1987.

I've discussed with my colleagues on the committee my interest in including in this bill the extension of the tunnel to Newark Bay. Any concerns I have heard about possible environmental impacts resulting from the extension have been addressed. Some concern has also been expressed about authorizing elements of a project that go beyond what was proposed by the administration. I hope to be able to address those concerns in the committee's upcoming hearing on this legislation. Another issue is whether the State of New Jersey is committed to the extension.

Mr. President, we in New Jersey have a new Governor, our former House colleague Jim Florio. Governor Florio's administration is just getting underway; it is busy addressing important issues such as the automobile insurance problem in New Jersey. Consequently, it has been difficult for the State to clearly state its position on the Passaic River project. I am hopeful that a position will be forthcoming shortly.

I am hopeful that the committee will support authorizing the tunnel extension as part of this project. I would like to ask my good friend, the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, Infrastructure, and Transportation, for his thoughts.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, we are well aware of the interest of the Senators from New Jersey in extending the flood tunnel. But, this would go beyond the proposal submitted by the Corps of Engineers. The committee has had guidelines in place to assist in the development of water resources legislation. Those call for a Chief of Engineers report on each project. In this case, there is a Chief's report, but the extension is not included in the recommendation. But, as we have a Chief's report and the corps has studied the extension, I do not think we should foreclose the committee's consideration and possible approval of the extension. The committee has scheduled a hearing on this bill for March 1. I want to assure my friend that we will give his proposal serious consideration.

I appreciate the concerns of my colleague from New Jersey, and know how hard he works for his State. The subcommittee will work with him to try to resolve this situation.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I thank my colleague and friend from New York, and look foward to continuing to work with him on this important matter. I would like to make it clear that the concerns over including this modification of the Passaic River Basin project in the bill at this time are procedural; the project would be subjected to the usual cost-sharing requirements for water resources projects.

Mr. President, along with my colleague Senator BRADLEY, I am filing an amendment to the water resources bill to authorize extension of the tunnel to Newark Bay, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee. That way, it will be pending before the committee when we hold hearings on this proposal on March 1.●

S. 2184. A bill to assist small communities in construction of facilities for the protection of the environment and human health; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SMALL COMMUNITY ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to assist small communities throughout the Nation in the construction of facilities for the protection of the environment and human health.

I am very pleased that the chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, Senator BURDICK; the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator BYRD; the chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator BENTSEN; the chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator SASSER; the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL; and a number of other Senators are joining me in introducing this important legislation.

Small communities around the Nation are fighting an uphill battle to provide up-to-date environmental protection facilities. In my discussions of this problem with community officials from my home State of Montana and other parts of the country, I have heard three concerns.

First, small communities, by which I mean communities under 2,500 population, have a significant need for improved or expanded environmental protection facilities, including sewage treatment plants, drinking water systems, solid waste facilities, and underground storage tanks.

Second, small communities face special problems in financing environmental facilities including reduced economies of scale, limited access to financing, and modest managerial resources.

Finally, the Federal Government needs to do more to assist these communities in financing the construction of basic environmental facilities and projects.

The legislation we are introducing today, titled the "Small Community Environmental Assistance Act," will assist States in establishing loan and grant funds to help small communities finance essential environmental projects.

Small communities face staggering demands for new and expanded environmental services. While there has been no comprehensive national assessment of the cost of environmental facilities for these communities, costs clearly total billions of dollars.

The Environmental Protection Agency reports the cost of needed sewage treatment in communities of under 10,000 population as $12 billion.

The National Council on Public Works Improvement assessed the need for expanded drinking water systems in 1988 and concluded:

A national problem does exist for small water systems . . . small water systems operate on a marginal basis, with inadequate resources—operational and managerial—to correct existing deficiencies.

Estimates of the cost of new requirements under the Safe Drinking Water Act for some 60,000 water systems under 3,300 users are approximately $5 billion. The costs to the 6,000 incorporated communities under 3,300 system users is about $500 million.

Improvement of solid waste disposal facilities, compliance with leaking underground tank regulations, and implementation of other important environmental efforts will also involve substantial costs for small communities.

Many of the communities in my home State of Montana are working to improve environmental facilities.

In 1986, the Montana State Legislature commissioned a report on infrastructure issues and concluded that parts of Montana's infrastructure are in serious disrepair.

The report found that sewage treatment systems serving about two-thirds of the population were in need of repair or expansion at an estimated cost of $231 million. The estimated costs of bringing drinking water systems into compliance with State standards was about $100 million. About 10 percent of the solid waste facilities were not in compliance with State standards and estimated costs of compliance amounted to $6.4 million.

While financing environmental facilities can be difficult in any community, small communities face special problems and difficulties not faced by larger units of government.

In 1988, EPA published a report assessing the need for local environmental facilities and available resources. The report concluded:

Most municipalities will be able to meet the expected increase in environmental expenses and still remain financially sound. The municipalities most likely to experience difficulties will be those with populations of 2,500 or less.

The EPA reported that communities of under 2,500 population face the highest increase in average annual environmental service costs—a projected increase of $170 per year, compared to $80 to $90 per year in communities between 2,500 and 250,000.

This increase for small communities translates into a relatively larger increase as a percent of household income because incomes are generally lower in small communities—0.7-percent increase for households in small communities but 0.2- to 0.4-percent increase for communities of 2,500 to 250,000.

The EPA also assessed the expected increases in environmental user fees and concluded:

Most of the municipalities that would experience the largest overall percentage increase in fees are the smallest municipalities . . . The user fees of 20 percent of the municipalities under 2,500 persons may rise over 100 percent above current levels by 1996 . . . Many of the households that are expected to experience initial "rate shocks" when confronted with rising user fees are in communities having fewer than 2,500 persons.

In addition, EPA examined the relative access of small and large communities to various financing options. The study concluded:

Between 21 percent and 30 percent of communities under 2,500 persons may have difficulty using revenue bonds, general obligation bonds, and loans . . .

The EPA report also suggests that small communities face additional problems, not faced by many larger communities, in financing environmental projects, including lack of economies of scale, limited management capability, and limited access to technical services.

Several other studies address the problem of funding environmental projects in small communities.

A 1987 report by the Congressional Budget Office indicates the per capita costs of water supply are seven times greater for small communities than large communities.

A 1989 study by the EPA of small water systems concluded:

Plagued by personnel and infrastructure problems, many small systems are unable to meet the challenges of regulations mandated by the 1986 Safe Drinking Water Act amendments. Underlying their difficulties are a lack of financial capacity, technical and management capacity, and information about the regulations.

Lack of financial resources for environmental services in small communities shows up in compliance data. For example, EPA reports that small drinking water systems serve only 8 percent of the population, but account for 93 percent of drinking water standards violations and 94 percent of reporting violations.

We have clear evidence that small communities face significant demands for new and expanded environmental facilities and that these communities are seriously handicapped in addressing these needs.

Without expanded financial assistance from the Federal Government, many of our smaller communities may be unable to attain the environmental goals we have set for the country as a whole.

We must act now to assure that environmental services and facilities in small communities do not become second-class services and facilities.

The legislation we are introducing today is intended to assure that large and small communities throughout the Nation have the benefit of first-class environmental facilities.

The bill provides for establishment of State loan and grant funds to assist small communities in financing environmental facilities, including sewage treatment, drinking water, solid waste, and underground storage tanks.

The bill is modeled after the revolving loan fund in the Clean Water Act. At a hearing of my Subcommittee on Environmental Protection in May of last year, we heard testimony that the Clean Water Act revolving loan program was generally a success, but that small communities, especially disadvantaged small communities, needed additional assistance.

The bill authorizes the EPA to help capitalize loan funds in each State. State loan funds would be available to provide low-interest loans to communities. Communities would repay loans and maintain a permanent environmental financing resource at the State level.

The proposed bill also would provide grants, rather than loans, to the very poor communities—those communities with median household income less than 75 percent of median household income nationally. This authority to provide grants is essential if our poorest communities are to achieve the environmental standards we have established for other communities.

A program of technical assistance for communities is also established to assure that small communities have the best possible information and assistance as they address the difficult issues of financing environmental facilities.

A total authorization of $1.5 billion over 5 years is provided. The authorization levels are timed to coincide with the phased decreases in authorizations we have provided for funding of the Clean Water Act revolving loan funds.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section description of the bill and a copy of the bill be printed at an appropriate place in the RECORD.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I look forward to working with all my colleagues in advancing this important legislation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2184

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE AND TABLE OF CONTENTS

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE AND TABLE OF CONTENTS.—(a) This Act may be cited as the "Small Community Environmental Assistance Act of 1990".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) small communities face special problems in providing for facilities to protect the environment and human health, including sewage disposal, safe drinking water, and environmentally sound solid waste disposal;

(2) small communities often lack economies of scale necessary to provide an adequate financial base for construction and operation of environmental protection facilities;

(3) small communities often have limited access to financial markets due to limited management capability and limited access to financial and technical services;

(4) the Environmental Protection Agency estimates that between 21 percent and 30 percent of small communities will have difficulty using revenue bonds for environmental facilities because of limited financial resources;

(5) many small communities have not benefitted from existing environmental financing and assistance programs of the Federal Government because such assistance programs are often focused on the largest environmental problems caused by larger municipalities (e.g., only 8 percent of the Federal sewage treatment plant grant funds have been devoted to small communities);

(6) existing Federal grant assistance programs for waste water treatment are being phased out in favor of State loan funds and some small communities will have limited access to such funds and some disadvantaged small communities may be unable to comply with pollution control requirements without grant assistance;

(7) residents of small communities often spend a larger portion of household income for environmental services than do residents of large communities;

(8) recent amendments to Federal environmental laws will require additional efforts by small communities to address environmental problems and devote a larger percentage of resources to this effort;

(9) the Environmental Protection Agency estimates that small community households may face an average increase of $170 for environmental user charges and fees as a result of new environmental requirements;

(10) the National Council on Public Works Improvement recently concluded that "A national problem does exist for small water systems . . . and . . . these small water systems operate on a marginal basis, with inadequate financial resources to correct existing deficiencies . . ."

(11) the Environmental Protection Agency reports that small water systems serve 8 percent of the United States population, but account for over 90 percent of the violations of the Safe Drinking Water Act;

(12) the Environmental Protection Agency reports that 80 percent of the communities in violation of sewage treatment requirements are rural communities and that rural community sewage treatment needs exceed $28,000,000,000;

(13) it is essential that the Federal Government play a more active role in providing financial assistance to small communities for construction of environmental protection facilities;

(14) it is essential that the Federal Government make a special effort to provide financial assistance, including grant assistance, to small communities which are economically disadvantaged; and

(15) it is essential that the Federal Government expand and strengthen technical assistance and outreach programs to assist small communities in complying with environmental requirements.

SEC. 3. PURPOSE.—The purpose of this Act is to—

(1) provide for the creation of State revolving loan funds to assist small communities in financing of sewer, water, and solid waste facilities and projects;

(2) to provide for grant assistance to disadvantaged small communities for construction of sewer, water, and solid waste facilities and projects; and

(3) to expand and strengthen Federal programs for providing technical assistance and outreach to small communities on issues relating to environmental protection and construction of environmental facilities and projects.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "Administrator" refers to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

(2) the term "State" has the same meaning as established in section 502(3) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act;

(3) the term "treatment works" shall have the same meaning as established in section 212(2) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act;

(4) the term "solid waste management facility" shall have the same meaning as that established in section 1004(29) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act;

(5) the term "sanitary landfill" shall have the same meaning as that established in section 1004(26) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act;

(6) the term "public water system" has the same meaning as that established in section 1401(4) of the Safe Drinking Water Act;

(7) the term "construction" has the same meaning as that established in section 1004(2) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act;

(8) the term "small community" refers to local units of government in which the population is less than 2,500 individuals, as determined by the latest decennial census of the United States;

(9) the term "disadvantaged small community" refers to a small community in which the median household income of the residents of such community is less than 75 percent of the national median household income, as determined by the latest decennial census of the United States;

(10) the term "investor owned system" means any treatment works, public water system, or solid waste management facility which is owned and operated by a private person for profit; and

(11) the term "underground storage tank" has the same meaning as that established in section 9001(1) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, as amended.

SEC. 5. GRANTS TO STATES FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SMALL COMMUNITY POLLUTION CONTROL REVOLVING FUNDS.—(a) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Administrator shall make grants to each State for the purpose of establishing a small community pollution control revolving fund.

(b) PURPOSE.—State small community revolving loan funds shall be available for providing financial assistance to small communities for—

(1) construction of waste-water treatment works;

(2) construction of public water systems;

(3) construction of solid waste management facilities; and

(4) assuring that underground storage tanks which are owned and operated by small communities are in compliance with section 9003(c) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, as amended.

(c) SCHEDULE OF GRANT PAYMENTS.—The Administrator and each State shall jointly establish a schedule of payments under which the Administrator will pay to the State the amount of each grant to be made to the State under this Act. Such schedule shall be based on the State's intended use plan under section 7 of this Act, except that—

(1) such payments shall be made in cash in quarterly installments, and

(2) such payments shall be made as expeditiously as possible, but in no event later than the earlier of—

(A) 8 quarters after the date such funds were obligated by the State, or

(B) 12 quarters after the date such funds were allotted to the State.

(d) FORMULA.—Sums authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section shall be allotted by the Administrator in accordance with a formula, to be established by the Administrator, which reflects the need for construction of facilities for wastewater treatment, drinking water supply, and solid waste disposal in small communities and the proportion of such need in each State in disadvantaged small communities.

(e) MINIMUM ALLOTMENT.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator shall ensure that each State receives a minimum allotment of not less than one percent of the funds appropriated pursuant to this Act in each fiscal year.

(f) ALLOTMENT PERIOD.—(1) PERIOD OF AVAILABILITY FOR GRANT AWARD.—Sums allotted to a State under this section for a fiscal year shall be available for obligation by the State during the fiscal year for which sums are authorized and during the following fiscal year.

(2) REALLOTMENT OF UNOBLIGATED FUNDS.—The amount of any allotment not obligated by the State by the last day of the 2-year period of availability established by paragraph (1) shall be immediately reallotted by the Administrator on the basis of the same ratio as is applicable to sums allotted under subsection (d) of this section. None of the funds reallotted by the Administrator shall be reallotted to any State which has not obligated all sums allotted to such State in the first fiscal year of such 2-year period.

SEC. 6. SMALL COMMUNITY POLLUTION CONTROL REVOLVING FUNDS.—(a) GENERAL RULE.—To receive grant funds made available under this Act, a State shall first establish a small community pollution control revolving fund which complies with the requirements of this section.

(b) SPECIFIC REQUIREMENTS.—The Administrator shall enter into an agreement under this section with a State only after the State has established to the satisfaction of the Administrator that—

(1) the State shall accept grant payments with funds to be made available under this Act in accordance with a payment schedule established pursuant to section 5(c) of this Act and will deposit all such payments in the small community pollution control revolving fund established by the State in accordance with this Act;

(2) the State will deposit in the fund from State moneys an amount equal to at least 25 percent of the total amount of all grants which will be made to the State with funds to be made available under this Act on or before the date on which each quarterly grant payment will be made to the State under this Act;

(3) the State will enter into binding commitments with small communities to provide assistance in accordance with the requirements of this Act in an amount equal to 125 percent of the amount of each such grant payment within 1 year after the receipt of such grant payment;

(4) all funds in the fund will be expended in an expeditious and timely manner;

(5) in addition to complying with the requirements of this Act, the State will commit or expend each quarterly grant payment which it will receive under this title in accordance with laws and procedures applicable to the commitment or expenditure of revenues of the State;

(6) in carrying out the requirements of this Act, the State will use accounting, audit, and fiscal procedures conforming to generally accepted government accounting standards;

(7) the State will require as a condition of making a loan or providing other assistance from the fund that the recipient of such assistance will maintain project accounts in accordance with generally accepted government accounting standards; and

(8) the State will make annual reports to the Administrator on the actual use of funds in accordance with section 7(b) of this Act.

(c) TYPES OF ASSISTANCE.—Except as otherwise limited by State law, a small community pollution control revolving fund of a State under this section may be used only—

(1) to make loans to small communities, on the condition that—

(A) such loans are made at or below market interest rates, including interest free loans, at terms not to exceed 30 years;

(B) annual principal and interest payments will commence not later than 3 years after completion of a project and all loans will be fully amortized not later than 30 years after project completion;

(C) the recipient of a loan will establish a dedicated source of revenue for repayment of loans; and

(D) the recipient of the loan agrees to repay the loan and the fund will be credited with all payments of principal and interest on all loans; and

(E) any loan made to an investor owned system shall be at market interest rates;

(2) to make grants to small communities, on the condition that—

(A) such grants do not exceed 75 percent of the costs of eligible projects; and

(B) the local unit of government receiving a grant is a disadvantaged small community;

(3) to guarantee, or purchase insurance for, small community obligations where such action would improve credit market access or reduce interest rates;

(4) as a source of revenue or security for the payment of principal and interest on revenue or general obligation bonds issued by the State if the proceeds of the sale of such bonds will be deposited in the fund;

(5) to earn interest on fund accounts; and

(6) for the reasonable costs of administering the fund and conducting activities under this Act, except that such amounts shall not exceed 4 percent of the balance of such fund.

(d) ADMINISTRATION.—Each State loan fund shall be administered by an instrumentality of the State with such powers and limitations as may be required to operate the fund in accordance with the requirements of this Act.

(e) CONSISTENCY WITH PLANNING REQUIREMENTS.—(1) A State may provide financial assistance from its small community pollution control revolving fund only with respect to a waste-water treatment project which is consistent with plans, if any, developed under sections 205(j), 208, 303(e), 319, and 320 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

(2) A State may provide financial assistance from its small community pollution control revolving loan fund only with respect to a public water system which is approved by the chief executive officer of the State agency with primary enforcement authority pursuant to section 1413 of the Safe Drinking Water Act.

(3) A State may provide financial assistance from its small community pollution control revolving loan fund only with respect to a solid waste management facility which is consistent with a plan approved pursuant to section 4007 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act.

SEC. 7. INTENDED USE PLAN.—(a)(1) IN GENERAL.—Prior to the beginning of each fiscal year, each State shall prepare and submit to the Administrator a plan identifying the intended uses of the amounts available to its small community pollution control revolving fund. Such intended use plan shall include, but not be limited to—

(A) a list of those projects for construction of waste-water treatment works, water supply systems, and solid waste management facilities which are pending;

(B) a description of the short- and long-term goals and objectives of the pollution control revolving fund;

(C) information on the activities to be supported, including a description of project categories, terms of financial assistance, and communities served;

(D) assurances and specific proposals for meeting the requirements of subsection (G) of section (6) of this Act; and

(E) the criteria and method established for the allocation of funds to proposed projects.

(2) The Administrator shall review the plan developed pursuant to this subsection and shall not make grant payments pursuant to section 5 of this Act unless he determines that such plan is consistent with the requirements and objectives of this Act.

(3) The State shall provide for public review and comment on the plan developed pursuant to this section.

(b) RESERVATION OF FUNDS FOR PLANNING.—Each State shall reserve each fiscal year 1 percent of the sums in the fund, or $100,000, whichever amount is greater, to carry out planning and related activities pursuant to this section.

SEC. 8. AUDITS, REPORTS, AND FISCAL CONTROLS.—(a) FISCAL CONTROL AND AUDITING PROCEDURES.—Each State electing to establish a small community pollution control revolving fund under this Act shall establish fiscal controls and accounting procedures sufficient to assure proper accounting during appropriate accounting periods for—

(1) payments received by the fund;

(2) disbursements made by the fund; and

(3) fund balances at the beginning and end of the accounting period.

(b) ANNUAL FEDERAL AUDITS.—The Administrator shall, at least on an annual basis, conduct or require each State to have independently conducted reviews and audits as may be deemed necessary or appropriate by the Administrator to carry out the objectives of this section. Audits of the use of funds deposited in the pollution revolving fund established by such State shall be conducted in accordance with the auditing procedures of the General Accounting Office, including chapter 75 of title 31, United States Code.

(c) ANNUAL REPORT.—Beginning 60 days after the end of the first fiscal year after the receipt of payments under this Act, the State shall submit an annual report to the Administrator describing how the State has met the goals and objectives for the previous fiscal year, as identified in the plan prepared for such year pursuant to subsection (a), including identification of loan and grant recipients, loan and grant amounts, and terms and similar details on other forms of financial assistance provided from the small community pollution control revolving fund.

(d) NONCOMPLIANCE.—(1) If the Administrator determines that a State has not complied with the requirements of this Act, the Administrator shall notify the State of such noncompliance and the necessary corrective action.

(2) WITHHOLDING OF PAYMENTS.—If a State does not take corrective action within 60 days after the date a State receives notification of noncompliance under paragraph (1), the Administrator shall withhold additional payments to the State until the Administrator is satisfied that the State has taken the necessary corrective action.

(3) REALLOTMENT OF WITHHELD PAYMENTS.—If the Administrator is not satisfied that adequate correction actions have been taken by the State within 12 months after the State is notified of noncompliance, the payments withheld from the State by the Administrator shall be made available for reallotment in accordance with the formula for allotment of funds under this Act.

SMALL COMMUNITY TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AND OUTREACH

SEC. 9. SMALL COMMUNITY TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AND OUTREACH.—(a) OFFICE OF SMALL COMMUNITY ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE.—(1) The Administrator shall establish an Office of Small Community Environmental Assistance.

(2) FUNCTIONS.—The functions of the Office of Small Community Environmental Assistance shall be to—

(A) manage grants pursuant to section 5 of this Act;

(B) oversee the operation of State small community pollution control revolving funds;

(C) provide information and guidance to small communities in financial analysis, financial planning, and assessment of project feasibility;

(D) provide small communities with information and guidance concerning compliance with environmental protection requirements of Federal statutes; and

(E) provide information and guidance to small communities on issues including regionalization of environmental facilities, reform of existing rate structures, and operation of special management districts.

(b) SMALL COMMUNITY CIRCUIT RIDER PROGRAM.—(1) In implementation of the functions identified in subsection (a) the Office of Small Community Environmental Assistance may provide grants to appropriate State agencies and not-for-profit organizations, including organizations operating at a multistate level to assist in the dissemination of information to small communities and to assist small communities in assessment of issues relating to financing of environmental facilities and compliance with environmental laws.

(2) Grants pursuant to this section shall be in an amount determined by the Administrator and shall be matched by non-Federal funds in an amount equal to not less than 25 percent of the small community environmental assistance program cost in a given fiscal year.

(3) In awarding grants pursuant to this section the Administrator shall, to the fullest extent practicable, assure that communities in all States have access to assistance pursuant to this subsection, that award of grants is on a competitive basis, and that past performance of an applicant is considered in awarding future grants.

(4) Recipients of grants pursuant to this section shall provide such information as the Administrator deems appropriate in applications for grant assistance and in reports of program activities.

(c) COORDINATION WITH OTHER FEDERAL AGENCIES.—The Administrator shall work with other Federal agencies, including the Department of Agriculture, in the implementation of this section.

SEC. 10. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act $200,000,000 for fiscal year 1992, $300,000,000 for fiscal year 1993, $500,000,000 for fiscal year 1994, and $500,000,000 for fiscal year 1995.

SECTION-BY-SECTION DESCRIPTION OF THE SMALL COMMUNITY ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1990

Section 1: Short Title and Table of Content.—This Act may be called the "Small Community Environmental Assistance Act of 1990."

Section 2: Findings.—The Congress finds that small communities face special problems in financing environmental facilities, that residents of small communities spend a larger share of income for environmental services than do residents of large communities, and that the Federal government should take a more active in providing financial and technical assistance to small communities in constructing environmental facilities.

Section 3: Purpose.—The purposes of this Act are to create State revolving loan funds to assist small communities in financing environmental programs, to provide grant assistance to disadvantaged communities, and to expand Federal technical assistance to small communities.

Section 4: Definitions.—Key terms used in the Act are defined including "small community" (a community of under 2,500 pop.) and "disadvantaged small community" (a small community with a median household income 75% of the national average).

Section 5: Grants to States.—The EPA is to make grants to States to establish pollution control revolving funds to assist small communities in financing sewage, drinking water, and solid waste facility construction, and compliance with underground tank regulations. Payment schedules, allotment formula, and procedures for reallotment are specified.

Section 6: Small Community Pollution Control Revolving Funds.—States are to establish revolving funds which meet the conditions of this Act, including provision of a 25% State match for Federal funds, obligation of funds promptly, and assurance of proper accounting. Assistance to be provided by the fund may include loans, 75% grants to disadvantaged communities, purchase of insurance, and other assistance.

Section 7: Intended Use Plan.—States are to develop an annual plan identifying the intended uses of monies in the fund.

Section 8: Audits, Reports and Fiscal Controls.—States are to provide for appropriate fiscal controls and audits and provide reports to the EPA.

Section 9: Small Community Technical Assistance and Outreach.—EPA is to establish an Office of Small Community Environmental Assistance to administer this Act and to provide technical assistance to States and small communities in financing of environmental projects.

Section 10: Authorizations.—A total of $1.5 billion is authorized over 4 years ($200, $300, $500, and $500 million).●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with many of my colleagues in introducing legislation which will assist small communities in financing facilities for the protection of the environment and human health.

There is growing evidence that small communities under 2,500 have a significant need for improved or expanded facilities such as sewage treatment plants, drinking water systems, solid waste facilities, and underground storage tanks. Estimates of the cost of these needed improvements range from $6 to $8 billion.

It has become increasingly evident that small communities face special problems in financing these types of facilities. The Environmental Protection Agency reports that small communities are most likely to experience rate shock as a result of new environmental projects. It is projected that the user fees of 20 percent of municipalities under 2,500 persons may rise over 100 percent above current levels by 1996. The Small Community Environmental Assistance Act will help our Nation's smaller communities finance needed environmental programs.

This legislation establishes an Office of Small Community Environmental Assistance within the EPA to administer this act and provide technical assistance to States. State revolving funds would provide low-interest loans and would be a permanent environmental financing resource at the State level. Disadvantaged communities with a median household income of 75 percent of the national average would be eligible for grants at the State level.

All communities, big and small, are faced with the need to either build or upgrade environmental facilities. Larger communities are generally more fortunate in that their budgets can absorb the expenses associated with these projects. Smaller communities need special help. The Small Community Environmental Assistance Act addresses these special needs. I urge my colleagues to act on this legislation.●

● Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today to express my support for the Small Community Environmental Assistance Act of 1990. I commend the Senator from Montana, Mr. BAUCUS, for bringing the issue of environmental compliance in small communities to the attention of the Senate. As the Senator points out, residents of small communities spend a larger share of income for environmental services than do residents of larger communities.

I come from a State of mostly small communities: Over 95 percent of North Dakota communities have a population of less than 2,500. I know firsthand the problems faced by these communities complying with new environmental regulations. These problems are greatly compounded when the community is economically disadvantaged. Unfortunately for the residents of North Dakota, many of our communities have been ravaged by drought-related economic impacts and a downturn in the State economy over the past few years.

These communities simply lack the resources to invest in new or expanded water plants, sewage treatment plants, landfills, and other facilities required by Federal environmental regulations.

An immediate problem for all small communities across the country will be to respond to what is anticipated to be very costly improvements to municipal landfills. In my mail and in meetings all across North Dakota, representatives from small communities have expressed concern over their ability to pay for EPA's pending new regulations. The cost of compliance with these regulations will be a significant burden for these communities.

This bill would provide economic or technical assistance to small communities through the creation of State-established and State-operated revolving funds. Economic assistance would be in the form of a loan and could be applied to the construction of either new or expanded environmental facilities. If the small community were also economically disadvantaged, it could apply for a grant rather than a loan.

Mr. President, for the reasons I have cited here, I wholeheartedly support the Small Community Environmental Assistance Act of 1990 and I encourage my colleagues to do likewise.●

By Mr. COATS:

S. 2185. A bill to impose a criminal penalty for flight to avoid payment of arrearages in child support, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FLIGHT TO AVOID PAYMENT OF ARREARAGES IN CHILD SUPPORT

● Mr. COATS. Mr. President, over the last 20 years, we have seen a dramatic rise in the number of divorced women and their children living in poverty. Women and children often find their standard of living dropping dramatically following a family breakup. Usually, these families depended upon the father's income to support the family.

Alone, with small children and lacking job experience, it is not hard to understand why broken families wind up poor—especially if the parent without custody does not pay child support. One woman, Edie Matthews from Madison, WI, spent 8 years on welfare after her husband left her. The reason for her poverty was that during that time, she received a meager $5,000 in child support to help raise her two children—far less than the court had awarded her.

I am here today to propose legislation to help end this widespread tendency to avoid paying child support. The proposal is a relatively simple one. Provide stiff penalties for those who avoid their responsibility. This legislation would provide for the imposition of jail terms for those who ignore their legal child support obligation by fleeing and remaining outside the States in which the obligation is imposed. A criminal penalty is a just punishment for those who think they can simply walk away from their children.

If enacted, this legislation will provide the courts with added enforcement power. The additional threat of punishment would deter parents from flight to avoid basic and essential parental obligations. I urge my colleagues to enact this legislation for the good of the children who are not only faced with the tragedy of a broken home, but must also confront the demoralizing and degrading consequence of poverty.●

By Mr. McCONNELL:

S. 2186. A bill to repeal the provisions of the Revenue Reconciliation Act of 1989 which require the withholding of income tax from wages paid for agricultural labor; to the Committee on Finance.

REPEAL OF WITHHOLDING PROVISIONS RELATING TO AGRICULTURAL LABOR

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, last year in our rush to complete the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989—Public Law 101-239—a provision was included in the passed version of the legislation. Unfortunately, this provision has placed an added burden to our Nations' farmers by requiring farmers to withhold Federal taxes from workers' income.

All farmers with a payroll of $2,500 per year must keep W-4 forms on all workers and then file quarterly reports on wages paid and to whom. Farmers who pay less than $2,500 in wages each year must still withhold Federal income taxes on every employee who receives more than $150 in wages from the farmer. This legislation is clearly an attempt to use the employer to enforce the tax code.

The nature of the farming business requires hiring workers on a seasonal, part-time basis. Because farmers are unable to provide work year round they cannot employ one person to do the hired labor. For example, during the business time of the year a farmer must hire two or three extra people to get the necessary work completed in a timely manner. This could be getting the crop planted early enough to ensure adequate growing time or getting the crop harvested before the winter weather sets in. In turn, it would be virtually impossible to move heavy farm equipment through muddy or snow-covered fields.

Consider the case of a small specialized crop farmer that may have 10 acres of strawberries, but only has 2 weeks to get the crop picked before they rot in the field? What about the Kentucky farmer who grows bell peppers as an alternative crop to tobacco? He must harvest them while the peppers are the required size by the processor or bear an extensive loss at the marketplace because the peppers are too large.

In both of these instances time is critical and farmers must often hire 10, 20 or even 30 people, but just for a short period of time. The farmer may only pay $200 to each employee, but the employer still has to withhold income taxes for every person hired. Anyone familiar with farming realizes how critical time can be during the peak periods of harvest and now placing added bureaucratic red tape to the farmers' lives will only make an already difficult situation more difficult.

My colleagues may say the solution is simple, just hire fewer people, but that means fewer jobs for those people that desperately need work no matter how small the paycheck. As a direct result of this legislation farmers will hire fewer workers simply to avoid the extra paperwork. Furthermore, most farm laborers do not even earn enough to incur a tax liability. Consequently, the money, earned by those who are least able to afford an income loss, is spent by the Federal Government until the farm workers can file for a refund.

The Joint Tax Committee estimates that over a 5-year period $404 million in new revenue will be generated from this legislation. While this may appear to be a significant amount, over 60 percent of this money is generated in the first year. In years three through five tax revenues would average only $22 million. I suggest that the added cost to employers and employees far outweighs the Government benefits.

A Utica, KY farmer and a friend of mine, John Burns, puts it in perspective by saying "Most of us aren't set up for this. We don't have offices. We're our own office help." That is exactly my point. This legislation penalizes those least in a position to handle the extra burden making it hardly beneficial to the Government. Instead, it adds another layer of unneeded and unwanted paperwork for America's hard-working men and women.

Mr. President, I believe a mistake has been made in enacting this provision of Public Law 101-239. Farmers, laborers, and the entire farm community will bear the undue burden of this legislation. American consumers will pick up the tab for the expense of complying with the withholding tax. Finally, my bill represents an opportunity to do something good for the small family farmer—the backbone of our Nation.●

RURAL HEALTH LEGISLATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I introduce two bills designed to improve access to health care services in rural areas.

While the American health care system is the most technologically advanced in the world, access to basic services in small towns and rural communities is threatened by hospital closures, shortages of health professionals, and increasing costs.

Over the past 5 years, rural health care has been a major concern of the Congress and various agricultural and health care organizations. An important step was taken in 1987 when the Department of Health and Human Services established the Office of Rural Health Policy to work within the Department and with other Federal agencies, States, national associations, foundations, and private sector organizations to seek solutions to rural health care problems. The office has very effectively disseminated information to those seeking assistance in rural health care delivery.

To supplement Federal efforts, I believe it is important for each State to begin building its own infrastructure to facilitate coordinated approaches to rural health care problems. Since it is evident that solutions to these problems will require cooperative effort, I am introducing the State Offices of Rural Health Act of 1990 to establish Federal matching grants to encourage creation of State offices of rural health and to augment those that already exist. These offices will concentrate on eliminating current deficiencies in our rural health care delivery systems. Unhampered by Federal requirements, they will be given maximum flexibility to meet the needs of communities within each State and will coordinate their activities with other public and private health agencies, and with the Agricultural Extension Service.

These offices will: First, examine rural health care delivery and recommend improvements in quality and cost effectiveness; second, assist in recruitment and retention of health professionals; third, make recommendations to the Federal Office of Rural Health Policy for consideration as part of Federal rural health policy; and fourth, develop plans to enable community health care systems to respond to changes in their circumstances.

States will decide how to organize these offices, whether within another agency or through an educational institution or a private contracting organization. However organized, the aim of these State offices of rural health will be the integration of State, Federal, and private sector activities and the development of innovative solutions for improving access to quality care in rural communities. I hope other Senators will join me in working for enactment of this important legislation.

I also introduce today the Rural Health and Safety Education Act of 1990. Over the past several years, an increasing number of programs have been established to assist development efforts to improve the quality of life in rural America. While the emphasis in rural development efforts has been economic growth, attention has been focused recently on improving rural health care services. In the effort to improve health care delivery in small towns and rural communities, I believe we should utilize the Cooperative Extension Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture. While the Agriculture Extension Service has been involved in health and safety education programs since 1914, the legislation I am introducing authorizes special grants for the Service to expand these programs.

These grants will be used to establish individual and family health education programs to encourage people in rural areas to participate in more health promotion activities and make more effective use of available health services. They will also be available to the Extension Service for rural health leadership development education programs to assist community leaders and public officials understand their roles and responsibilities relative to rural health services.

The legislation can be used to establish farm safety education programs through the Extension Service to help farm workers, timber harvesters, and farm family members to learn better safety practices in the workplace. Emphasis will be given to farm chemicals and their use, respiratory disease prevention, and noise-induced hearing loss, as well as training for emergency medical care and farm accident rescue procedures. These activities, like the others authorized by this legislation, will be coordinated with the State offices of rural health.

I encourage Senators to support this legislation and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2187

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "State Offices of Rural Health Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. GRANTS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF STATE OFFICES OF RURAL HEALTH.

Title XVI of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 300q et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART E—STATE OFFICES OF RURAL HEALTH

"SEC. 1651. STATE OFFICES OF RURAL HEALTH.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall make grants to States in accordance with this section to enable such States to establish State Offices of Rural Health, or to assist existing State rural health offices, to engage in the activities described in subsection (d)(2).

"(b) AMOUNT OF GRANT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Subject to paragraph (2), the Secretary shall make grants to any State for any fiscal year in an amount equal to the amount obligated by the State for such fiscal year for the establishment and ongoing operation of a State Office of Rural Health in accordance with subsection (d).

"(2) MAXIMUM AMOUNT.—The Secretary shall not make grants to a single State for a fiscal year under this section in an amount aggregating more than 2 percent of the aggregate of the amounts appropriated pursuant to subsection (f) for such fiscal year.

"(3) MATCHING REQUIREMENT.—A State that receives a grant under this section shall provide an amount equal to the amount provided under such grant to establish, administer, or enhance the ongoing operations of the Office. Such amounts may be provided in cash or in-kind.

"(c) LIMITATION ON USE OF GRANT FOR RESEARCH ACTIVITIES.—Each State receiving a grant under this section shall not use in excess of 5 percent of the amounts provided under such grant for research activities.

"(d) STATE OFFICES OF RURAL HEALTH.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—Each State that receives a grant under this section may establish, or continue the operations of, the State Office of Rural Health in a State agency, or through contract with a public or private educational institution or other organization, or any combination of the preceding entities, as determined by the State.

"(2) ACTIVITIES.—

"(A) DUTIES.—Each State Office of Rural Health established or operated under a grant made under this section shall—

"(i) provide leadership and advocacy for rural residents with regard to rural health;

"(ii) coordinate the activities of such Offices with Federal, State, local, and private health entities, and with the rural development activities of, and cooperate with, the Agricultural Extension Service;

"(iii) make recommendations on improving the quality and cost effectiveness in the delivery of rural health care;

"(iv) prepare and submit reports periodically to the Office of Rural Health Policy concerning the activities of the office; and

"(v) communicate and cooperate with rural health research centers established by the Federal Office of Rural Health Policy established under section 301.

"(B) OPTIONAL ACTIVITIES.—Each State Office of Rural Health established under a grant made under this section may—

"(i) assist rural areas in responding to changes in access to health care;

"(ii) plan and assist in the professional recruitment and retention of medical professionals and assistants in rural areas;

"(iii) improve community involvement in health care delivery through methods including the conduct of leadership development programs for the members of the community;

"(iv) improve rural emergency medical services;

"(v) improve access to health care in rural areas through innovative transportation and communications services;

"(vi) encourage the sharing of rural health care information;

"(vii) evaluate data on rural health conditions and needs; and

"(viii) provide technical assistance for rural hospital transition grants.

"(3) ANNUAL MEETINGS.—Representatives from each State Office of Rural Health that receives a grant made under this section shall meet annually with representatives from the Office of Rural Health Policy to share information and coordinate strategies for improving quality and cost effectiveness in the delivery of rural health care.

"(4) LIMITATION.—No amounts appropriated under subsection (f) shall be used for health planning uses of the type performed under title XV (as such title existed prior to January 1, 1987,) such as certificate of need programs.

"(e) STATE DEFINED.—As used in this section, the term 'State' means the 50 States.".

"(f) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section, $3,750,000, for fiscal year 1991, $2,500,000, for fiscal year 1992, and $1,250,000, for fiscal year 1993, such sums shall remain available until expended.".

S. 2188

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Rural Health and Safety Education Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. RURAL HEALTH AND SAFETY EDUCATION PROGRAMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 502 of the Rural Development Act of 1972 (7 U.S.C. 2661) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) RURAL HEALTH AND SAFETY EDUCATION PROGRAMS.—

"(1) PROGRAMS AUTHORIZED.—

"(A) INDIVIDUAL AND FAMILY HEALTH EDUCATION.—The Secretary may make grants for the establishment of individual and family health education programs that shall provide individuals and families with—

"(i) information concerning the value of good health;

"(ii) information to increase the individual or families motivation to take more responsibility for their own health;

"(iii) access to health promotion activities;

"(iv) information to enable the individual and family to learn new health information relating to diet and human nutrition, prevention of disease, health maintenance, health promotion, effective consumer use of health services, prenatal health and reduction of infant mortality, and radon testing in rural homes; and

"(v) training for volunteers and health services providers concerning nutrition and health care for children and older Americans, home health care services, AIDS care services, and related health promotion and health care services.

"(B) RURAL HEALTH LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT.—The Secretary may make grants for the establishment of rural health leadership development education programs that shall assist rural communities in developing health care services and facilities that will provide the maximum benefit for the resources invested and assist community leaders and public officials in understanding their roles and responsibilities relative to rural health services and facilities, including—

"(i) community decisions regarding funding for and retention of rural hospitals;

"(ii) rural physician and allied health professionals recruitment and retention;

"(iii) the aging rural population and senior services required to care for such;

"(iv) the establishment and maintenance of rural emergency medical services systems; and

"(v) the application of computer assisted capital budgeting decision aids for rural health services and facilities.

"(C) FARM SAFETY EDUCATION.—The Secretary may make grants for the establishment of farm safety education programs that shall provide information and training to farm workers, timber harvesters, and farm families concerning safety in the work place, including information and training concerning—

"(i) the reduction of occupational injury and death rates;

"(ii) the reduction and prevention of exposure to farm chemicals;

"(iii) the reduction of agricultural respiratory diseases and dermititis;

"(iv) the reduction and prevention of noise induced hearing loss;

"(v) the occupational rehabilitation of farmers and timber harvesters with physical disabilities; and

"(vi) emergency medical technicians and nonprofessionals on farm accident rescue procedures.

"(2) COORDINATION OF PROGRAMS.—Educational programs conducted with grants awarded under this subsection shall be coordinated with the State offices of rural health.

"(3) DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.—Educational programs conducted with grants awarded under this subsection shall provide leadership within the State for the dissemination of appropriate rural health and safety information resources possessed by the Rural Information Center established at the National Agricultural Library.

"(4) PROCEDURES AND LIMITATIONS.—The Secretary shall establish policies, procedures and limitations that shall apply to States that desire to receive a grant under this subsection. In States with land-grant colleges and universities that are eligible to receive funds under the Act of July 2, 1862 (7 U.S.C. 301 et seq.), and the Act of August 30, 1890 (7 U.S.C. 321 et seq.), including Tuskegee University, such eligible institutions shall mutually determine the type of rural health and safety education program needed in the State within which such institutions reside.

"(5) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are authorized to be appropriated to make grants under this subsection, $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1991, $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1992, $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1993, and $20,000,000 for fiscal year 1994 and each subsequent fiscal year. Amounts appropriated under this subsection shall remain available until expended.".

(b) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Section 503(c) of such Act (7 U.S.C. 2663(c)) is amended by striking out "and section 502(f)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 502(f), and section 502(g)".

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today as an original cosponsor of the State Offices of Rural Health Act of 1990. I commend my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] for his efforts to recognize the vital importance of these institutions throughout the United States.

As many of my colleagues well know, much of the activity in improving rural health care occurs at the State level. This legislation will assist States in developing coordinated, focused approaches to rural health care problems by authorizing a matching grant program to encourage the establishment of State Offices of Rural Health. These offices will coordinate activities with the Agricultural Extension Service, examine and make recommendations on improving quality and cost effectiveness in the delivery of rural health care, work with the five existing health research centers, and develop and implement plans to enable the community to respond to various changes in their circumstances.

I firmly believe in the ability of State Offices of Rural Health to work hand-in-hand with communities to identify the problems and the solutions of rural health care delivery. In 1979, my State created and funded the Oregon Office of Rural Health, one of the first of its kind in the Nation. Prior to 1979, many different organizations were attempting to address health concerns in rural Oregon. Although these groups each held an interest in rural health as part of their mission, there was no one entity whose primary responsibility was to assist rural areas to develop and manage health services and systems.

First located within the State Health Planning and Development Agency, the Office of Rural Health was moved by the Oregon legislature to Oregon Health Sciences University in July 1989. With OHSU's focus on community outreach and rural health, and a President interested in establishing Area Health Education centers in rural areas, several legislators and university officials sought to place most of the State's rural health efforts under one umbrella. The Office of Rural Health is an ideal partner to help coordinate rural health care efforts and to look for solutions to the serious concerns raised by residents of rural areas.

The Office of Rural Health has always had the support of professionals, the public and the leadership in my State. It is a fine example of a "helping agency—one looking for answers to hard questions, surveying the field of professionals and organizations most directly involved in rural health care delivery. It offers several examples of service to Oregon's rural communities.

Since 1979, the Office of Rural Health has funded a small grant program as an incentive to rural communities to develop and improve their health care systems. Grants have been awarded to 22 different remote communities for such things as clinic equipment, medical supplies and recruitment of mid-level practitioners.

The agency has provided staff assistance to rural communities and hospitals, offering guidance in the areas of community organization, problem solving, assessment of community needs, general information and referrals, and basic overall support.

The Oregon office has coordinated with public and private agencies to address rural health problems and avoid duplication of services; to make informed referrals to the communities; to alert appropriate agencies of rural health issues within their purview and maximize the effectiveness of each agency's efforts; and to share ideas and information that relate to health care in rural communities. The Office of Rural Health is a spokesperson and advocate for the health interests of the people in rural areas.

Perhaps most importantly, the Office of Rural Health provides information to rural communities and hospitals, health professionals, and health related organizations. The office handles numerous calls and inquiries each day from within the State and across the Nation. This sharing of information has greatly increased the awareness of the problems rural areas encounter and helped identify communities that can benefit from various programs and opportunities.

Quite frankly, Mr. President, Oregon's Office of Rural Health is one of the most valuable assets we have to offer the rural communities in my State. I believe this resource should exist in each and every State and each State Office of Rural Health should serve as a primary advocate for rural health care in this Nation.

Mr. President, 50 percent of my State's population lives in rural areas. Thirty-six, or almost 50 percent, of Oregon's hospitals are rural and of those, six have closed in the last 10 years. We must reverse this trend by increasing the States' ability to respond to the needs of their rural communities.

I am firmly committed to strengthening our national rural health care infrastructure and I believe this legislation is a vital first step. I hope that my colleagues will recognize the important advocacy that will come from a national network of State rural health offices.

By Mr. PRYOR (for himself, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. KOHL, Mr. GLENN, Mr. COHEN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. WILSON, Mr. BRADLEY, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. DANFORTH, and Mr. DURENBERGER):

S. 2189. A bill to establish a grant program to provide health insurance information, counseling, and assistance to individuals eligible to receive benefits under title XVIII of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

HEALTH INSURANCE COUNSELING AND ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1990

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by Senators HEINZ, BAUCUS, DASCHLE, KOHL, GLENN, COHEN, RIEGLE, ROCKEFELLER, BURDICK, GRAHAM, WILSON, BRADLEY, KASSEBAUM, DANFORTH, and DURENBERGER in introducing today the "Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990." This legislation will give States the ability to establish programs, which emphasize the use of trained volunteers to provide objective, one-on-one health insurance counseling and assistance to older Americans.

CONSUMER CONFUSION

During the debate leading to both enactment and repeal of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, it became abundantly clear that older Americans and their families are very confused about what's covered and not covered under Medicare. Beyond the complexities of Medicare and Medicaid, decisionmaking about private coverage—Medigap, long-term care insurance, and other forms of health coverage—is exceedingly difficult for most people.

Decisionmaking about coverage can also be difficult within a highly competitive insurance market. In spite of State and Federal regulatory efforts, many serious problems in the private insurance market persist. Reports of marketing and sales abuses—including agent ignorance, high-pressure marketing techniques, agent efforts to sell unnecessary and even fraudulent policies, as well as insurance company practices and policies that deny or restrict coverage that seniors thought they had, continue.

I plan to focus additional attention on the Medigap issue by convening an Aging Committee hearing on March 7. This hearing will address the problems faced by older Americans in securing adequate health coverage. In preparing for this hearing, my staff has uncovered a number of startling abuses within the private insurance market. Some of these are variations on old scams, and others are new forms of flim-flam.

For example, a constituent of mine recently received a so-called cold lead card exclaiming:

> The Repeal of the Catastrophic Benefit simply means Senior Americans will pay a much larger part of hospital and medical bills than ever before * * * a few selected insurance companies are offering new 100 percent special plans to pay what Medicare doesn't.

In one State, a hospital was providing billing services to attract Medicare beneficiaries. The alarming fact was that, unbeknownst to the beneficiaries, insurance agents were providing the billing services. Evidently, the hospital received a percentage of the commission from policies sold through the so-called billing service process.

An insurance agent told us how he was trained to never say he was an insurance agent. Instead, he was trained to say "I'm on the Medicare route" or to use his business card that stated he was an investigator from the State insurance commission office.

These approaches are misleading at best. Worse yet, these marketing tactics are scaring and confusing our old constituents.

COUNSELING PROGRAMS

Several States have started programs that rely extensively on volunteers, with the support of paid staff, to provide one-on-one counseling to older people. Some programs are sponsored by the State department of insurance, others are sponsored by the State unit on aging. Programs such as those in Wisconsin, California, and Washington State are well established and have a strong commitment from the State. However, other States eager to replicate these efforts report that funding to sustain or build their effort is a major barrier.

A counseling and assistance program provides the opportunity for a senior to seek advice about the adequacy of their current coverage and the gaps that they have. For example, during a free-look period on a policy they have purchased they can speak with knowledgable trained—and conflict of interest free—individuals about the policy.

Counseling programs save older Americans money. California's HICAP [Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Programs] is estimated to have saved senior citizens twice as much money as the program costs, saving an average of $900 each for over 5,000 people annually.

A modest investment, with the use of volunteers, can yield large dividends. The Senior Health Insurance Program in New Jersey has an annual budget of $100,000 and relies on volunteers to counsel older persons in the State. In the program's first 3 years of existence, it helped 15,000 clients.

THE BILL

In light of the misunderstandings so many older persons have about their health insurance needs and coverage, and their vulnerability to high pressure, and sometimes unscrupulous, sales practices, I am introducing the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990. The bill has widespread support.

The National Association of Insurance Commissioners recently encouraged all States to adopt a counseling program by passing a resolution encouraging development of counseling programs. Such programs are also strongly supported by consumer groups including Consumers Union and Families USA. Also, I am particularly pleased to note, the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, and the Health Insurance Association of America support this legislation.

We know there are many problems faced by seniors in obtaining adequate health care coverage. We know many of them face staggering increases in their Medigap premiums. And, we have been unsuccessful in bringing these costs down and in significantly improving health coverage. We can, however, do something about the confusion and vulnerability of older Americans by giving them an objective source of timely and accurate information. This legislation will do just that, I urge the rest of our colleagues to join us as cosponsors and in ensuring that this modest proposal is enacted into law.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of the bill be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2189

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Health Insurance Counseling, and Assistance Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. HEALTH INSURANCE INFORMATION, COUNSELING, AND ASSISTANCE GRANTS.

(a) GRANTS.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") shall make grants to States that submit applications to the Secretary that meet the requirements of this section for the purpose of providing information, counseling, and assistance relating to the procurement of adequate and appropriate health insurance coverage to individuals who are eligible to receive benefits under title XVIII of the Social Security Act (hereafter in this section referred to as "eligible individuals"). The Secretary shall prescribe regulations to establish a minimum level of funding for a grant issued under this section.

(b) GRANT APPLICATIONS.—(1) In submitting an application under this section, a State may consolidate and coordinate an application that consists of parts prepared by more than one agency or department of such State.

(2) As part of an application for a grant under this section, a State shall submit a plan for a State-wide health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program. Such program shall—

(A) establish or improve upon a health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program that provides counseling (including direct counseling) and assistance to eligible individuals in need of health insurance information, including—

(i) information that may assist individuals in obtaining benefits and filing claims under titles XVIII and XIX of the Social Security Act;

(ii) policy comparison information for medicare supplemental policies (as described in section 1882(g)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ss(g)(1)) and information that may assist individuals in filing claims under such medicare supplemental policies;

(iii) information regarding long-term care insurance; and

(iv) information regarding other types of health insurance benefits that the Secretary determines to be appropriate;

(B) in conjunction with the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program described in subparagraph (A), establish a system of referral to appropriate Federal or State departments or agencies for assistance with problems related to health insurance coverage (including legal problems), as determined by the Secretary;

(C) provide for a sufficient number of staff positions (including volunteer positions) necessary to provide the services of the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program;

(D) provide assurances that staff members (including volunteer staff members) of the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program have no conflict of interest in providing the services described in subparagraph (A);

(E) provide for the collection and dissemination of timely and accurate health care information to staff members (including volunteer staff members) of the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program and regular staff meetings and continuing education programs for the purpose of informing the staff of current developments in legal and economic issues relating to the provision of health insurance;

(F) provide for training programs for staff members (including volunteer staff members);

(G) provide for the coordination of the exchange of health insurance information between the staff of departments and agencies of the State government and the staff of the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program;

(H) make recommendations concerning consumer issues and complaints related to the provision of health care to agencies and departments of the State government and the Federal Government responsible for providing or regulating health insurance;

(I) establish an outreach program to provide the health insurance information and counseling described in subparagraph (A) and the assistance described in subparagraph (B) to eligible individuals; and

(J) demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, an ability to provide the counseling and assistance required under this subsection.

(c) SPECIAL GRANTS.—(1) A State that is conducting a health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program that is substantially similar to a program described in subsection (b)(2), shall, as a requirement for eligibility for a grant under this section, demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, that such State shall maintain the activities of such program at least at the level that such activities were conducted immediately preceding the date of the issuance of any grant during the period of time covered by such grant under this section and that such activities will continue to be maintained at such level.

(2) If the Secretary determines that the existing health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program is substantially similar to a program described in subsection (b)(2), the Secretary may waive some or all of the requirements described in subsection (b)(2), and issue a grant to the State for the purpose of increasing the number of services offered by the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program, experimenting with new methods of outreach in conducting such program, or expanding such program to geographic areas of the State not previously served by the program.

(d) CRITERIA FOR ISSUING GRANTS.—In issuing a grant under this section, the Secretary shall consider—

(1) the commitment of the State to carrying out the health insurance information, counseling, and assistance program described in subsection (b)(2), including the level of cooperation demonstrated—

(A) by the office of the chief insurance regulator of the State, or the equivalent State entity;

(B) other officials of the State responsible for overseeing insurance plans issued by nonprofit hospital and medical service associations; and

(C) departments and agencies of such State responsible for—

(i) administering funds under title XIX of the Social Security Act, and

(ii) administering funds appropriated under the Older Americans Act;

(2) the population of eligible individuals in such State as a percentage of the population of such State; and

(3) in order to ensure the needs of rural areas in such State, the relative costs and special problems associated with addressing the special problems of providing health care information, counseling, and assistance to the rural areas of such State.

(e) ANNUAL STATE REPORT.—A State that receives a grant under subsection (c) or (d) shall, not later than 180 days after receiving such grant, and annually thereafter, issue an annual report to the Secretary that includes information concerning—

(1) the number of individuals served by the State-wide health insurance information, counseling and assistance program of such State;

(2) an estimate of the amount of funds saved by the State, and by eligible individuals in the State, in the implementation of such program; and

(3) the problems that eligible individuals in such State encounter in procuring adequate and appropriate health care coverage.

(f) TRAINING CONFERENCES.—On at least an annual basis, the Secretary shall convene a conference for the purpose of providing training and information to staff members of State health insurance information, counseling, and assistance programs, as described in subsection (b)(2). Each State that receives a grant under this section shall, as a condition to receiving such grant, agree to send, on at least an annual basis, not less than two staff members (including one volunteer staff member) to a conference described in this subsection. Such State shall reimburse from funds received under a grant such staff members who attend such conference for travel expenses and per diem, at rates not exceeding the rates authorized for persons serving intermittently in the Government service under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code.

(g) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—Not later than 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, and annually thereafter, the Secretary shall issue a report to the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the Special Committee on Aging of the Senate, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives, and the Select Committee on Aging of the House of Representatives that—

(1) summarizes the allocation of funds authorized for grants under this section and the expenditure of such funds;

(2) summarizes the scope and content of training conferences convened under subsection (f);

(3) outlines the problems that eligible individuals encounter in procuring adequate and appropriate health care coverage; and

(4) makes recommendations that the Secretary determines to be appropriate to address the problems described in paragraph (3).

SEC. 3. NATIONAL RESOURCE CENTER.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall establish a national resource center for the purposes of—

(1) creating a clearinghouse for information relating to health insurance information, including information concerning health insurance information, counseling, and assistance programs in the United States and information concerning public and private health insurance programs;

(2) distributing the information described in paragraph (1) to the States; and

(3) providing to the States technical assistance and training in disseminating such information.

(b) INFORMATION EXCHANGE.—The Secretary may request such information from the head of any Federal department or agency as the Secretary may require for the purposes of carrying out this subsection. Each such department or agency is authorized, to the extent permitted by law, and subject to the provisions of section 552 of title 5, United States Code (commonly referred to as the Freedom of Information Act), to furnish such information in a form that is accurately compiled and within a reasonable period of time.

SEC. 4. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR GRANTS.—There are authorized to be appropriated, in equal parts from the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund and from the Federal Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund, $14,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, and such sums as are necessary for each succeeding fiscal year, to fund the grant programs described in section 2. Not more than 10 per cent of such funds may be expended for administrative costs of the Department of Health and Human Services related to such grant programs.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL RESOURCE CENTER.—There are authorized to be appropriated, in equal parts from the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund and from the Federal Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund, $1,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, and such sums as are necessary for each succeeding fiscal year, to fund the national resource center described in section 3.●

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to sponsor the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990 with my distinguished colleague and chairman of the Special Committee on Aging, Senator PRYOR. Through this legislation, States will be able to create educational and counseling programs for our aged citizens. This act is a positive step to help seniors navigate the treacherous shoals of supplemental health insurance options left in the wake of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act's repeal.

I have three longstanding concerns about Medigap insurance policies that this legislation addresses. First are reports of questionable tactics used by some insurance agents in marketing their policies to seniors. Seniors are pushed into purchasing multiple policies by high pressure salesmen with suitcases full of horror stories. Even those seniors with an employer-purchased supplemental policy often pay out-of-pocket for another because they are purposely misled about the benefit protection provided by their original policy. Unfortunately, in almost every instance, multiple policies result in duplicate coverage rather than additional protection.

Second, there seems to be widespread confusion among the elderly and their families when it comes to identifying just what services are covered—and to what extent—by Medicare. For example, a recent study by the American Association for Retired Persons shows that more than one-third of seniors believes that Medicare will cover long term nursing home expenses. The passage and now repeal of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act only exacerbates this confusion.

Finally, my concern has been with the cost of these Medigap policies and the added burden Medigap premiums place on the elderly individual struggling to make ends meet on a limited budget. Last year, about 25 million people, or 78 percent of the aged and disabled Medicare beneficiaries, each spent an average of $705 for so-called Medigap insurance policies. Premiums will jump 20 to 70 percent this year in response to catastrophic's repeal.

The Health Insurance and Counseling Act of 1990 addresses each of these concerns. By ensuring that Medicare beneficiaries have access to clear, accurate, and impartial information about the Medicare Program and supplementary health insurance, it will empower them with the type of information necessary to make wise decisions concerning their health insurance needs. And it will do so at a very low cost.

The act will provide limited grants to States, totaling $15 million annually, to establish or enhance existing counseling programs. These programs, which emphasize the use of volunteers, have been shown to be extremely popular and effective in several States already. Compared to an annual Medicare budget of almost $100 billion and an annual Medigap market of at least $12 billion, this is a very small price to pay for a program that is so desperately needed and wanted by Medicare beneficiaries and that has such excellent potential for a positive return on investment in the form of beneficiaries that are secure about their health insurance decisions.

I urge all of my colleagues in the Senate to join me in supporting this legislation.●

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today with Senators PRYOR, HEINZ, and others in introducing the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990.

As chairman of the Aging Committee, Senator PRYOR has shown his strong commitment to improving the lives of senior citizens across the Nation. I am proud to join him today in offering legislation that will give seniors more peace of mind when it comes to buying Medigap health insurance policies.

As the author of the original 1980 Medigap law. I am concerned about the status of these regulations and how they are implemented at the State level.

Mr. President, I remember how chaotic the Medigap market was before 1980. We knew that something had to be done to protect seniors from fraudulent marketing practices and ridiculously high premiums.

But since States regulate insurance, the Federal Government could not just step in and take over. So we worked out a structure that was largely advisory—that relied on States but had Federal backing.

We were able to craft a solid law that bridges the gap between what Medicare covers and what it does not cover. We also managed—not without a struggle—to develop a law that bridges the States' role in regulating insurance, and the need for Federal involvement.

That law, known as section 1882 or the Baucus amendment, has cut down on fraud. It has improved the market.

But the law can be beefed up. I believe it should be.

First, we need to make sure consumers are knowledgeable. The legislation we are introducing today will help to do that. It will give States the ability to establish programs, which emphasize the use of trained volunteers, to provide objective health insurance counseling to seniors. This will help seniors to be informed buyers of Medigap policies.

I am especially pleased that this bill contains provisions that recognize the difficulties involved in delivering counseling services in rural areas.

Second, we need to make sure the law is enforced. The Health Care Financing Administration hasn't done anything to enforce it. The Department of Justice hasn't done anything to enforce it. And the States aren't doing enough either.

Mr. President, I believe we need to make sure that the standards, especially on loss ratios, are upheld—that the standards are not just a paper tiger. I am working on another bill to be introduced shortly that will provide for tougher enforcement of the law that is now on the books. That bill, and the one we are offering today, will go a long way toward ensuring seniors that they are protected from medical costs they can't afford, and to ensure they get their money's worth when they buy Medigap policies.

Thank you, Mr. President.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I am proud to join Senator PRYOR today in introducing the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990. I commend Senator PRYOR for tackling one of the most compelling problems associated with the sale of Medigap—the lack of reliable, independent information that seniors can draw upon to help them make informed decisions about the purchase of Medigap insurance.

Sifting through the jumble of complex terms and widely varying benefit packages characteristic of Medigap policies can be a daunting task for anyone. It is especially difficult for individuals who are subject to high pressure marketing techniques that prey on seniors' understandable fear of financial devastation following a serious illness.

In most States, seniors have little access to solid consumer information about Medigap. A recent study by AARP reveals that a majority of State insurance officials believe they are hampered in conducting consumer education and protection activities because of funding and staffing constraints. While the Federal Government bemoans the fact that States are not getting information about Medigap insurance to consumers, we have obviously failed to provide States with the resources to do so.

Senator PRYOR's bill addresses this problem by providing States with grants to develop counseling programs that provide objective information to Medicare beneficiaries who want to purchase Medigap insurance. This is an important first step in ensuring that consumers get the best value for their money. Better informed consumers undoubtedly lead to a better functioning market.

Beyond this step, we must also be more vigilant about ensuring that the Medigap market is adequately regulated, and that current regulations are rigorously enforced. Evidence indicates that we are failing on both counts. The message from a recent Finance Committee hearing on Medigap price increases was clear: regulation of the Medigap market is uneven at best, and opportunities for fraud and abuse still abound.

Most people have heard the anecdotes about seniors with twelve duplicative Medigap policies. Statistics also paint a gloomy picture. For example, a recent AARP survey revealed that over one-half of Medicaid-elgible seniors have a supplemental health insurance policy, despite the fact that few, if any, of these Medicaid recipients need additional coverage. The General Accounting Office found that in 1987, 55 percent of the Medigap policies they reviewed had loss ratios below the 60 percent minimum standard for commercial insurance established under the Baucus amendments, which means that a majority of these policies return less than 60 cents on every dollar of premiums collected.

Congress needs to put an end to these abuses and make it possible for consumers to spend their hard-earned health insurance dollars more effectively. I look forward to working with Senator PRYOR and other Members of Congress who agree that we have a responsibility to address these problems and ensure that the Medigap market offers high value policies to consumers who have all the necessary information to evaluate various health insurance options.●

● Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I am honored to join my distinguished colleague and chairman, Senator PRYOR, in introducing the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act of 1990. He has once again indicated his deep commitment to defending the welfare of millions of senior citizens in this country.

Purchasing Medicare supplemental insurance is just not an easy thing to do. To make a sound decision, the consumer needs to understand Medicare itself—what is covered, what is not—and the budget driven Medicare reforms in recent years have made that a next to impossible task in and of itself.

While many States have attempted to make comprehensive policy comparison information available to consumers, there are several problems: First, in some States that information is not readily available to consumers until after the policy has been purchased; second, the sheer number of product lines sold in a State make it virtually impossible to study all options; third, the variation in policies make it very difficult to compare "apples to apples," if you will; and fourth, there is no real way for anyone other than an insurance actuary to calculate the value of certain "rider" and "phantom" benefits, like 365 days of home care. While that sounds like a benefit that almost any senior citizen would want, the reality is that it is generally conditioned on many other things happening. And the vast majority of senior citizens paying for it will not see a benefit in return. Given the number of senior citizens in my own State who purchase that benefit as a rider, I am not altogether convinced that they are given that information in a straightforward manner by salespeople.

Now I believe that most insurance salespeople are decent, honest human beings who have an interest in serving their customers well. There is a power to a one-on-one sales situation that can be used to the advantage or disadvantage of the customer, depending on the integrity of the agent. If the agent happens to be seen as welcomed company or as a friend to the consumer, well the odds are pretty good that the agent is going to make a sale. In the case of an honest, forthright agent, that is probably okay. But what of the situation where the motivation to make a commission, or sell another policy, is greater than the motivation to serve the consumer's best interest?

Then there ought to be some recourse for the consumer, some objective counsel with whom that senior citizen can discuss his or her health insurance needs—an opportunity to balance that one-on-one sales situation with one-on-one health insurance counseling.

With the support and encouragement of my good friend from Arkansas, I chaired a Special Committee on Aging hearing in Wisconsin in early December. I discovered that at least in Wisconsin, there were two critical safety nets for Medigap consumers.

At that time, several witnesses pointed to the Wisconsin model of benefit specialists as a progam that ought to be available nationwide. Troy Keeling, director of the Western Wisconsin Area Agency on Aging testified to the success of Wisconsin's benefit specialist program:

> In the 1980's the State of Wisconsin's Aging Network found a partial solution to eliminating the confusion, fear and insecurity caused by the complexities of paying for health care. Supported by the Coalition of Wisconsin Aging Groups and other advocacy groups, the Bureau on Aging of the State Department of Health and Social Services, created a benefit counseling service. At first funded only with Title III-B funds under the federal Older Americans Act, the State's Area Agencies used their funds to give legal backup to a county service to older persons. Over the past years, since 1983, the state legislature and administration have added significant funds to the program, allowing for a benefit specialist in all 72 counties, at least on a part-time basis.
> The well-trained corp of benefit specialists, known as tapecutters, work in the counties through the county aging units. Older consumers are guided through the maze of paperwork—assisted by one-on-one contact and through group training—and in understanding the complexities of the Medicare system. One of the most important services offered by this well-run, if under funded program, is in the area of medigap supplemental insurance. It would be hard to imagine Wisconsin going back to a haphazard system of information provision now that the elderly are provided with a service which helps explain a system and at the same time assists the consumer through his or her insurance problem. The benefit specialist is kept informed of changes in the state insurance laws and in federal Medicare. The service is given legal and benefit counseling backup by the State's Area Agencies on Aging.

In Wisconsin, the one-on-one counseling program is supplemented by a State-administered "toll-free Medigap hotline". Originally conceived and supported by the Center for Public Representation, the success and popularity of the service led to it's adoption by the State of Wisconsin. It is now administered by the Wisconsin Board on Aging and Long Term Care and is funded through revenues levied from the insurance industry. The Medigap Hotline is a source of objective, unbiased information and individual conseling about Medicare supplemental health insurance. The toll-free number is printed on policy comparison and insurance advice brochures produced by the Office of the Commissioner of Insurance. Thousands of Wisconsin residents become aware of the existence of area agency on aging benefit specialist services through an original contact with the hotline. At the same time, the hotline provides access to counseling information to those elderly who are just physically not able to make it to an area agency on aging office. The two services work hand in glove to provide universal access to objective health insurance counseling to hundreds of thousands of senior citizens.

The legislation put forth by Senator PRYOR today incorporates much of the good of the Wisconsin program. Creation of such a statewide system, building on the Area Agency on Aging network, would give to senior citizens in other States the access to health insurance counseling available to Wisconsin residents. The county benefit specialists and the aging advocates in Wisconsin are proud of their contribution to this proposal. And I am equally proud to join my colleagues in sponsoring this legislation today.

I am enclosing, for the interest of our colleagues, memoranda by two trained benefit specialists from the Dunn Country Office on Aging in Menomone, WI. I believe their statements most adequately describe the problems faced by senior citizens in purchasing Medigap insurance, and attest to the need for a national effort to train volunteers and to provide objective health insurance counseling to Older Americans.

I ask unanimous consent that this statement, along with the attached statements by Harold Halfin and Margaret Hagaman be inserted into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DUNN COUNTY OFFICE ON AGING,
Menomonie, WI, December 1, 1989.

Hon. Senator HERBERT KOHL,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR HONORABLE SENATOR KOHL: The following are a number of cases where the elderly have been subjected to either fear or the very nice guy syndrome by unethical health insurance agents who are determined to sell their policies even though the additional policy or a policy change is not necessary. In one case the same agent in a year called on this person to convince her that the previous policy is not as good as the policy he now has for sale. Please note the agent receives up to 70 percent of the first year's premium and one can see why the agent wants to sell a replacement policy.

In another case, a lady I like to think of as a pillar of the community, was sold five policies. She needed one policy to meet her needs. Or, the lady who had an agent in her home for six hours (wouldn't leave) trying to sell her a replacement policy.

Names are not listed because of confidentiality. Because of the ages of the people in the cases listed and their frailty prevents them from being at the Senate hearing today.

The cases are:

Case #1: A widow of 92 years old, just above the medical assistance income level, thought she was buying coverage for nursing homes. After paying for the policy she was given the booklet explaining coverage. The policy was a Medicare Supplement.

Case #2: An 83-year-old widow on PartnerCare has had a 20 percent Medicare Supplement for many years costing $584.00 per year. An agent from 200 miles away convinces her to buy a policy for $900.000 that covers usual and customary charges which is not necessary in her situation.

Case #3: A woman told the agent of preexisting condition. However the agent did not accurately complete the form. Later when a claim was filed there was no coverage because of these preexisting conditions. The company canceled the policy.

Case #4: A 79-year-old widow was afraid to drop insurance because of serious heart problems. Three different agents are involved switching her to four different individual policies during a four-year period. All during this time she continues to keep a Medicare Supplement through AARP, two cancer policies with different companies and an accident policy. She spends over $1,700.00 per year for health insurance policies (not including Medicare) but has a medical assistance medically needy spend down of $735.00 a year.

Case #5: A couple is dropped from their group health insurance when she turns 65. She is not insurable under any Medigap individual policy without a waiting period because she is in the hospital and seriously ill.

Case #6: An 83-year-old single woman who has shown signs of serious confusion for several years has five Medicare Supplements and a nursing home policy. The last agent to sell a policy helps to cancel all previous policies. This woman has Social Security Income of only $318.00 per month. A relative is power of attorney now that he is in a nursing home after a fall.

Case #7: A woman is told by an agent that he can sell her a policy that is a "twin" to her present Medicare Supplement but at half the price! She buys the policy but finds out later after talking with the County Benefit Specialist that it isn't even a Medicare Supplement. The policy was a surgical/medical policy.

Case #8: A 76-year-old widow with no family support had shown serious signs of dementia. Her bank notified the County Benefit Specialist because all her checks were being written to insurance companies. In the previous eight years she had been sold nine Medicare Supplements (four of the policies were still in force), one daily indemnity, five life insurance) and two cancer policies. Several agents switched policies regularly or sold her one of each kind of policy. This woman was unable to say no to agents. Three years later she still has no protection help. She has no family willing to intervene and the court system is saying she is still competent enough to make her own decisions.

Case #9: Agent sells a couple a Medicare Supplement costing over $2,600.00 for both. They already have two other Medicare Supplements and a cancer policy. They do not understand Medicare or supplemental insurance.

Case #10: Three widows in their 80's have been on the high option group plan with the federal government at $187.00 per month. The low option for $38.00 per month has never been explained to them and they have been afraid to change.

These are just a few examples of cases showing the confusion and problems older people are having with Medicare Supplements. There are many others who never come to the attention of the County Benefit Specialist or volunteers assisting as Medicare Helpers What is happening to them?

The Wisconsin proposed rule change would be a move in the right direction but more must be done to protect older people and help them understand the complicated health care system.

Sincerely,

MARGARET HAGAMAN,
Dunn County Benefit Specialist.

DUNN COUNTY OFFICE ON AGING,
Menomonie, WI.

MEMORANDUM

To: Honorable Herbert Kohl, U.S. Senator, Hart Senate Office Bldg.,
From: Harold Halfin, Volunteer, Dunn County Office on Aging.
Date: December 7, 1989.
Subject: Testimony on Medigap Supplemental Insurance Policies.

I am Harold Halfin, a volunteer from the Dunn County Office on Aging, who has had approximately 25 hours of training as a Medicare Helper. In addition I have had six hours of training on Medigap policies from the Office of the Insurance Commissioner. I also enroll people who qualify for the PartnerCare program.

I would like to speak from the point of view of consumer protection for, in the majority of cases, the female elderly. This is not to say that the male elderly does not have a problem. In rural Western Central Wisconsin the majority of people calling for help are the vulnerable female elderly whose husband in many cases took care of the books and paid the bills and when he died she did not have any inkling of what to do or how to do it. These female elderly may or may not be low income elderly. Some are just above medical assistance income while some have sufficient funds. Some are on PartnerCare. Some have a visual problem while some have difficulty reading and understanding the written word. Some are very lonely and some have no family in the immediate area.

With the above background I would like to discuss three different cases where the elderly have been subjected to unethical insurance agents. These agents are determined to sell their policies even though the additional policy or a policy change is not necessary. They (the agents) "butter-up" these female elderly and they (the elderly) buy another policy or a replacement policy. Sometimes, in taking the application the agent fills out the application not listing the preexisting conditions and when it is time to collect the insurance company will not pay because they say it is a fraudulent application.

Case #1: A widow, 92 years old, whose income is just above the medical assistance level but eligible for PartnerCare thought she was buying insurance coverage for a nursing home. She currently has a comprehensive Medigap policy with an HMO. An insurance agent called on her and found she was concerned about nursing home coverage and proceeded to tell her he had the policy she needed. She paid him $861.00 for another policy which was nothing more than a Medigap policy with coverage considerably less then her HMO. The agent would have collected 60 percent or $516.60 for his day's work.

Here is a case where the agent was so nice and told the lady that she needed help and he was there to help her using what I call the "nice guy syndrome" and instilling fear in her about the need for nursing home coverage. After three weeks she wondered if she had done the right thing and called the Office on Aging. We wrote the company about the policy; we also wrote the Complaint Department of the Commissioner of Insurance about this unethical practice. This agent did not follow correct procedure because all agents are to provide an OCI brochure on Medigap policies prior to any sale. This he did after the sale. Also the signature of the agent was illegible and no address was given. As yet she does not have her money back.

Case #2: A 76 year old widow who shows serious signs of dementia has no family support and loves to have visitors. She also is unable to say no to insurance agents. Her banker asked the country benefit specialist to investigate when this woman was over drawing her accounts due to a number of large checks written to insurance companies. During a two year period, this woman had bought 15 different insurance policies. Two other additional Medicare Supplements had recently lapsed. The policies included seven Medicare Supplements, one daily indemnity, five life insurance and two cancer policies.

Upon investigating it was obvious that this woman had no understanding of insurance. She didn't even know the difference between life insurance and a Medicare Supplement.

Several agents switched her regularly every year to either a new company or a new policy for her Medicare Supplement. Other agents sold her one of each kind of policy.

With the assistance of the benefit specialist and the Office of the Insurance Commissioner some money was recovered however most of the policies lapsed or were canceled.

Three years later this vulnerable woman still has little protection from unethical agents. Her banker, neighbors and social worker try to check on her regularly. However she is unwilling to ask for help, has no family and the court system is unwilling to intervene saying she is still competent to make her own decision.

Case #3: This involves a couple who purchased a Supplemental policy and the insurance agent completed the application incorrectly on preexisting conditions. There are questions on the application that ask about the possibility of preexisting conditions. These questions were, according to the couple, answered honestly detailing the preexisting conditions of the wife. The agent answered "yes" to the question whether she had been advised by a physician . . . and the agent proceeded to check "no" on medical history of the wife even though she told the agent of her medical history. The wife became ill and later filed a claim which was refused on the basis of a preexisting condition not shown on the application. This couple had to pay or is paying out of their pockets for this tragic mistake which should not have happened.

What is needed is a rule or legislation that requires agents to be more responsible for their actions. Possibly a form requiring the agent to indicate whether the policy he/she is trying to sell is a new policy, an additional policy or a replacement policy. The agent should indicate why the different policy is better and detail exactly what is covered on a separate sheet of paper. The agent should sign the form and come back at a later time to get the person's signature and payment. This form would become part of the policy and it would also be sent to the Office of the Commissioner of Insurance. Such a rule has been proposed by the Commissioner of Insurance.

One last note, the people I contact are only a small portion of those needing assistance with Medigap insurance issues.

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague Senator PRYOR in cosponsoring the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act.

Last fall, the Senate voted to repeal the Catastrophic Coverage Act. It did so in response to the expressions of outrage and anger from thousands of older Americans about an issue close to their hearts and financial security: Health insurance.

Most older Americans understand that Medicare does not provide complete coverage. The difference between what is covered and the total bill—the Medigap—worries these individuals. They worry that a single illness could erode their life savings, leaving them destitute or dependent on the help of their children and relatives.

Because the elderly are concerned about their financial—as well as physical—health, many are easily persuaded that additional insurance policies will protect them from disaster. In fact, many of the policies do not offer the kind of protection claimed by the salespeople. These policies duplicate Medicare coverage and even the policy the purchaser already owns. By changing an insignificant word or two, and by employing high-pressure sales tactics, the insurance agent plays on the prospective buyer's fears. The sale is made and the buyer has thrown money down the drain.

Recently a constituent wrote to me, asking for advice on choosing an insurance policy. Fortunately, the Maine Bureau of Insurance Consumer Division offers Maine citizens this counseling. The consumer division sends representatives to community centers and clubs for retirees. These representatives will even visit the home to review the individual's current coverage, financial obligations, and insurance needs. I was able to put this man in touch with those who could offer him—free of charge—exactly the information he sought.

But I was reminded that not every State offers this service and elderly individuals nationwide need the same kind of advice to avoid spending their limited incomes on policies which offer them no additional protection. In Maine, competent advice is only a phone call away. In other States, the elderly have no place to turn.

The bill introduced today, the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act, is designed to provide older Americans with advice about insurance coverage. By establishing a national resource center and, more importantly, by allocating funds to the States to offer these services—or to improve existing programs—this bill would offer the elderly guidance in the bewildering world of insurance coverage.

Although there is a cost—$15 million—90 percent of these funds would go directly to the States in grants. Moreover, the Department of Health and Human Services would prepare an annual report which would describe the problems the elderly are facing and assess the effectiveness of the State counseling programs. This legislation would help define the scope of this problem and offer solutions to it. The cost in Federal funding is more than outweighed by the benefits of giving the elderly the information to make intelligent choices about their health insurance coverage.

I encourage my colleagues to protect our older Americans by supporting the Health Insurance Counseling and Assistance Act.●

By Mr. DIXON:

S. 2190. A bill to correct the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States as it applies to parts of ionization smoke detectors; to the Committee on Finance.

TARIFF TREATMENT OF PARTS OF IONIZATION SMOKE DETECTORS

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to change the tariff classification on parts of ionization smoke detectors. I believe that the issue presented by this bill needs to be addressed. I understand that the Finance Committee is considering putting together an omnibus tariff bill; I strongly believe this provision should be included in that measure.

The bill is simple and noncontroversial. It merely corrects an inequity created by the new harmonized tariff schedule. Until recently, ionization smoke detectors and ionization smoke detector components were classified at the same rate of duty. The new harmonized tariff schedule, however, neglected to include a separate provision for smoke detector components. The result is that now ionization smoke detector components are placed in a classification that carries a higher rate of duty.

This oversight results in a significant handicap for American producers of ionization smoke detectors. If a U.S. firm wants to do the bulk of the work here in the United States, using some imported parts, they have to pay more duty on those parts than for the duty on fully assembled ionization smoke detectors.

This legislation simply maintains what had been the status quo to provide an opportunity to pursue administrative relief through the U.S. Trade Representative and the Department of Commerce.

Mr. President, this is a meritorious bill, and I look forward to working with my colleagues to ensure its prompt enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be included at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2190

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PARTS OF IONIZATION SMOKE DETECTORS.

Chapter 90 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States is amended by inserting in numerical sequence the following new subheading with the article description having the same degree of indentation as the article description in subheading 9022.90.60:

"9022.90.70	Of smoke detectors, ionization type	2.7%	Free (A, B, E, IL) 2.1% (CA) 35%".

SEC. 2. STAGING OF RATES.

Any staged rage reduction of a rate of duty set forth in subheading 9022.29.40 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States that was proclaimed by the President before the date of enactment of this Act and that takes effect after such date of enactment shall also apply to the corresponding rate of duty set forth in subheading 9022.90.70 (as added by section 1).

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amendment made by section 1 shall apply with respect to goods entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) RELIQUIDATION.—Notwithstanding section 514 of the Tariff Act of 1930 or any other provision of law, upon a request filed with the appropriate customs officer before the 90th day after the date of the enactment of this Act, any entry, or withdrawal from warehouse for consumption, of an article described in subheading 9022.90.70 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States (as added by section 1) that was made—

(1) after December 31, 1988; and

(2) on or before the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this Act; shall be liquidated or reliquidated as though such entry occurred on the day after such 15th day.●

By Mr. JOHNSTON (for himself and Mr. WIRTH):

S. 2191. A bill to amend part 3, title V, of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

FEDERAL ENERGY MANAGEMENT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources I have a concern with certain provisions of the Clean Air Act amendments currently under discussion because I believe that these provisions are within the jurisdiction of the Energy Committee.

More specifically, section 403 of S. 1630, as reported, would alter current Federal policy regarding the use of energy conservation and renewable energy resources in Federal facilities. The Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has jurisdiction over energy conservation and renewable energy issues. In fact, comprehensive legislation regarding this issue was considered by the committee and enacted in 1978 as part 3, title V, of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act [NECPA] (42 U.S.C. 8253). This law was reviewed and amended by the committee just 15 months ago pursuant to the Federal Energy Management Improvement Act of 1988, Public Law 100-615. I strongly believe that any changes to Federal policy regarding energy conservation and renewable energy should be made through the amendment of NECPA, and after consideration by the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

Accordingly, I am introducing the Federal Energy Management Amendments of 1990. This legislation includes the ideas which have come to my attention regarding this issue, and while I do not endorse each of these ideas at this time, I believe that they are worthy of consideration by the committee. I look forward to working with the Department of Energy and with other Senators who have an interest in energy conservation and renewable energy sources.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2191

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Federal Energy Management Amendments of 1990".

SEC. 2. Part 3 of title V of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (NECPA) (42 U.S.C. 8251 et seq.), as amended, is further amended as follows:

(a) In section 541:

(1) insert the following new finding and renumber accordingly:

"(4) there are also significant opportunities in the Federal Government to increase the use of renewable and alternative clean energy sources;"; and

(2) in the renumbered finding "(6)", insert the following after the words "energy efficiency": "and the use of renewable and alternative clean energy sources";

(b) in section 542 insert ", and the use of renewable and alternative clean energy sources," after the words "use of energy";

(c) in section 543: (1) Strike subsection (a) and insert the following new text in lieu thereof:

"(a) ENERGY MANAGEMENT REQUIREMENT FOR FEDERAL BUILDINGS.—(1) Not later than January 1, 2000, each Federal agency shall, to the maximum extent practicable, install all energy conservation measures, and all renewable and alternative clean energy measures, with payback periods of less than ten years as calculated using the methods and procedures developed pursuant to section 544. Each Federal agency shall have substantially completed at least 25 percent of these projects by January 1, 1995. If any agency has been unable to meet this objective, such agency shall spend no funds for the construction or acquisition of a building except to meet the requirements of this section. If any agency has not met the requirements of this section for the year 2000, then such agency shall spend no funds for the construction or acquisition of a building except to meet the requirements of this section. The Secretary may waive the requirements of this section if the Secretary finds that an agency is taking all practicable steps to meet the requirement and that the sanctions of this section will pose an unacceptable burden upon the agency.

"(2) An agency may exclude from the requirements of paragraph (1) any building, and the associated energy consumption and gross square footage, if the head of such agency finds that compliance with the requirements of paragraph (1) would be impractical. A finding of impracticability shall be based on the type and amount of energy consumed, the technical feasibility of making the desired changes, and the unique character of many facilities operated by the Departments of Defense and Energy. Each agency shall identify and list in each report made under section 548 the buildings designated by it for such exclusion. The Secretary of Energy may reverse a finding of impracticability, in which case, the agency shall comply with the requirements of paragraph (1). This section shall not apply to an agency's facilities which are associated with the generation and transmission of electric energy, nor to the uranium enrichment facilities operated by the Department of Energy.";

(2) In subsection (b):

(A) after the words "subsection (a)," insert the following:

"The Secretary of Energy shall consult with the Secretary of Defense and the Administrators of the Environmental Protection Agency and the General Services Administration in developing guidelines for the implementation of this part, and"

(B) strike the phrase "Federal Energy Management Improvement Act of 1988" in paragraph (1) and insert in lieu thereof "Federal Energy Management Amendments of 1990, and submit to the Secretary of Energy";

(C) after the words "high priority projects;" insert the following: "and such plan shall include steps to take maximum advantage of contracts authorized by 42 U.S.C. 8287 et seq., financial incentives and other services provided by utilities for efficiency investment and other forms of financing to reduce the direct costs to the Government."

(D) at the end of paragraph (2) strike the semicolon and insert the following: ", and update such surveys periodically, but not less than every three years;"

(E) replace paragraph (3) with the following new paragraph:

"(3) using such surveys, determine the cost and payback period of energy conservation and renewable and alternative clean energy measures likely to achieve the goals of this section;"; and

(F) insert a new paragraph (4) as follows, and renumber paragraph (4) as "(5)".

"(4) install those energy conservation and alternative clean energy measures which will attain the requirements of this section in a cost effective manner and";

(d) in section 544:

(1) strike "National Bureau of Standards," in subsection (a) and insert in lieu thereof "National Institute of Standards and Technology, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency,";

(2) strike "; and" at the end of paragraph (a)(1) and insert in lieu thereof the following: ". These methods shall also incorporate the value of environmental externalities as determined by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, who shall determine such value within 18 months of enactment of this legislation."; and

(3) strike all after the word "agency", in paragraph (b)(2) and insert in lieu thereof: "no agency shall, after January 1, 1994, enter into or renew a lease for space exceeding thirty-five thousand square feet in new or renovated buildings where the space exceeds 70 percent of the building's leasable space unless that building has installed all energy conservation, efficiency and renewable energy improvements with paybacks of less than ten years based on the methods established under this section or the landlord has begun to make such investments and will complete installation by January 1, 2000. Any agency unable to comply with this section shall, in a report to the Secretary, demonstrate that it has used its best efforts to persuade the lessor to install these improvements and that no reasonable alternatives for leased space are available.

(e) in section 545, strike the word "measures." and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and renewable and alternative clean energy measures as needed to meet the goals established in section 543.";

(f) in section 546, strike the text of subsection "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Implementation.—To facilitate the financing of energy conservation, and renewable and alternative clean energy measures, each Federal agency shall promote the use of contracts authorized by title VIII of this Act. Each agency shall procure such contracts, notwithstanding any other procurement requirements, by utilizing the following procedures:

(1) By January 1, 1991, each Federal agency shall encourage firms engaged in providing energy services to submit annually a statement of qualifications, including financial and performance information. Each agency shall, by June 1, 1991 and annually thereafter, designate and list, from these submissions, those firms that are presumptively qualified to provide energy services. Such qualifications shall be based upon criteria published by each agency. The Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of Defense and the Administrators of the Environmental Protection Agency and the General Services Administration, may issue a form for use by the agencies to obtain the necessary information and provide for other means to facilitate the qualification process.

(2) The agency shall select three firms from the qualifying list, or from formal proposals supplied by other firms, to conduct discussions with same concerning each proposed agency project undertaken pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 8287. The selection shall be based upon criteria established and published by each agency. The agency may request a technical and price proposal from the three firms.

(3) The agency shall select from the three firms the best qualified firm to provide energy services at contractual arrangement that the agency determines is fair and reasonable to the government, taking into account the estimated value and cost of the services to be rendered, and the scope and nature of the project. The agency is authorized to enter into a contract with this firm. In the event that the agency cannot execute a satisfactory contract with this firm, the agency shall then proceed to negotiate a contract with one of the remaining firms. If the agency is unable to execute a contract with the second firm, the agency may negotiate with the remaining firm, or select another firm from the qualified list on file. The agency is not obligated to enter into a contract if it determines it is undesirable to do so.

(4) each Federal agency shall endeavor to do at least three contracts in 1991 and six contracts in 1992 employing this procedure, and then, as required in the plan to be submitted pursuant to section 543(b), shall use these contracts to the maximum extent practicable. In the plans submitted pursuant to section 543(b), the agencies shall report on their experience with these contracts in 1991 and 1992.

(g) in section 548:

(1) strike the word "each" in subsection (a) and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In addition to the plan required to be submitted to the Secretary pursuant to Section 543(b)(1), each"; and

(2) insert the phrase "by April 2 of each year," after the word "annually" in subsection (b);

(3) insert the words "by each agency", after the words "under this part" in subsection (b)(1); and

(h) in section 549:

(1) insert after the word "renewable" the phrase "and alternative clean" in subsections (4) and (8); and

(2) strike the word "geothermal energy" and insert "geothermal energy, fuel cells" in lieu thereof.●

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 2192. A bill relating to the tariff treatment of certain paper products and synthetic detergents; to the Committee on Finance.

RELATING TO TARIFF TREATMENT OF CERTAIN PAPER PRODUCTS AND SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill which would correct an inequitable situation affecting a California company which imports industrial tissue products and detergents. When the United States changed to the Harmonized System on January 1, 1989, some of the products imported by this company were reclassified and subjected to a higher tariff rate. When the International Trade Commission considered conversions to the Harmonized System, it was not aware of any significant trade in these particular product areas and felt that the international standard could be adopted without adversely affecting any U.S. importers. Legislation is needed to correct this oversight.

The bill I am introducing today is similar to legislation which was introduced in the House by Congressman STARK. His bill, H.R. 2100, was reviewed in hearings held by the Ways and Means' Subcommittee on Trade. At that time, the administration and two domestic companies raised concerns about the scope of H.R. 2100. This legislation contains changes which will address these objections.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2192

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PAPER PRODUCTS.

Chapter 48 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States is amended by striking out subheadings 4818.10.00 and 4818.20.00 and inserting the following new subheadings with the article descriptions having the same degree of indentation as the article description in subheading 4818.40.20:

	"Toilet paper:
4818.10.05	Of cellulose wadding or webs of cellulose fibers, in rolls of a width exceeding 15cm or in rectangular (including square) sheets with one side exceeding 36cm and the other side exceeding 15cm in unfolded state	3.5%	Free (A*, E, IL)	35%
4818.10.05	Other	5.3%	Free (A*, E, IL) 4.2% (CA)	35%
	Handkerchiefs, cleansing or facial tissues or towels

4818.20.05	Of cellulose wadding or webs of cellulose fibers, in rolls of a width exceeding 15cm or in rectangular (including square) sheets with one side exceeding 36cm and the other side exceeding 15cm in unfolded state	3.5%	Free (A*, E, IL)	35%
4818.20.15	Other	5.3%	Free (A*, E, IL) 4.2% (CA)	35%".

SEC. 2. SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS.

Chapter 34 of such Schedule is amended by striking out subheading 3402.90.10 and inserting the following new subheading with the article descriptions having the same degree of indentation as the article description in subheading 3402.90.30:

	"Synthetic detergents:
3402.90.15	Containing synthetic aromatic compounds, or containing non-aromatic compounds obtained, derived, or manufactured in whole or in part from synthetic aromatic compounds.	6.6%	Free (A, E, IL) 3% (CA).	15.4c/kg+53.5%
3402.90.20	Other	Free		25%".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by sections 1 and 2 of this Act apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this Act.

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. HATCH):

S. 2193. A bill to amend title 35, United States Code, to clarify that States, instrumentalities of States, and officers and employees of States acting in their official capacity, are subject to suit in Federal court by any person for infringement of patents, and that all the remedies can be obtained in such suit that can be obtained in a suit against a private entity; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PATENT REMEDY CLARIFICATION ACT

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill with my colleagues Senators SIMON and HATCH to clarify Congress' intent that States not be immune from patent infringement suits under the Patent Code. As you may remember, my two colleagues and I introduced similar legislation last session clarifying Congress' intent that States be subject to suit under the Copyright Act of 1976. That bill, S. 497, was necessitated by circuit court opinions holding that States are immune from prosecution for infringement of copyright material.

Until recently, the general understanding in this country was that States and their instrumentalities were subject to suit for patent infringement to the same extent as a private entity. However, in Chew versus California, a Federal district court dismissed an inventor's suit against the State of California for patent infringement when California asserted sovereign immunity under the 11th amendment as a defense. The Federal circuit affirmed this decision earlier this year, noting that the Patent Code lacked the specificity in language of congressional intent that is necessary to abrogate the 11th amendment immunity.

As with the circuit court cases in which States successfully asserted the eleventh amendment as a defense for copyright infringement, the Chew decision requires congressional action to restore patent protection. This case portends an ominous future for patent holders of inventions that are beneficial to States. The Chew case provides a prime example of a patent beneficial to a State's operations; the inventor had obtained a patent on a process to test exhaust fumes from automobiles. As State universities enter the race to commercialize scientific discoveries, the cases in which the sovereign immunity defense is asserted will grow in number.

As I stated when I introduced the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act, permitting States to infringe copyrights with impunity leads to the anomalous result of State universities being permitted to infringe private universities' copyrights but not vice-versa. Thus, UCLA can sue USC for copyright and patent infringement, but USC cannot sue UCLA. There are, of course, other detrimental effects for private universities from the assertion of the sovereign immunity defense. As State and private universities vie for research projects sponsored by industries, the sovereign immunity defense will create an uneven playing field. A private company looking to do research in a competitive area will consider a state university more favorably as a research partner since that institute would be immune from competitors' infringement suits.0

There exists in this country, and rightfully so, tremendous concern about our global competitive position. It therefore appears to me to be contrary to our best interests to limit protection for our inventors from infringement. Moreover, without the restoration of patent protection which this bill would provide, we also greatly hamper U.S. trade negotiators' attempts to improve international protection of intellectual property rights. Many nations have patent laws that include nonvoluntary licensing and governmental-use provisions. These provisions are merely devices for legal expropriation. How can our negotiators continue to urge foreign governments to reform these laws when we allow our State governments to freely infringe patents? They cannot sustain such a position with the end result that American inventors will have to continue to venture into international markets unprotected.

The purpose behind the constitutional provision that sets out Congress' patent and copyright authority is to encourage innovation. To fulfill that goal, the patent and copyright laws of this country must provide for an inventor to recoup his/her investment. It should not matter whether the defendant in a patent infringement suit is a State or a private entity. In either instance, the Patent Code must effectively protect the constitutionally mandated incentive to invent.

Mr. President, this bill will do nothing more than what Congress already intended to do when it passed the Patent Code. Congress never intended for the rights of patent owners to be dependent upon the identity of the infringer. With this bill Congress is merely fulfilling the Supreme Court's new requirement for abrogating 11th amendment immunity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2193

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Patent Remedy Clarification Act".

SEC. 2. LIABILITY OF STATES, INSTRUMENTALITIES OF STATES, AND STATE OFFICIALS FOR INFRINGEMENT OF PATENTS.

(a) LIABILITY AND REMEDIES.—(1) Section 271 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(h) As used in this section, the term 'whoever' includes any State, any instrumentality of a State, and any officer or employee of a State or instrumentality of a State acting in his or her official capacity. Any State, and any such instrumentality, officer, or employee, shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.".

(2) Chapter 29 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 296. Liability of States, instrumentalities of States, and State officials for infringement of patents.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Any State, any instrumentality of a State, and any officer or employee of a State or instrumentality of a State acting in his or her official capacity, shall not be immune, under the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States or under any other doctrine of sovereign immunity, from suit in Federal court by any person, including any governmental or nongovernmental entity, for infringement of a patent under section 271, or for any other violation under this title.

"(b) REMEDIES.—In a suit described in subsection (a) for a violation described in that subsection, remedies (including remedies both at law and in equity) are available for the violation to the same extent as such remedies are available for such a violation in a suit against any private entity. Such remedies include damages, interest, costs, and treble damages under section 284, attorney fees under section 285, and the additional remedy for infringement of design patents under section 289.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 29 of title 35, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"Sec. 296. Liability of States, instrumentalities of States, and State officials for infringement of patents.".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall take effect with respect to violations that occur on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

LEGISLATION PERTAINING TO INDIAN TREATY RIGHTS

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today with my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, Senator KOHL, to introduce three pieces of legislation pertaining to Indian treaty rights.

For years now, northern Wisconsin has been bitterly divided because of Federal court interpretations of the treaties the United States made with the Chippewa nation in the 1800's.

On July 29, 1837, and again on October 4, 1842, the United States agreed to treaties with the Lake Superior Chippewa Indians. These treaties guaranteed certain usufructuary, or land use, rights to the Chippewa on the territory that they ceded to the non-Indian population. Today that territory covers most of northern Wisconsin. In 1974, the Lac Courte Oreille Band of the Chippewa Tribe took the State of Wisconsin to court in an effort to determine the limits of their usufructuary rights. The State was named party to the lawsuit, as opposed to the Federal Government, because it has been the States which have administered the wildlife and natural resource regulations in their jurisdictions.

The initial decision, known as the Voigt decision, was made in 1983. The Voigt decision reaffirmed that the tribes had rights to hunt and fish on non-tribal lands. The Voigt decision also called for further clarification through the courts regarding the scope of those rights. In 1987 and again in 1989, the U.S. district court ruled on their interpretation of the treaties. The Doyle decision, handed down in 1987, determined that the natural resources should be available to the Chippewa and the harvest should be sufficient to provide a "moderate standard of living." The Crabb decision affecting Indian fishing rights, handed down in March of last year, gave the Chippewa the right to self-regulate their harvest, and because it did not set a specific tribal harvest allocation limit, the tribe is currrently able to harvest up to 100 percent of the safe harvest level on any lake in the ceded territory.

Northern Wisconsin erupted in response to the Crabb decision. Thousands of non-Indians protested, and Indian attempts to exercise their constitutional rights last year were marred by violence, threats of violence, verbal abuse, and racist acts. Local law enforcement agencies had to utilize extraordinary measures to maintain the peace, and incurred huge costs in doing so.

Mr. President, the State of Wisconsin cannot afford, either humanely or financially, a repeat of last year's events. Interested parties on all sides have been working to foster a spirit of reconciliation, accommodation, and compromise. Congress must support this effort.

Last year, the Wisconsin congressional delegation introduced legislation that would prohibit the tribe from taking more than 10 percent of the safe harvest level of sport fish from any lake in the ceded territory. We urged Congress and the administration to promptly consider and pass this legislation. But there has been no action.

The administration and the congressional committees with jurisdiction over Indian policy strongly oppose any unilateral Federal changes to the treaties. They refuse to act on our legislation or on any other proposal which would amend or modify the treaties, unless such changes have first been agreed to at the local level.

Thus, while we cannot give up hope on this legislation, it is clear that local initiatives must be our priority. Wisconsin must make an effort to follow the lead of other States which have reached agreements at the State level—agreements that have ultimately been approved by Congress. We applaud recent initiatives in Wisconsin designed to achieve meaningful change. State, local, and tribal officials have been working to maintain law and order, defuse the tension, protect the natural resources, and promote a greater sense of understanding between cultures. Congress should help in this regard.

The first bill we have introduced is the Wisconsin Law Enforcement Reimbursement Act. This legislation would repay the State of Wisconsin the $2.5 million in extraordinary law enforcement costs incurred while protecting Federal treaty rights in 1988 and 1989.

The second bill is the Indian Treaty Law Enforcement Assistance Act. This proposal would establish a new Federal framework, within the Department of Justice, for reimbursing treaty-related law enforcement costs. Specifically, any State which must greatly increase law enforcement funds in order to protect the exercise of Federal treaty rights would be eligible for reimbursement from the Federal Government. This is only fair. If Federal law is causing these extraordinary expenses, the Federal Government should help pay for them. This legislation would allow States which petition the Attorney General for reimbursement to receive up to 90 percent of their treaty-related expenses.

The final bill we are introducing today is the Indian Treaty Conflict Resolution Act. This legislation would establish a new office within the Department of Justice to provide neutral mediation and conflict resolution assistance in local disputes over treaty rights. Hopefully a neutral Federal party can provide the spark needed to get negotiations back on track in States like Wisconsin. With this legislation, we can help put an end to misinformation and mistrust, and focus on ways the Federal Government can help local groups resolve their differences.

These three bills, in conjunction, would ensure law and order in States like Wisconsin and provide a framework for resolving treaty disputes at the local level.

I urge my colleagues to look favorably and act promptly upon these important bills.●

● Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I rise today with my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin, Senator KASTEN, to introduce three bills which address the conflict which has developed in Wisconsin surrounding treaty rights retained by the Chippewa tribes in Federal treaties and affirmed by the Federal courts. I am hopeful that these bills will help the State and the tribes to resolve this conflict in a mutually acceptable manner.

The first bill, the Wisconsin Law Enforcement Reimbursement Act, would reimburse the State of Wisconsin $2.5 million for a portion of the extraordinary law enforcement costs incurred in peacekeeping efforts during the 1988 and 1989 Indian spearing seasons.

The second bill, the Indian Treaty Law Enforcement Assistance Act, would establish a general fund through which any State can apply for reimbursement of excessive law enforcement costs related to the protection of Indian treaty rights. This new system would be administered by the Department of Justice.

The third bill, the Indian Treaty Conflict Resoluton Act, would establish a new office within the Department of Justice to provide assistance to State, local, and tribal entities who are attempting to resolve treaty rights disputes. This office would be available to provide neutral mediation and conflict resolution assistance to the State and the tribes, at their request.

Congress and successive administrations have made it very clear that treaties with Indian tribes will no longer be broken. Indeed, it is clear that despite the immediate problems any of us may have with a given treaty, those "supreme laws of the land" cannot even be modified without the consent of all affected parties. Given that reality, it is clear that the treaty rights conflict in Wisconsin will not be resolved unless the State and the tribes sit down together and negotiate a mutually acceptable agreement. To the extent that the Federal Government can help that negotiating process along by providing neutral mediation services, the third bill will promote a speedier resolution to the conflict in Wisconsin.

The first two bills, which provide reimbursement to the State of Wisconsin and other States for excessive law enforcement costs related to treaty enforcement, implicitly recognize that Federal treaties are straining State and local law enforcement budgets. I am hopeful that Congress and the administration will agree to support these bills as a measure of good faith to the States who are attempting to enforce court-affirmed treaty rights, and to the tribes who are attempting to exercise their legal and traditional rights.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support these bills and give them prompt approval. I believe passage of these bills will demonstrate the Federal Government's desire to play a useful role in resolving this very serious conflict in Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the three bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2194

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the Wisconsin Law Enforcement Reimbursement Act.

THE WISCONSIN LAW ENFORCEMENT REIMBURSEMENT ACT

SECTION 2. (a) PAYMENTS TO THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.—The Attorney General shall pay, subject to subsection (b), such sums as are appropriated under section 3 to the State of Wisconsin as reimbursement for extraordinary law enforcement costs incurred by State and local law enforcement agencies while preserving public peace during operations associated with the tribal exercise of court-determined treaty rights by the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, including hunting and fishing, in 1988 and 1989.

(b) CERTIFICATION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.—Reimbursements may be provided pursuant to subsection (a) upon submission by the Governor of the State of Wisconsin of a statement to the Attorney General that the State has incurred expenses described in section (a), together with such supporting evidence as the Attorney General may require.

SECTION 3. AUTHORIZATION OF FUNDS.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1991 $2.5 million to make payments pursuant to Section 2.

S. 2195

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the Indian Treaty Law Enforcement Assistance Act.

THE INDIAN TREATY LAW ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established within the Office of Justice Programs of the Department of Justice the Indian Treaty Law Enforcement Assistance Program.

(b) The Attorney General, acting through the Office of Justice Programs, is authorized as provided in this section to make payments to States which have reimbursed local, and tribal law enforcement agencies in meeting any extraordinary law enforcement costs incurred while preserving public peace during operations associated with the tribal exercise of court determined treaty rights, including hunting and fishing.

(c) Payments may be provided pursuant to subsection (b) upon submission by the Governor of a State of a statement to the Attorney General that the State has reimbursed local or tribal law enforcement agencies which have incurred expenses described in section (b), together with such supporting evidence as the Attorney General may require.

(d)(1) The Attorney General shall make payment under this section if it is determined that—

(A) the extraordinary law enforcement costs incurred by local or tribal law enforcement agencies for which reimbursement was provided by such State and for which federal reimbursement is sought pursuant to subsection (b) were directly incurred by such local or tribal law enforcement agency in carrying out its responsibilities to preserve peace and maintain order during operations associated with the tribal exercise of court-determined treaty rights;

(B) such extraordinary costs of local or tribal law enforcement agencies, on an average daily basis, exceed by at least ten percent the average daily law enforcement expenditure of such local or tribal agency. Extraordinary costs are defined as those costs incurred beyond budgeted levels and normal work schedules.

(2) In any case where the above criteria have been met the Attorney General shall reimburse such State an amount not to exceed 90 percent of the extraordinary costs so determined.

(e) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $10 million for each of the fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993 to make payments as provided in this section.

S. 2196

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Indian Treaty Conflict Resolution Act of 1990."

FINDINGS AND STATEMENT OF POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that:

(1) Other than to provide for the implementation of agreements or settlements negotiated between Indian tribes and local entities regarding court-affirmed Indian treaty rights, the federal government has no direct responsibility for resolving disputes arising out of the exercise or potential exercise of those rights.

(2) The federal government can, however, as a neutral party, play a useful role in facilitating discussions between affected parties.

(b) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It is the policy of Congress that: The federal government should, to the extent federal involvement is desired by the affected parties, be prepared to provide such services as may be helpful to the affected parties in resolving their disputes over Indian treaty rights, without assuming any responsibility or obligation for resolving those disputes.

THE OFFICE OF INDIAN TREATY CONFLICT RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby established an Office of Indian Treaty Conflict Resolution (hereinafter referred to as the "Office"). The Office, which shall be physically located within the Department of Justice, shall report to the U.S. Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be under the supervision of an Executive Director who shall be paid at an annual rate of basic pay payable for GS-18 of the General Schedule under Section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, and such other employees as may be necessary to carry out provisions of this section.

(b) It shall be the responsibility of the Office, as provided in this section, to provide mediation and conciliation services and any other services which may be beneficial in resolving conflicts between an Indian tribe and other entities arising out of the exercise or potential exercise by such Indian tribe or its members of rights to the use of natural resources determined by a federal court to be reserved by such tribe in a treaty with the United States. The activities of the Office, in providing conflict resolution services, shall be strictly neutral in character and shall include—

(1) assisting in the identification of parties having a significant interest in the resolution of a dispute involving Indian treaty rights;

(2) providing intermediary contact among concerned parties designed to lead to negotiations among such parties;

(3) the identification of, and assistance in acquiring, funding and other negotiating resources, not including its own funds and resources, needed by negotiating parties;

(4) the provision of factual, neutral information to the negotiating parties and other concerned parties; and

(5) rumor-control services relating to matters in dispute and the conduct of negotiations.

(c)(1) The services of the Office shall be made available upon the request of an Indian tribe, a State, or a unit of local government of any State which has an interest in a natural resource subject to an Indian treaty right or an interest in the resolution of a dispute involving a natural resource under an Indian treaty.

(2) The Office may provide its own dispute resolution services either directly through its own employees or by the appointment of an Ad Hoc Dispute Resolution Team. No employee of the Office involved in providing conflict resolution services and no person appointed to a conflict resolution team shall have any direct interest of any kind in the subject matter involved in any Indian treaty conflict nor in resolution of such conflict.

(d) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated not to exceed $1,000,000 for each of the Fiscal Years 1991, 1992, and 1993.●

By Mr. HARKIN (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. LEAHY, and Mr. KERRY):

S. 2197. A bill to lift the trade and other economic sanctions imposed on Nicaragua by the President in 1985; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

LIFTING OF SANCTIONS AGAINST NICARAGUA

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, yesterday, more than 90 percent of the Nicaraguan people went to the polls, voted for peace and reconciliation and an end to their decade-long civil war.

Yesterday's outcome, with opposition candidate, Violeta Chamorro, defeating President Daniel Ortega by a 55-to-42-percent margin, signals a dramatic affirmation of the success of the Arias peace plan and the failure of the Contra war.

Yesterday's vote was a vote for peace as well as a vote for democracy.

Mrs. Chamorro should be commended for her surprising victory. So, too, should the Nicaraguan people as well as the Nicaraguan Government and President Ortega, who insured the conduct of a free and fair election.

The United States should now acknowledge the new political reality in Nicaragua by finally putting an end to the contra program and begin normalizing relations between our two countries. As a first step, I will offer today legislation to lift the United States trade embargo against Nicaragua.

On May 1, 1985, President Ronald Reagan declared a national emergency to deal with what he called the unusual and extraordinary threat posed by Nicaragua and imposed an economic embargo against that country. By imposing sanctions under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act [IEEPA], President Reagan acted unilaterally, without consulting with Congress or any of our allies.

Now, 4 years later it's time to put an end to the embargo and our economic as well as military war against Nicaragua. Regardless of the outcome of yesterday's election, I've long believed that the United States should take this step. Indeed, most Nicaraguans, including members of Mrs. Chamorro's victorious coalition, called for an end to the embargo long before yesterday's election.

In January 1989, Carlos Hembes, who heads the Democratic Coalition, an anti-Government coalition, was quoted in the press as saying, "The embargo was a mistake from the beginning. The new [Bush] administration * * * should dump it."

Anti-Sandinista members of the business and labor support the end of trade sanctions. Gilberto Cuadra, who heads the largest business federation in Nicaragua, has said that "the embargo has no practical effect." Alvin Guthrie, leader of the Nicaraguan Confederation of Trade Union Activity [CUS], has stated that, "for the Sandinistas, the embargo is just a convenient excuse for the country's collapse."

More important, La Prensa, Mrs. Chamorro's own newspaper, has been outspoken in its criticism of the embargo, since it was first imposed. In 1985, La Prensa condemned the U.S. trade sanctions and argued that the internal opposition "would be punished by the embargo." La Prensa repeated this criticism in April 1988, when it criticized the embargo as "both unjust for the Nicaraguan people and highly profitable for the Sandinistas."

In light of yesterday's outcome, Mrs. Chamorro's victory, the free and fair conduct of the election, and Ortega's acceptance of the results, it is difficult to believe that Nicaragua now poses an "unusual and extraordinary threat" to the national security of the United States.

Indeed, the only emergency now posed by Nicaragua is the threat of its own economic collapse. For the Nicaraguan people who yesterday voted in record numbers for peace and democracy, what better reward than to begin normalizing economic and political relations with their country.

Let's begin by lifting the embargo as a first step toward restoring full economic relations with Nicaragua. Then, as negotiations between the Sandinistas and UNO proceed from now until April, where critical questions such as the composition of the armed forces and police will be resolved, the United States should consider other economic incentives for Nicaragua, such as foreign aid and approval of loans from multilateral banks.

Lifting the embargo is a demonstration of our support for democracy in Nicaragua. Ending sanctions is a recognition of the new reality in that country. Opening economic ties is a symbol not only of our desire to normalize relations between our two countries but also is a positive contribution to healing the wounds inside Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2197

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the prohibitions on trade and other transactions and activities involving Nicaragua which were established under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act and other laws pursuant to the national emergency declared by the President in Executive Order 12513 of May 1, 1985, shall cease to apply as of the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERRY, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. WILSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. PELL, and Mr. DIXON):

S.J. Res. 262. Joint resolution designating March 1990 as "Irish-American Heritage Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IRISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a resolution to designate March 1990 as "Irish-American Heritage Month." This resolution will, for the first time, nationally recognize the many contributions Irish-Americans have made throughout our Nation's history.

Approximately 40.7 million Americans are of Irish descent. From Andrew Jackson, our seventh President, to James Hoban, the man who designed the White House, Irish-Americans have played an integral role in shaping our national heritage. Artists, playwrights, social reformers, inventors, and politicians, including eight signers of the Declaration of Independence, are only a fraction of the many Irish-Americans who have helped enrich our great Nation. Their legacy and achievements will be better appreciated by the celebration of "Irish-American Heritage Month".

America is known as the melting pot of the world. Our national heritage is not the product of just one culture or one tradition but takes the contributions of all the peoples of the world and combines them into the wonderful, colorful, and diverse society called America. This resolution honors one of those proud traditions. I am pleased to sponsor this bill and look forward to celebrating "Irish-American Heritage Month" this March.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 96—RELATING TO INCLUSION OF AIR TRANSPORT SERVICES UNDER THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. FORD submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. CON. RES. 96

Whereas, the national defense and security of the United States depends on a strong and economically healthy United States air transportation industry, which has been encouraged and promoted since its inception to provide essential service to the national defense of the United States, and

Whereas, the commercial needs of the traveling and shipping public of the United States continue to rely to a significant degree on having an economically strong air transport industry flying under the flag of the United States in foreign and domestic markets, and

Whereas, the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended, contains in Section 102(11) the declaration of aviation policy of the United States, and in Section 1102(b) the goals for international aviation policy, which mandate ". . . the promotion, encouragement and development of civil aeronautics and a viable, privately owned United States air transport industry", and

Whereas, the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, as amended, provides guidelines for negotiating with other nations, which if air transport services were to be included under the GATT, (or GATS), would eliminate the long standing statutory laws on ownership and control, and the preservation of domestic traffic for domestic air carriers, and

Whereas, in a formal submission on July 17, 1989, to the Group of Negotiations on Services in Geneva, Switzerland, the U.S. Administration officially took the position that "Application of MFN/Nodiscrimination to aviation services would require dismantling the bilateral treaties", and that ". . . MFN would apply to other, inseparable aspects of aviation services currently addressed under bilateral aviation agreements; for example, groundside handling, access to airport and airspace slots, access to computer reservations systems, and access for carriers as computer reservation system vendors", and

Whereas, the Congress and the Administration in excluding civil air transport services from the United States-Canada Free Trade Agreement recognized the unique national security aspects of this service industry, and

Whereas, any trade agreement which would introduce a "stand still" of present rights and benefits to the carriers of signatory nations would be completely unacceptable to U.S. airline interests: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress strongly urges the Administration to refrain from submitting any proposal to include civil air transport services, in whole or in part, under the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade, or the proposed General Agreement on Trade in Services (GATS), and to oppose any proposals made by other nations to include civil air transport, and to oppose any proposal which would allow for any "stand still" of current rights, benefits, rules, or regulations in order to insure that aviation not be treated in any way under the GATT (or GATS); and to oppose any proposal which would require another examination of this idea in the future, because of the potentially disastrous effect this would have on the traveling and shipping public, the U.S. aviation industry, national security, and the existing regime for obtaining and maintaining international air transportation rights and obligations, and because the failure to oppose the inclusion of aviation would gravely imperil the outcome of the entire negotiation on trade in services involving other U.S. service industries.

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I rise today to submit a concurrent resolution to urge the administration not to bargain away any more of our economic strength and turn over our domestic air transport market to foreign air carriers.

I understand that the U.S. Trade Representative is considering including service sectors, including air transportation service, under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. For years, issues involving international air transportation services have been handled by bilateral negotiations, and that process has worked very well. It has assured that U.S. air carries have gotten the same rights to service as foreign carriers were granted.

If air services were placed under GATT, all bilateral arrangements would cease to mean anything. Foreign carriers would receive the same rights as domestic carriers within the United States. Second, if air transportation is mixed with other services, it is likely that air transportation would be tradedoff to benefit some other service industry. Third, I am told by those with experience with GATT disputes, that resolution of disputes takes years: there would be no quick solutions and critical air commerce decisions could be tied up endlessly.

In December 1989, 11 Senators wrote to U.S. Trade Representative Carla A. Hills on this matter. I would like to include the text of the letter as a part of my statement.

In short, I can't see any reason to mess with a system that works and benefits our domestic air transport industry. My concurrent resolution urges the administration to refrain from submitting any proposal to include aviation under GATT, and I ask for the support of my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter to the U.S. Trade Representative be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION,
Washington, DC, December 20, 1989.

Hon. CARLA A. HILLS,
U.S. Trade Representative, Winder Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MADAM AMBASSADOR: We understand that your office is currently involved in negotiations to include service sectors under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Our concerns specifically relate to the air transportation sector. We are strongly opposed to any inclusion of the air transportation service sector under GATT.

Issues relating to the provision of international air transportation services have traditionally been addressed through the process of bilateral negotiations. This process has been successful in ensuring that U.S. air carriers have obtained rights to initate or improve foreign air service commensurate with rights which foreign air carriers have been granted by our Government. The process has been helpful in assuring speedy resolution of ancillary issues, such as ground handling, communications, ticketing, computer reservation systems, and other "doing business" problems.

The bilateral process has resulted in a marked liberalization of air services between the U.S. and virtually every region of the world. While providing substantial service benefits to consumers, the process has also fostered the economic development and competitive vigor of our domestic carriers. In short, the bilateral system works and enjoys widespread support.

We are concerned that the national treatment principle of GATT could weaken our national defense. Granting foreign countries unrestricted access to the U.S. domestic market would have a devastating impact on U.S. air carriers. It is very possible that our carriers could be weakened to the point where they could no longer voluntarily turn over aircraft in the Civil Reserve Air Fleet to the military during times of national emergencies. From a defense posture, we feel this is intolerable. From an economic point of view, we believe there is simply no reason why the United States should turn over its domestic air transport market to foreign air carriers.

The GATT dispute mechanism, which is characterized by long delays and ineffective remedies, is inferior to the current process used in the aviation sector. Today, the ability of our Government to restrict or suspend bilateral authority provides substantial leverage in assuring a generally prompt resolution of doing business and other aviation-related issues.

We understand that your office has prepared a document, which all nations are using for discussion purposes, intended to form the framework for this new treaty. We have been told that you have taken the position that all sectors must be included, but that individual nations may take reservations which eliminate crucial sectors like air transportation. We cannot accept that position because elsewhere in the U.S. draft framework document, Article 25 provides that the parties to the agreement will immediately begin negotiating over sectors that have been left out through reservation, to attempt to include them at a later date.

We recognize, and support, the attempt of the United States to get the best agreement possible under the GATT for the U.S. as a whole. Bringing aviation under GATT, however, would create several substantial problems without providing offsetting benefits. We strongly believe that inclusion of aviation services in GATT is not in the national interest of the United States, its consumers, its airlines, and its labor force, and urge you not to do so.

Sincerely,

Wendell Ford, John McCain, Daniel Inouye, James Exon, Don Riegle, Chuck Robb, Fritz Hollings, Alfonse D'Amato, Howell Heflin, Richard Shelby, Carl Levin.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 250—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED TO AMEND THE STANDING RULES OF THE SENATE RELATING TO THE PUBLISHING OF COMMITTEE RULES

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported the following original resolution; which was placed on the calendar:

S. RES. 250

Resolved, That paragraph 2 of rule XXVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(1) in the second sentence by striking "March 1 of each year" and inserting "March 1 of the first year of each Congress"; and

(2) by striking the last 2 sentences and inserting "Any amendment to the rules of a committee shall not take effect until the amendment is published in the Congressional Record.".

SENATE RESOLUTION 251—DIRECTING AN APPEARANCE BY THE SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. FOWLER (for Mr. MITCHELL) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 251

Whereas, in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, et al., No. 89-453, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, the petitioner has presented for review a question of the constitutionality of a provision of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-162, 103 Stat. 988, 1020, and related measures for Fiscal Years 1988 and 1989, to provide for the expansion of minority and women ownership of broadcasting licenses;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(c), 706(a), and 713(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. §§ 288b(c), 288e(a), and 288*l*(a) (1988), the Senate may direct its Counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in any legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, et al., in support of the constitutionality of provisions of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-162, 103 Stat. 988, 1020, and related measures that the Congress has enacted to promote the expansion of minority and women ownership of broadcasting licenses.

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) No participant or former participant in a program under this title may be paid benefits under this title, in the form of educational and training benefits or in voucher form, or both, in any amount that would exceed the amount of educational assistance benefits paid to a person under chapter 30 of title 38, United States Code, or under chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, as determined by the Secretary of Defense in consultation with the Chairperson of the Board of Directors of the Foundation.

(b) LIMITATIONS ON USES OF BENEFITS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, vouchers provided under section 146 may be used for the purposes set forth in clauses (A) or (B) of subsection (d)(1) of that section only if educational assistance payments made under chapter 30 of title 38, United States Code, and under chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, are permitted to be used for the same purposes.

ARMSTRONG (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1268

Mr. ARMSTRONG (for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCONNELL, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. HATCH) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 1262 proposed by Mr. ARMSTRONG (and others) to the bill S. 1430, supra, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed in Amendment 1262:

On page 8, line 2, after the word "needs" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 8, line 9, after the words "secondary school" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, private sectarian and nonsectarian schools";

On page 10, line 6, after the words public or private agencies" insert the following: ", including, but not limited to, churches and other religious entities";

On page 36, line 3 strike "any religious function" and insert in lieu thereof, "the use of funds provided under this title by program participants and program staff to give religious instruction, conduct worship services, or engage in any form of proselytization".

On page 69, line 7, strike the semicolon and insert in lieu thereof the following: ", but nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent any church or other religious entity from—

(A) displaying religious symbols or decorations;

(B) allowing persons to pray voluntarily, whether silently or vocally;

(C) allowing persons to sing religious hymns; or

(D) affirming or promoting any moral tenet that may be based on religious precepts;".

So long as no funds provided under this Act are used by program participants and program staff for such activities and so long as these activities are conducted in a manner consistent with the Constitution.

On page 70, line 6, after the word "affiliation" insert the following: ", except that nothing in this Act shall prohibit a church or other religious entity from requiring that participants adhere to the religious tenets and teachings of such organization and further, such organization may require that participants adhere to rules forbidding the use of drugs or alcohol".

On page 70, line 7, redesignate subsection (c) as subsection (d) and insert after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) QUALIFIED APPLICANTS.—If two or more prospective participants are qualified for any position with a church or other religious entity that is funded under part A of title I or titles II or III, nothing in this Act shall prohibit such organization from accepting a prospective participant for such position who is already participating on a regular basis in other activities of the church or other religious entity.".

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Small Business Committee will hold a full committee hearing on the President's proposed budget for the Small Business Administration and on the reauthorization of the agency's programs. The hearing will be held on Wednesday, March 7, 1990, at 2 p.m., in room 428A of the Russell Senate Office Building. For further information, please call John Ball, staff director of the committee at 224-5175.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND HUMAN RESOURCES

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor and Human Resources be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, February 27, 1990, at 9 a.m., for a hearing on the Civil Rights Act of 1990.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON MOD REHAB/HUD INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the MOD Rehab/HUD Investigation Subcommittee of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs be allowed to meet during the session of the Senate, Tuesday, February 27, 1990, at 10 a.m. and continuing at 2:30 p.m., to hold hearings on the anatomy of a deal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 27, 1990, at 2 p.m., to hold a hearing on the nomination of Harry F. Manbeck, Jr., to be Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks; Douglas B. Comer, to be Deputy Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks; Rhesa H. Barksdale, to be U.S. circuit judge for the fifth circuit; Robert H. Hodges, to be a judge of the U.S. Claims Court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs would like to request unanimous consent to hold a joint hearing with the House Veterans' Affairs Committee to hear a legislative presentation by the Disabled American Veterans on Tuesday, February 27, 1990, at 9:30 a.m., in SH-216.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on February 27, 1990, at 9:30 a.m. to hold the third in a series of hearings on a proposal to reduce Social Security taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet in open session on Tuesday, February 27, 1990, at 2 p.m., to receive testimony on the amended Defense authorization request for fiscal year 1991 and on the fiscal years 1991-95 5-year defense plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Tuesday, February 27, at 11 a.m. to hold a nomination hearing on Ronald Roskens to be Administrator of the Agency for International Development.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

MUDDLED THINKING ON TRANSPORTATION TRUST FUNDS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, there is an awful lot of confusion about the transportation-related trust funds. Some believe that the Government is hoarding surpluses in these funds in order to make the deficit look smaller. Others believe that changing the budget treatment of the trust funds would somehow necessarily increase spending for transportation. Both views are simply wrong.

The New York Times recently published an editorial that helps explain some of the issues surrounding the aviation trust fund. I hope my colleagues will read it. As the Times understands, the so-called surplus in the aviation trust fund is illusory. In fact, the Government already spends much more on aviation than the trust fund takes in. So, and I quote the New York Times, "contrary to popular belief, the Government is not hoarding the fund to make the deficit look smaller."

I ask that a copy of the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 20, 1990]

A MODEST WAY TO REBUILD AIRPORTS

Since 1973, Federal law has prohibited local airports from imposing head taxes or departure fees on passengers. Now the Bush Administration is asking Congress to lift that ban and to raise the Federal airline passenger tax to 10 percent. Both proposals merit passage.

The strongest argument for the changes is that they would put badly needed dollars into the overburdened air traffic system. The strongest argument against is that the Aviation Trust Fund, fed by the current 8 percent Federal tax on tickets and other aviation-related levies, already contains a surplus of about $7 billion. But the "surplus" is illusory and the trust fund takes in too little to meet the needs of the system.

The Aviation Trust Fund was created principally to finance capital improvements like airport construction and expansion and new hardware for the air traffic control system. This fiscal year, for example, the fund will take in about $3.9 billion. Government spending for aviation will be far more, about $6.5 billion. So contrary to popular belief, the Government is not hoarding the fund to make the deficit look smaller.

The trust fund can be spent only for aviation, but like all Federal monies it must be appropriated by Congress. The buildup of the "surplus" is a consequence of a 1982 law passed to encourage use of the fund for capital purposes and limit its use for F.A.A. operations. For every $1 shortfall between authorizations and actual spending for capital purposes, spending for operations was to be cut by $2.50. For many reasons, including problems with new air traffic control equipment, capital spending fell behind and the penalty was triggered.

The effect was to force the Government to dip into a different pocket for funds it would otherwise have taken from the trust fund—which in any case still takes in too little to cover the full cost of civil aviation. Increasing the passenger tax and other aviation levies would boost the fund's revenues by an estimated $623 million.

The prohibition on local departure taxes resulted partly from local authorities making a botch of collecting them. But collecting shouldn't be hard in the computer age. Moreover, departure taxes would give local authorities an additional source of revenue to expand terminals, lengthen runways and fund other capital projects. According to the Department of Transportation, a fee of $3 per passenger at the nation's 50 busiest airports could produce more than $1 billion a year.

On departure fees, Congress needs only to strike the current prohibition from existing law. Legislatively, raising the ticket tax would be even simpler. Both plans are overdue.●

THE OLDER AMERICANS' FREEDOM TO WORK ACT OF 1990

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to announce my strong support for and cosponsorship of the Older Americans' Freedom To Work Act. This legislation would eliminate the Social Security earnings limit for individuals who reach the normal retirement age which is currently age 65. As we all know, the earnings limit was enacted during the Depression to encourage senior citizens to leave the workforce and open jobs for younger individuals. In 1990, the earnings limit for Social Security recipients age 65 to 69 is $9,360. For every $3 earned over this limit, the recipient will lose $1 in Social Security benefits that were earned over a lifetime. When this 33 percent effective tax from the earnings limit is combined with other income taxes paid by the working senior, those who earn as little as $10,000 are faced with an effective marginal tax rate of 56 percent. The time has come to stop penalizing senior citizens who want or need to work after age 65. It is time to repeal the earnings limitation.

Senior citizens have a wealth of knowledge and experience to offer younger individuals in the work force.

Every effort should be made to keep these active and productive seniors in the workplace after they reach age 65. Additionally, many sectors of the economy are facing a labor shortage. The experience of senior citizens is greatly needed. Repeal of the earnings limit would encourage senior citizens to provide a valuable resource to this country's work force; themselves. Numerous senior citizens' organizations, newspapers, and even the former administrator of Social Security believe that the time has come to repeal the earnings limit. At a meeting in Lexington, KY, former Social Security Administrator Dorcas Hardy stated: "People who want to work past age 65 should be able to do so without penalties to their retirement benefits." Additionally, during the last session of Congress the Senate voted several times to liberalize the earnings limit with a majority of those votes passing with wide bipartisan majorities.

The Social Security Administration has estimated that total repeal of the earnings limit will cost an average of $4.8 billion per year for the next 10 years. This does not, however, factor in any recoupment of revenues. A report by the Dallas-based Institute for Policy Innovation and the National Center for Policy Analysis calculates that "repeal of the earnings limit would encourage more than 700,000 Social Security recipients to enter or remain in the labor force." The report states that output of goods and services would increase by at least $15.4 billion and Government revenue would rise by $4.9 billion. Another study released by the same organization, "Paying People Not To Work: the Economic Cost of the Social Security Retirement Earnings Limit," finds that almost any increase in the earnings limit would reduce the Federal deficit by generating more in new taxes than the Government would lose in increased Social Security benefits payments.

Social Security benefits should be regarded as a floor on which senior citizens can build, not a ceiling that limits them. Enacting this legislation to repeal the earnings limit will allow all senior citizens to build on that floor and contribute their knowledge and experience to the U.S. economy.●

THE NEED TO ENCOURAGE SAVINGS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recently, David Hinson, the chief executive officer of one of the Nation's more successful new airlines, Midway Airlines, sent me a note and enclosed an article by Peter Drucker from the Wall Street Journal titled "Japan's Not-So-Secret Weapon."

It is a fascinating article about how the Japanese have moved from a low savings rate to a high savings rate.

Clearly, we have to do something along that line in the United States.

Our savings rate is miserable. Because of that and because of our indefensibly high Federal deficit figures, we have interest rates that discourage investment.

Clearly, we have to encourage more savings.

I urge my colleagues to read the Peter Drucker article from the Wall Street Journal, and I ask to insert it into the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

[From The Wall Street Journal, Jan. 9, 1990]

JAPAN'S NOT-SO-SECRET WEAPON

(By Peter Drucker)

"What makes Japan succeed?" is the hottest discussion topic today. But what few mention is Japan's cost of capital.

American and other Western companies pay between 10% and 15% for money, whether short-term borrowings, fixed debt or equity. The large Japanese firm has been paying 5% at most. And a capital-cost advantage of 200% or 300% is almost unbeatable. Neither "culture" nor "structure"—the factors most often invoked to explain Japan's success—underlie Japan's low cost of capital. The American Occupation gave it to Japan, 40 years ago.

It's common knowledge that the Japanese savings rate is twice as high as the American, and is, indeed, the developed world's highest. But only a few historians note that before World War II Japan had one of the lowest savings rates among major countries. After Japan's defeat, this rate plunged even further and in fact became a dissavings rate, with inflation and violent labor strife rapidly eating up whatever savings had survived confiscatory taxation and destruction during the war.

With cities and factories largely reduced to rubble, the country needed massive capital investment—and there was no possibility to borrow abroad and no Marshall Plan. In this crisis the Americans brought in a Detroit banker, Joseph Dodge, as the Occupation's economic adviser. He decided that only a radical shift to an investment-driven economy could stave off disaster. He proposed a very sharp increase in income-tax rates even on fairly low incomes; to this day tax rates, especially marginal rates on large incomes, are a good bit higher in Japan than in the U.S. But he also proposed exemption from all taxes the interest earned on Postal Savings Bank deposits of up to three million yen per person.

THE EXPERTS HOWLED

In 1950, three million yen was equal to only a little more than $8,000. Yet in 1950 Japan, that was an astronomical sum—25 times the annual income of the average Japanese, and more than any but the top 2% of the population earned in a year.

All the experts howled: the Japanese because of the horrendous loss of tax revenue to an already deficit-wracked treasury; the Americans (especially Washington's "liberal" economists and politicians) because of the horrendous giveaway to the rich. But Dodge succeeded in persuading a new, young Japanese Minister of Finance, Hayato Ikeda (10 years later to become prime minister) of the merits of his plan. Ikeda pushed it through a skeptical cabinet and an openly hostile Diet.

Inflation disappeared within weeks. Six months later the savings rate turned up and kept on climbing. But tax revenues also began to rise almost immediately. And when the tax-exempt accounts, having done their work, were finally scrapped in 1988, practically every Japanese—poor, middle-income or affluent—had one. (Some had as many as 20; the limit of one account per person was ignored.) And the highest concentration of tax-exempt accounts was among fairly low-income earners.

These savings financed the explosive growth of the Japanese economy and the export drive. They explain why—almost unprecedented in economic history—a rapidly growing Japan has not had to borrow abroad. And, of course, these tax-free savings explain Japan's low-cost capital and the tremendous competitive edge it provided.

But that the investment-driven economy worked in Japan is not nearly as important as that America's and Britain's alternative—the consumption-driven economy—has not delivered what it promised: investment and low capital costs. Yet the consumption-driven economy still dominates economic theory and economic policy in both the U.S. and the U.K.

Despite their differences, Keynesians, monetariats and supply-siders all accept a few basic Keynesian postulates: "Over-saving" is an ever-present danger, causing under-consumption and depression. Saving should therefore not be encouraged and might even be penalized safely. If consumption drives the economy, the necessary and productive investment will take care of itself. Rising consumption will create demand for new and profitable production and productive capacity. It will act as the "multiplier" for investment. Fostering and promoting consumption will thus automatically generate both rising incomes and high capital formation.

That there are serious flaws in these postulates was immediately noted by such eminent mid-1930s economists as Lionel Robbins at the London School of Economics and Joseph Schumpeter at Harvard.

No over-saving, they showed, had ever been documented. Nor is there the slightest evidence that, as John Maynard Keynes asserted, over-saving had caused the Great Depression. Worse, Keynes's own theory rules out the multiplier on which his consumption-driven economy depends. For at the heart of all of Keynes is the postulate that businessmen will invest only if they have "confidence," which in Keynesian theory is a function of low interest rates and low costs of capital. To play down saving, let alone to discourage it, must drive up interest rates and thus undermine confidence.

The consumption-driven economy triumphed—though mainly in English-speaking countries—because it perfectly fitted the political mood of the postwar period. To penalize saving "soaks the rich." And to promote consumption "spreads the wealth." Politically, Keynes himself was pretty much what we now call a "neo-conservative" (then called a "Liberal" with a capital L). He had nothing but biting contempt for Progressives and "bleeding hearts." Yet, in superb irony, the Progressives accepted his theories and gave them dominance. These theories bestowed legitimacy on their political agenda.

By now we know, however, that to promote saving does not favor the rich. Any country that has given a tax exemption or tax deferment to saving has had the same experience as Japan: Middle- and lower-income earners take the most advantage of these opportunities. This has, for instance, been the experience with whatever meager tax deferments have been offered for saving in the U.S. (e.g. in individual retirement accounts or in Keogh Plans).

We also know that a consumption-driven economy does not "spread the wealth." There is far more equality of income in investment-driven Japan than in consumption-driven America or Britain. In addition, though the Internal Revenue Service still refuses to accept this, tax revenues are higher within a few years when saving is favored.

We have learned in the 40 years since Joseph Dodge that nothing works as well in a developed country as legalized tax-avoidance. His tax-exempt accounts in Japan paid laughably low interest—never more than 2% a year. Yet the Japanese could not get enough of them. The money savings in America's IRAs and in its Keogh Plans for the self-employed are often more nominal than real. Yet they are always highly popular. And as attorneys and accountants will attest, people rush into the most dubious "tax shelters" just because they want to beat the tax collector.

THE "INCIDENCE" OF TAXATION

We know, in other words, how to jack up America's dismal savings rate and how to bring down America's prohibitively high cost of capital. It is less a matter of the level than of the "incidence" of taxation—which is economists' doubletalk for a chance legally to avoid taxes. And we also know that Keynes was right when he said that high costs of capital destroy "confidence" and inhibit investment. Few investments will earn enough to repay capital cost of 15%—but many can easily earn 5% which is what the Japanese pay.

There are indeed profound differences between Japan's society and the West, especially the U.S. But there is little or nothing that the U.S. and the West as a whole can do about whatever Japanese differences there are. We can, however, do quite a bit to get rid of, or at least to assuage, the enormous competitive disadvantage we suffer vis-a-vis the Japanese through out prohibitive cost of capital. It is not "structural"; it is the result of an inadequate savings rate caused in the main by our clinging to the belief in the consumption-driven economy against our own experience and against all the evidence.

PEQUANNOCK TOWNSHIP, NJ, CELEBRATES 250 YEARS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to honor the historic township of Pequannock, NJ. The year 1990 marks the 250th anniversary of the township's founding, and on March 24, an anniversary ball will be held to commemorate this historical date.

In 1696, Arent Schuyler and others purchased the Pompton Patent from the Lenape Indians and the Duke of York. In 1710, the Le Mattre, Comley, and VanNess families settled the west bank of Pequannock River.

A historically significant event occurred on March 25, 1740, when the first court to sit in Morristown created Pequannock, the largest of the then three Morris County townships. It encompassed the entire northern section of Morris County; including the present day municipalities of Jefferson, Rockaway, Kinnelon, Butler, Riverdale, Boonton, Montville, Lincoln Park, and sections of Dover and Wharton.

Pequannock continued to play an important role in New Jersey. From 1776 until 1783 there was constant movement of the American Continental Army along King's Highway. In 1781, Rochambeau's French Army camped in Pompton Plains going to and from the Battle of Yorktown.

In 1804, Jefferson Township was separated from Pequannock Township and 3 years later the Newark-Pompton road was opened as a toll road. Thirty years later, Randolph separated from the township, and became Dover, and that same year, Rockaway separated. In 1867, Boonton Township, Boonton and Montville became separate boroughs. In 1895 Wharton separated from Pequannock Township and in 1901 Butler separated. In 1922 the turnpike was paved and Riverdale, Kinnelon, and Lincoln Park separated from Pequannock Township. 1930 was the year that the first township offices were opened and consisted of municipal clerk and police office.

In 1951, the first master plan was adopted for the township, followed by the opening of Chilton Memorial Hospital and in 1956 the new municipal building was dedicated. In January 1957, the council/manager form of government became effective and by 1980, the Pequannock Township had grown to 13,776 people.

Since that time, the township has thrived, and has entered the last decade of this century with strong public spirit. The history of this outstanding community would not be complete without acknowledging its citizens and their sense of pride today. Throughout 1990, many events are scheduled in celebration of Pequannock's 250th anniversary. I extend my best wishes for a grand celebration and congratulations as this historic occasion is commemorated.●

JOHN F. MORSE, INVENTIVE GENIUS

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the history of the great State of Ohio is replete with examples of innovative and technological achievement. As we enter the final decade of the 20th century, we have the opportunity to mark the 50th anniversary of one of Ohio's premier manufacturing concerns and to recognize the significant and invaluable contributions of its founder, John F. Morse.

Morse Controls of Hudson, OH, is an established world leader in the business of remote control systems. In founding the corporation some 50 years ago, Mr. Morse's inventive genius and entrepreneurial spirit established the definitive course of design principles for mechanical remote engine control systems and steering systems. This spirit is manifested even today in his continuing activities.

Over the door to John F. Morse's shop hangs a large airplane propeller complete with a deicing system he invented for the B.F. Goodrich Co. in 1934. Below that hangs an old deep-sea diver's helmet. The diversity of these two items exemplifies Morse's intense curiosity about the way things work. It is a curiosity that has led the 85-year-old inventor and founder of Morse Controls to receive over 75 patents in industries as diverse as boating, photography, aviation, and equipment manufacturing for off-highway vehicles.

At 85, when most people are slowing down and buying things for recreation and leisure, John Morse is buying equipment to upgrade his two complete research and development labs, one at his home in Hudson, OH, and the other in Fort Myers, FL. They are every inventor's dream: Complete machine shops filled with state-of-the-art equipment. Now, Mr. Morse spends his days doing what has always been his form of recreation and leisure—turning ideas into tangible, working products.

Mr. Morse's shop in Hudson, is a study in contrasts: An 1888 lathe that belonged to his father stands next to a 1988 CNC version that takes up half a room. Above the expensive, state-of-the-art machine tool equipment hangs a rebuilt 1918 aircraft engine used in training planes for American pilots during World War I. When Morse was 12 years old, he would skip school and use his father's lathe to make variometer spools for radios. For his work, he earned $2 per hour, which was a real fortune back then.

He quickly learned that it took more than just a lathe and more than just great ideas for an inventor to be successful. A recent article, prepared for his patent attorneys, points out that less than 5 percent of issued patents ever make their inventor enough money to cover the legal costs of securing the patent. John Morse overcame that bleak reality in 1941 when he started Morse Instrument Co. to develop and manufacture photographic equipment. Photography was an early passion for Morse. In fact, while in the Army, he made what he believes to be the world's largest focal plane shutter, used to make aerial photos. Today, he still maintains a complete photographic lab in his Hudson home.

During the war effort, Morse Instrument Co. thrived by making photo print straighteners, gun cameras and other products he developed for the military.

John Morse's work exemplifies the old adage that necessity is the mother of invention. But in his case, it is also true that curiosity is the father of necessity. Every patent he holds evolved from his hobbies or from his curiosity about the objects around him and how they functioned. He did not invent things because the world needed them; he invented them because he needed them. That was also the scenario when John Morse bought his first boat in the early 1940's. Soon thereafter, he was inventing products to enhance the pleasure of his new hobby—recreational boating.

John Morse's piloting experience helped him develop his first marine product, which was a single lever control. Like an airplane, it centralized all essential functions of steering and engine control. Transmission, throttle, and rudder were all hydraulically controlled by movement of only one unit—"the stick."

The next marine product was docking lights, which he invented in 1945 so he could travel to a nearby island at night and avoid the maze of commercial fishing nets and lines in his course. The docking lights were patented in 1951 and are still offered as part of the Morse product line.

Then Mr. Morse began finding other areas of need in his boat. His solutions to those problems became highly marketable marine products that had a profound effect on the industry; the resolution of those problems quickly catapulted Morse Company into the role of a leading accessory manufacturer.

One of John Morse's biggest contributions to the marine industry was the single lever all-mechanical control he introduced in 1950. The MH-2 was the first all-mechanical control to combine the throttle and transmission functions in one mechanism utilizing push-pull cables. This was initially used on large Coast Guard boats. Derivatives of this system can still be found on the ice breaker USCGC Mackinaw and on the Maid of the Mist at Niagara Falls.

After World War II, when the pleasure boat market really began to explode, Morse capitalized on the opportunity by adapting his single lever control for small boat applications. Other innovations followed, most notably improvements in control cable design and production technology.

For example, in the 1950's, most cables had a single strand stainless steel core. The conduit was short lay construction, which made them quite rigid. Without better cables you could only go so far in improving the performance of single lever controls.

So Mr. Morse approached his supplier and asked for a long lay cable conduit with a multiple strand stainless steel core; the supplier said it could not be done.

So John Morse cordoned off a back room in his plant, marked it Top Secret, and began the research that eventually led to the development of the famous Morse Red Jaket cable. But in order to produce the cables, Mr. Morse also had to design the equipment necessary for manufacturing. In the next several years, Morse would perfect his cable, removing the standard lubrication fittings, resulting in pre-lubricated, long life cables and later adding self-adjusting protective seals, a concept and design he pioneered.

Mr. Morse adapted the push-pull technology he developed for control cables to steering systems and in 1962 introduced Morse rack and pinion steering. This technology dramatically improved the quality and performance of both rack and pinion and rotary steering. Morse's cable and controls were so successful that it led the company to a leadership position in numerous industrial markets as well.

Today at 85 years old, John Morse puts in 8 to 10 hours a day in his shop. He gets around a little more slowly these days, but his inventive drive springs eternal. He recently received three patents for improvements and safety innovations for three-wheeled electric-powered cars.

John Morse believes that life moves in circles. When he was 12, he threw away an old flywheel and pulley that powered his father's lathe and replaced them with an electric engine. Today, in the later years of his life, Morse is trying to recreate these mechanical parts from old patterns and pictures he found in a Rhode Island library. Once restored, he will place the antique lathe alongside the modern version in use today. In fact, John Morse has a deep love and a profound respect for anything that works well. As for things that do not work well, he just invents something better.●

LACK OF WATER DIVIDES MIDEAST

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, recently, Jay Bushinsky had an article in the Chicago Sun-Times under the heading, "Lack of Water Divides Mideast."

One of the issues that we are going to have to face up to, and I hope we do soon, is the question of pushing research for finding an inexpensive way of converting salt water to fresh water.

You do not have to be a prophet to understand that not only in the Middle East, but in much of the world, we are going to be facing some very severe water problems before too long. And yet we are spending only pennies on research on this vital area.

I will be presenting this body with an opportunity to do better, and I hope we will.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

LACK OF WATER DIVIDES MIDEAST

(By Jay Bushinsky)

It is more dangerous to play with water than with fire in the Middle East.

In this arid region, water has been the underlying if not immediate cause of wars since human history began here more than 6,000 years ago.

Abraham (Ibrahim, in Arabic), whom Jews and Arabs claim as the father of their respective nations, clashed with his neighbors in the biblical land of Canaan (now Israel) over the sparse but vital well around Beersheba.

Today, Turkey has upset its longstanding live-and-let-live relationship with neighboring Syria and Iraq by building the massive Attaturk Dam on the upper reaches of the Euphrates river.

To fill the giant reservoir behind the dam, the Turks have reduced the normal flow of water downstream by 75 percent.

There was an instant outcry from the Syrians and Iraqis, because the dam presumably will impair their agricultural yields.

And in the long run, the dam will give Turkey a powerful instrument to influence the downstream states' foreign policies.

For their part, the Syrians also have been tampering with nature's stingy allocation of water. To harness the Yarmuk, a major Jordan river tributary, they have been building the Mukhaiba Dam near where the Syrian, Jordanian and Israeli borders intersect. And to the northeast, the Syrians are building a series of dams and artificial lakes the consequences of which evidently have yet to be evaluated by Jordan and Israel.

A similar propensity for regional tension appears to be developing between Egypt and Ethiopia. Reports in the British press tell of Ethiopian efforts to divert a substantial portion of water from the Blue Nile, which converges with the White Nile at Khartoum in the Sudan to form Egypt's lifeline, the mighty Nile river itself. Some of these accounts suggest that Israeli experts have been helping the Ethiopians.

Egypt reacted vehemently to the prospective drop in the Blue Nile's input and reportedly warned Ethiopia and Israel against changing the status quo.

The cause of these crises is a lack of regional cooperation exemplified by the United States' Tennessee Valley Authority.

American experts, notably the late Walter Clay Lowdermilk, tried to circumvent the bitter political differences between Israel and the Arab states and get them to establish a Jordan Valley Authority. His efforts ostensibly were in vain, but the late Eric Johnston, at the behest of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, worked out an understanding among the governments that has worked for 35 years.

One unanswered question is whether there should not be an international law against unilateral interference with rivers that cross international boundaries.

Another is whether the ecological damage from such projects might not inspire second thoughts about their presumed benefit to the rest of humanity.●

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, today I had the opportunity to testify before the Senate Rules Committee on the urgent need for campaign finance reform.

In a time when countries around the world are emulating our democracy, we remain locked in to a system that many of our citizens have concluded is in serious need of being fixed.

Since my arrival in this body at the beginning of 1985, I have sought to change our campaign finance laws to a system of public financing of general elections tied to limits on overall campaign spending. These reforms would help take the money out of politics, and restore the public trust.

In recent years, Senators opposed to these reforms have filibustered the Senate to prevent them from being enacted into law. I hope that will not happen again this year. The time for reform is past due.

I ask that my testimony before the Rules Committee be entered into the RECORD in full.

The statement follows:

TESTIMONY OF SENATOR JOHN KERRY BEFORE SENATE RULES COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 27, 1990

Senator Ford and Distinguished Members of The Committee:

At a moment when people around the world are seeking to emulate the standards of democracy which our nation was the first to develop, it is ironic that so much of our electorate has grown so cynical and so angry about our democratic process.

While there are many factors involved, it is clear to most of us that an important factor in that cynicism has been the perception that money has come to dominate the process of how laws get made—that the system is rigged—that special interests get special favors because they contribute money to politicians—and that elected officials spend so much time and energy raising money that they aren't doing the jobs they were elected to do.

Citizens have less faith in their government, and we must respond to these perceptions. They have lost confidence in the process. Campaign finance reform is fundamental to our ability to restore that sense of confidence. I believe the situation has been critical for some time now and is even more so now. We must act.

In 1984, when I first ran for Senate, as I was personally experiencing the treadmill of fundraising in the midst of a tough campaign, I decided that there had to a better way of funding campaigns. First of all, too much of my own time and energy was going into fund-raising, rather than communicating with voters on the issues. Second, the campaign was too expensive and went on too long. Finally, there was the problem of PAC money.

Even in 1984, many members of the public believed that PAC money was special interest money, that PACs were dominating the political process and that individual voices could not be heard. I made a personal decision not to accept political aciton money, in order to make a statement about the need for campaign finance reform. That decision resulted in the first PAC-free Senate race in the nation. I have not gone back on that pledge, which shows that you can raise money for campaigns without relying on PACs, though clearly, it is more work.

While in the Senate I've sponsored campaign reform legislation that would impose spending caps through public finance, and today I remain convinced that the only proper way to restore the public trust is through limits on campaign spending and public financing, together with changing the mix to reduce the overall reliance by some on PAC money.

This is actually the third time I have had the privilege of appearing before this Committee regarding the need for caps on spending and public financing of campaigns.

The first was on November 4, 1985, when as a newly elected Senator I called for limits on overall campaign spending and for the public financing of federal general elections. I remember then characterizing the system under which we are forced to operate a disgrace—even a moral disgrace.

The second time was on March 18, 1987.

Today I hope will be the final time, because I hope the time has finally come that we will actually enact the needed reforms. They are past due.

I believe that spending caps and some form of public financing would substantially reduce the problem of perception that currently clouds the process. They would make it possible for both major parties to be on an equal footing with equal spending at a reasonable level. Taken together, they offer us the best way of insuring that the reforms we enact now do not create as many new problems as they solve.

A recent poll demonstrates that the vast majority of Americans agree with me: last week, a national poll of 1000 voters across the country by KRC Communications and the American Political Network found that 77 percent of the public favored a limit on spending for congressional campaigns, and 78 percent support public matching funds for congressional campaigns similar to the mechanism used in presidential races.

It is not very often that three-quarters of the public agrees about anything. In an election, 77 or 78 percent of the vote is a landslide. What we have in this poll is a demonstration that there is a landslide of public support for spending caps and for the public financing of federal elections.

Why are these reforms at the core of campaign finance reform?

First, there can be no reform without spending caps. As the Majority Leader has said, "campaigns last too long and cost too much." Today, candidates for office spend too much time chasing too many people for too many dollars as a result. Without spending caps, no matter what kind of limits are placed on PAC money, candidates for office will be condemned to spend an ever-increasing amount of time and resources on raising funds from individuals for their campaigns. That means going after donors who will "max out," in the phraseology of campaign finance, by giving a candidate $2,000. It means letting the current situation continue, where in the words of Senate Appropriations Chairman Robert Byrd, we have some Senators who are "full-time fundraisers and half-time legislators." Without spending caps, that could worsen in the future.

Why public finance? Caps alone do not solve the perception problem created by the situation in which a candidate raises substantial amounts of money from high-dollar donors and PACs. In fact, spending caps alone, without public finance, may actually worsen this aspect of the current campaign finance crisis.

The problem is as follows: if you have spending caps, it becomes very important to conserve as much of the money you raise as possible for paid media and other forms of communication, and to spend as little as possible in fund-raising. As the Majority Leader has noted, "fund raising is time-consuming and absorbs the personal attention of candidates, so candidates focus on the most efficient means of fund-raising." That means PACs and high-dollar donors.

By contrast, raising money from smaller dollar donors—who amount to representatives of the vast majority of the people in this country—can be very expensive. Direct mail, for example, can reach millions of voters at a time with a message about a candidate, and a simultaneous request for a contribution. But with spending caps, it becomes very difficult to do direct mail, because direct mail can cost as much to send out as any revenue it brings in. You may have communicated with a lot of people in the process. You may have located thousands of people who support your candidacy. But in the process, you will have spent a substantial portion of the funds you have been allotted under any cap, leaving yourself incapable of responding to whatever the opposition decides to do in the final and critical weeks of a campaign.

Candidates will not by willing to put themselves in that position. The consequence will be, that if we pass spending caps without public financing of campaigns for a general election, we are in effect saying that from now on, we must give up on low-dollar fundraising and direct mail. Instead, we will have to raise most of our funds from the people who can afford to give us the maximum, or nearly the maximum. We must go for the big money whenever we can, and we can afford to spend little to seek contributions from the average voter who is not so well-heeled.

S. 137, the Boren bill, tries to deal with this problem by offering incentives such as lower broadcast and mail rates to Senate candidates who accept a cap and who raises a threshold amount from contributors, of which only the first $250 is counted towards the threshold.

But this does not go far enough to deal with the problem of spending caps without public financing. In my case, for example, to qualify for the Boren bill's incentives I would have to raise $453,500 from individuals in amounts of $250 or less—in other words, from about 1800 people. But those same 1800 people would also be enough, if many of them provided me with the maximum contribution, to finance my entire campaign up to my cap of $1.2 million for the primary and $1.7 million for the general. In other words, if I identified less than 2000 maximum donors, I could have financed my entire campaign without a single contribution from a small donor.

By contrast, in my current campaign, I have raised funds from about 50,000 different people, and my average contribution is less than $35 a supporter. That's the kind of campaign that reaches out to people throughout a state. My fear is that with a spending cap and no form of public financing for the general election, these kind of broad-based campaigns will disappear.

Instead, I recommend an approach in which, like S. 137, candidates raise threshold amounts to qualify for the incentives in S. 137, except that the general election is paid for directly by the public at large.

The consequences of moving to this system are profound. First, public funding in the general ends the reliance on large dollar donors by eliminating them from the picture from the day of the primary on. Second, it ends the reliance on PACs for the same reason. Third, it insures that both parties will have a fair shot at getting their message across to the voters in equal degrees during the height of the election season. Fourth, it would cut in half the maximum that any individual could give from $2,000 to $1,000, and thus reduce each candidate's reliance on high dollars donors.

Finally, by changing the dollar amount of the contribution credited towards the threshold for receiving public funds—from $250 to $100—one could simultaneously help campaigns to reach out more broadly to voters by pushing candidates to seek out more lower dollar contributors.

I note in passing that public financing has a distinguished history of advocates, beginning early in this century with President Teddy Roosevelt, who of course, was also a Republican. One of my predecessors in this Senate seat, Henry Cabot Lodge, another Republican, was another strong advocate of public financing for federal campaigns.

Public financing would create an appropriate constitutional basis for specific spending limits to stop the unconscionable increases in campaign spending. It would also do so in a manner that favors neither Democrats nor Republicans. It would thus strengthen both parties, making it easier for the parties to field candidates for more seats, by creating relatively low threshold necessary for general election financing. While putting all serious candidates on an equal and fair footing in the general election, public financing would also prevent soaring campaign costs from favoring persons of personal wealth over those without such wealth.

How should we go about creating a public finance system? There have been several options recommended in the past, which I think are worthy of exploration.

First, the simplest and I believe best option would be to take S. 137 and its thresholds, reduce the contribution to be used as credit for the threshold from $250 to $100, make use of the reduced mail and broadcast provisions, and turn to full public funding for general elections.

Funds for public financing could be generated from raising the current checkoff on individual tax returns to $3. The amount it would cost the Treasury, amounting to perhaps $150 million a year, would pay for itself many times over in clean government.

A second option would be the same as above, except that instead of full-funding for general elections by the public, we would adopt a system of matching funds for the general election, targeted to small donations. For every dollar contributed up to a threshold, again, say $100, the federal government would contribute one dollar. This approach would create substantial incentives for campaigns to limit themselves to smaller contributions to obtain the maximum federal matching funds before reaching the overall cap.

A third option would be a matching system in which instead of providing cash, the federal government provided campaigns with vouchers in lieu of cash to match contributions of $100 or less. These vouchers would be used to buy lowest-unit-cost broadcast advertising and other media, postage and mail, and would be redeemable for cash not by the campaigns, but only by their vendors. What is attractive about a voucher system is that it tells the public that their money can only be used for the purpose of communicating with them, and for nothing else. To those who fear public concern about permitting campaigns to receive cash from the federal government directly, a voucher system may be very appealing.

A final option would be to use public financing, as the Boren bill, S. 137, does, only as a means of enforcing spending caps. If public financing is limited to be used as a cap, it is critical that the Boren bill face the fund-raising problem regarding small donors directly. I recommend as an approach that adopted by the FEC for Presidential campaigns. Specifically, campaigns are allowed to spend up to 20 percent of their total allotment for campaign spending on fund raising, without those funds being counted as part of the cap. This 20 percent credit would allow campaigns to spend a reasonable portion of their overall resources on programs aimed at communicating with and recruiting small donors.

With the adoption of one of these options, I support the group of reforms contained in S. 137 governing soft money, bundling, and independent expenditures, and related reforms.

In conclusion, I believe limits on campaign spending in combination with public financing of campaigns is the solution to the current crisis. In the days to come I hope to work closely with the Chairman of this Committee and the Senate Democratic Task Force on Campaign Finance Reform to achieve legislation that is realistic, and which meets our urgent needs for reform.

For the record, I would also like to register my strong opposition to the Administration's campaign finance reform approach, as adopted in the Dole bill, S. 1727, which is before this Committee today as a counterpart to H.R. 3425 in the House, introduced by Congressman Michel.

S. 1727's main approach to campaign finance reform is through substantially eliminating PACs from the process, leaving in place only those PACs which are not sponsored by groups and prohibiting those associated with labor unions and corporations.

The Dole bill thus is an attempt to correct the problem of candidates becoming too reliant on "special interest" money tied to corporations or labor. The problem with this legislation is that it does nothing at all to address the problem of the overall cost of campaigns, or the amount of time and resources that are necessary to raise funds for campaigns.

Indeed, by substantially removing PACs from the process, without in any way constraining overall spending, the Dole bill could make some aspects of today's problems worse. For example, a candidate faced by a millionaire opponent would under the Dole bill have no alternative but to devote as much time as necessary to raising money at $1000 or $2000 a clip from individuals, with all the burdens that kind of fund-raising imposes. The Dole bill contains no solution to the millionaire problem; it contains no limitation on spending; it is fundamentally flawed.●

THE AUDIT OF THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH ON ANTI-SEMITIC VIOLENCE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith [ADL] for their work to both expose and combat hate crimes and to bring to your attention their most recent audit of anti-Semitic incidents. For the past 11 years, the ADL has compiled data about incidents of anti-Semitism. Their efforts in data collection as well as awareness projects and education regarding anti-Semitic acts have played a critical role in increasing public attention to this problem and helping to address it.

Unfortunately, the Anti-Defamation League's 1989 survey indicates that the number and severity of anti-Semitic hate crimes have worsened nationwide. According to the 1989 audit, there were 845 episodes of vandalism and desecration, and 587 acts of harassment, threat, and assault against Jewish individuals, their property, and their institutions in 44 States and the District of Columbia. The combined total of 1,432, an approximate 12-percent increase from 1988, was the highest number of anti-Semitic incidents ever reported in the 11-year history of the audit. Figures regarding harassment, threats, and assaults alone increased 28 percent from 1988 to 1989.

While the numbers themselves make a powerful statement about the extent of the problem, some specific examples illustrate even more graphically the sad story of hatred present in our society today. The ADL reports that in La Verne, CA, four skinheads attacked an Iranian couple and newborn infant with a baseball bat. The assailants thought their victims were Jewish and subjected them to racial slurs and insults such as "Jewish niggers" during the assault. Despite pleas to be left alone, they were beaten to the ground and kicked. Witnessing the brutality, a black man came to their aid and was himself attacked. In Illinois, a Buffalo Grove Jewish community center received four bomb threats last year. With each case, the building was evacuated and the children were told the procedure was just a typical fire drill. The center chose not to publicize the incidents to avoid copycat threats. But when the center was vandalized, windows shattered and swastikas painted on the wall, the officials went public.

Equally as troubling examples can be found on our Nation's college campuses where anti-Semiti acts are up approximately 26 percent from 1988 to 1989. In New York, two Jewish students leaving a Brooklyn College fraternity party on the eve of Yom Kippur, the highest holy day in the Jewish religion, were attacked by 20 members of a gang. A third man was assaulted when he came to the aid of the students. This rising trend of violence against students is especially disturbing as university environments are meant to stimulate free ideological exchange in the pursuit of knowledge.

While the ADL's report is very important to understanding anti-Semitic violence, we must also have a means to learn about crimes against other groups as well. That is why I am pleased that the Senate overwhelmingly passed the Hate Crimes Statistics Act S. 419 on February 8. As you know, the bill requires the Attorney General to collect data on crimes motivated by hatred based on race, religion, ethnicity, or sexual orientation. I am hopeful that the House will quickly pass the Senate bill so the Attorney General can begin national data collection.

In discussing the hate crimes bill on the Senate floor, my colleague from Utah, Senator HATCH, most accurately noted the destructiveness of hate in our society and crimes committed as a consequence. "Hate crimes are among the most heinous of all crimes because they strike so deeply at their victims' individuality and self esteem." Members of the Jewish faith know only too well the pain of this aggression and have a deep-seated desire to stop it and prosecute these hate-mongers. I salute the efforts of the ADL and believe that the Hate Crimes Statistics Act will greatly complement their efforts.

I ask that the following portion of the Anti-Defamation League's audit be printed in the RECORD.

The excerpt follows:

SENATE AMENDMENT 110

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I would like to add my name as a cosponsor to Senate amendment 110, which would provide certain service-connected disabled veterans who are retired members of the Armed Forces to concurrently receive military retirement pay and VA disability compensation.

Under current law, career soldiers wishing to receive VA disability compensation must waive an amount of their retirement pay equal to the amount of VA disability compensation they collect. Over the past couple of years, I have been contacted by many new Mexicans who feel military retirees are being treated unfairly, and they want the current situation remedied. At this time, I would like to have printed in the RECORD an example of letters from two of my constituents that describe the disabled military retirees concerns.

The letters follow:

NOVEMBER 2, 1989.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Dirksen Bldg.,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: This great Nation was built and founded on trust, fairness and equality. The Revolutionary War was fought by our Forefathers in order that we future Americans would enjoy the above. The Civil War was fought to eliminate bondage. World War II also was fought in order that our way of life would be preserved. Then why has Congress placed the service-connected disabled career military veterans into bondage?

Yes, bondage. The service-connected disabled military retirees are the only service-connected disabled American veterans forced to pay for their sc disabilities. This particular group of America's veterans must surrender a dollar of earned retired pay for each dollar received from the Veterans Affairs for their disabilities. Where is the trust, fairness and equality granted to us by our Forefathers in the 18th Century and continued to be protected by today's military retirees and active duty personnel?

It is stated that the cost to permit concurrent receipt of earned retired pay and VA compensation would be tremendous. The military retirees did not question what the cost would be to protect the American way of life; why does Congress question concurrent receipt? The retirees earned the retired pay for services rendered. The VA compensation is to compensate those who became disabled while serving in the military. Therefore, these are two (2) separate entitlements. Veterans Affairs Compensation is for pain and suffering and loss of earning capacity.

Bills have been introduced in both, the Senate and House of Representatives to eliminate this gross injustice. I ask for your cosponsorship to make certain that the injustice is eliminated, please contact Senator Spark M. Matsunaga indicating your cosponsorship of S. 190 as amended.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

STEPHEN WOLONSKY.

FEBRUARY 11, 1990.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate,
Committee on the Budget,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOMENICI: Your distinguished colleague, Senator Spark M. Matsunaga, (D-HI), has requested a mark-up on S 190 as amended.

To help in making your decision in cosponsoring the bill, I would like to dispel several of the false accusations made by Dept. of Defense, Dept. of Veterans Affairs and Congressional Budget Office.

1. The 1891 law prohibiting concurrent receipt of earned military pay and Veterans Affairs Compensation is an obsolete law for this era. When first enacted, one Senator Cockrell of Missouri could not visualize a military retiree receiving retired pay based on 75 percent of base pay and a measly $8.00 per month disability compensation.

2. DOD, DVA and CBO continually stated that 430,000 + service connected disabled military retirees would come under the bill. This is erroneous. It would only affect approximately 280,000 who have earned the longevity retirement. The others served less than 20 years military.

3. April 1988, DOD stated that $762 million is being waived by the military retirees. CBO states that the cost will be much higher because of the Budget Authority. S 190 as amended as Senator Matsunaga has indicated would cost approximately $150 million per year. CBO again uses two (2) sets of figures: Budget Authority of $2 billion and outlays of $900 million over the next five (5) years. Why is it that CBO uses these two figures concerning concurrent receipt, but not for any other expenditures?

4. Civil Service retirees do receive both retired pay and disability compensation under FECA, 5 USC, section 8107.

5. Disabled veterans employed by/retired from Civil Service are permitted to count military service towards Civil Service retirement. The military years are the same period in which the disability was incurred, thus the "same period of service."

6. So-called "generous" benefits mentioned by Judge Margolis, U.S. Court of Claims, are given to all 100 percent service-connected disabled veterans and families. Therefore, there are "similarly situated groups" which the Judge stated do not exist.

After reviewing these claims, it is hoped that you would cosponsor S 190 as amended in honor of a great warrior on the battlefield and in the Halls of Congress. Senator Spark M. Matsunaga deserves your praise and honor by cosponsoring S 190 as amended. Thank you.

Most sincerely,

DOUGLAS M. ROGERS,
U.S. Navy, retired,
40 percent service-connected disabled.

Mr. President, after having looked carefully into this issue, I have concluded that the disabled military retirees have legitimate concerns. It appears that there may be inequities in the system, and I think it is important for these concerns to be addressed.

The Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee has scheduled markup for this amendment on March 8. I think the committee needs to work through this matter. Obviously, cost is a consideration, and the committee will have to accommodate inequities within this context. According to CBO, this bill will increase budget authority by $1.5 billion and outlays by $740 million over a 5-year period. This is considered to be direct spending.

While we are a long way from enacting this bill into law, I would remind my colleagues that this is entitlement legislation. The increases we approve in entitlement legislation would have a direct and permanent effect on the deficit.

There are many of us in Congress who would like to do more for those who have served our country. However, this fiscal year we will need to reduce the deficit by $36 billion under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. Simply put, the Federal deficit limits how much we can do—not just for our Nation's veterans, but in all areas of national priority.

Mr. President, in cosponsoring this legislation, I am hopeful that the committee will be able to work through the concerns of the military retirees as well as concerns about the cost of this bill. With that in mind, I am sure the committee can find an equitable solution to all concerned.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, on February 16 we celebrated the 72d anniversary of the declaration of an independent Lithuania. This anniversary is one of great importance not only to Lithuanians and to Lithuanian-Americans, but to all people concerned with freedom.

On February 16, 1918, the Lithuanian people, after subjugation by czarist Russia and imperial Germany, gained control of their own country. But after only 21 short years, this flourishing democratic nation again fell victim to its totalitarian neighbors. Both Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union invaded the country. Stalin forcibly incorporated Lithuania into the Soviet Union in 1940, undertaking mass deportations and executions of Lithuanian leaders.

Now, almost 50 years since Stalin's invasion, Lithuanians are still fighting for their independence. Over the years their country has been illegally occupied and politically, economically, and culturally repressed. Huge demonstrations for independence in Vilnius and across Lithuania continue to remind Americans what is means to have to fight for freedom.

That, Mr. President, is exactly what the anniversary of Lithuanian independence symbolizes: fighting for freedom. At a time when so many peoples have recently made significant democratic gains and when the Lithuanians have just conducted highly successful elections, it is easy to become complacent that the tide of democracy is moving along well. The tide is not moving fast enough.

Lithuania has sought true self-determination for five decades. Its people, like all those in the Baltic states, have suffered censorship, religious repression and russification. Lithuania is still recognized as an independent nation by this government. Its continued occupation is immoral and illegal.

The struggle of Lithuanians to restore their nation is the struggle of all domocratic people. It is a struggle that reminds us all of the sacrifices that are freely made for democracy. It is a struggle that represents the highest ideals of this country: self-determination for free people in a free society. It is a struggle for true democracy that this Congress and this administration must fully support.●

WETLANDS AS AN EDUCATIONAL TOOL

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, educators in America are always looking for new and innovative ways of teaching our children. That's not always an easy task. It's even more difficult to combine book learning and essential life skills with broader and less exacting interests.

However, Mr. Jim Mundell, a life science teacher at Dunstan Junior High School in Lakewood, CO, has found an approach to teaching science that not only is interesting but is beneficial to the community. His hands-on approach to science has a large impact on his students, who come to learn and enjoy science through active community programs.

This creative approach has engendered an "Adopt-a-Wetland" service project. Students in Mr. Mundell's class were taught about the environmental importance of wetlands and their ecosystems. Interest in the subject led the students to adopt a nearby wetland which they now assist in maintaining. Beside instilling a sense of civic responsibility and pride in the students, this project has given many students a greater understanding of basic science, and lower animal life cycles. Further, the project has preserved for the community an important environmental, ecological, and aesthetic property for everyone to enjoy.

America needs to emphasize science at the elementary school level. I believe Jim Mundell and his students at Dunstan Junior High have found a way to make learning fun, interesting, and useful.

As part of their wetlands project, some of the students studied the different insects and animals native to a wetlands. I would like to take this opportunity to insert in the RECORD the students' descriptions of this program and of their research

The material follows:

MEET THE WETLANDS

Swamps, marshes and bogs were for years thought to be worthless lands. Only in recent years have we discovered the importance of these wetland areas. Wetlands are wet spongy lands that act as collection and drainage areas. Farmers often plowed these areas under in order to use the wetlands to grow crops. Urban developers used to fill these lands in to build homes or offices. The true importance of wetland areas is just beginning to be revealed. The Environmental Protection Agency has been charged with the responsibility of enforcing national legislation that protects these areas.

Wetlands serve an important purpose in regulating water run off. During high run off periods, water collects in wetland areas where the excess water is slowly absorbed into the water table. If wetlands are filled in, the water that would have collected in the wetland will run into the rivers, swelling them above flood stage.

Wetlands help to filter the waters that accumulate in them. As the water collects in the wetlands, it slowly seeps into the soil and down to the water table. As it does this, many wastes and other materials are filtered out. This filtering process is very important to reclaiming the water in the wetlands.

Perhaps the most obvious role of the wetlands is the variety of wildlife that it can support. Within the wetlands is a complex and very unique ecosystem. The articles inside are descriptions of some of the different types of organisms that can be found in a wetland area. The articles are a result of the Adopt-A-Wetland project started by the students at Dunstan Junior High this past school year (1988-1989).

ADOPT-A-WETLAND

Adopt-A-Wetland is a service project started by the 7th grade students at Dunstan Junior High. Mr. Jim Mundell, a Life Science teacher at the school, was looking for a project that would get students involved in doing science instead of just learning about science Students involved with this project brainstormed things that they would like to do with their newly adopted wetland and decided on the following list of ideas:

1. Pick up trash regularly.
2. Write a brochure describing the wetland.
3. Conduct classes for neighborhood schools and others decribing the importance of the wetland.
4. Post "No Littering" signs.
5. Post habitat descriptor signs that describe different habitats and animals in the wetland.
6. Conduct scientific surveys of the area that would include such things as water tests, population studies and changes that take place seasonally and over a long term.
7. Place nesting boxes in the area.

This project could not have been accomplished without the support and involvement of the Environmental Protection Agency and in particular CeCe Forget. If you have any questions about this project, please feel free to call Ms. Forget at 293-1693 or Mr. Mundell at Dunstan Junior High School at 985-1545.

MALLARDS

(By Steve Sprague and Jeff Miller)

Mallards fertilize the grass for the wetlands with their disposables. Mallards eat some of the bad stuff at the bottom of the lake to preserve the wetlands. Mostly mallards use the wetlands to hide their nests from predators such as raccoons, skunks, foxes, crows, gulls, snapping turtles, and humans.

Mallards or greenheads are one of the most common wild ducks found throughout North America, Europe and Asia. Mallards range from 20-28 inches (51-71 centimeters) in length. During the breeding season, the mallard drake is strikingly colored, having a glossy head that is green, a white ring neck, a purple chestnut breast, gray black feathers that curl up at the end. The hen mallard is not pretty. She has duller, brownish feathers. In warmer months, mallards nest chiefly near northern prairie marshes, wetlands, and ponds. Migration is near southern wetlands in the winter. Mallards usually nest on the ground. Females lay 8 to 10 dull yellow or greenish eggs. It takes 26 days for the eggs to hatch. When the eggs are hatched the ducklings are able to swim immediately and will be able to fly in 8 weeks.

A hen mallard's voice is a loud resonant quack when she is flying and the drake mallards voice is a lower-pitch kwek-kwek when it is flying. When mallards fly, they have their white tail and underwings contrast with their dark chest and head.

CATTAILS

(By Danielle DeSawl and Jamie Jernigan)

These tall brown spiked plants are found in the marshy areas throughout the U.S. and are favorable habitat for marshlike birds and muskrats. There are 15 species of cattails all classified in the genus Typha.

Cattails stand 3 to 9 feet high. The leaves are 1" wide and taller than the stem. They also have a flat swordlike shape. Flowers on the cattail are the calyv and corolla which are represented by britles. The male and female flowers are on separate stems that are 6" long. Male flowers fade after pollen is shed leaving bare stalk May through July. The spike of the flower is made up of hundreds of closely packed petals that appear in July and August.

The rootstock is made up mostly of starch and can be eaten like asparagus. The spikes can be boiled and also eaten like corn on the cob. Sprouts can be put on salads or boiled and served like greens. The brown spikes are sometimes used as winter decorations.

FROGS: AN ANIMAL OF THE WETLANDS

(By Tania Pagliasotti and Jane Luebcke)

Frogs belong to the class called Amphibians. They spend part of their lives on water and part of their lives on land. Their name accounts for their double life "amphi" means "double" and "bois" means "life." Frogs have moist, smooth skin and are long and slender waisted. They live in swamps and forests. In the spring when it is time to lay her eggs, she goes back to the water and lays 1,000-20,000 eggs.

Baby frogs' lives begin in a jelly covered egg laid in the water. When it hatches it has a streaming body and a rudder-like tail. It lives in water and breathes with gills. While it is a baby, it is called a tadpole. The tadpole is fish-like shaped and has no eyelids and a mouth suited to nibble. This stage is called Larva. Then it hatches into an adult frog.

The grown frog hops on four legs and breathes through lungs. From childhood to adulthood is called Metamorphosis. The grown frog has a mouth suited for catching insects and has eyelids. They have no tails, but have very strong legs and are excellent leapers and hoppers.

Mating is a time when the male frog attracts its mate by calling "JUG-O-RUM". The call is made with mouth closed. The sound is made by air passing back and forth between the lungs and vocal chords. When the pouch swells it makes the sound louder. Then it starts all over from the beginning.

DRAGONFLIES

(By Jim Morgan)

Dragonfly or "Darning Needle" is the name for an order of large beneficial insects that feed on harmful insects such as gnats and mosquitoes. There are two suborders: damsel flies and true dragonflies.

Dragonflies generally are brightly colored with yellow, green, blue, or red spots or stripes that stand out against darker backgrounds. A dragonfly has a large head, bulging eyes, and strong jaws. Three pairs of medium-sized legs are set forward of a long, slender abdomen. Two pairs of transparent, veined wings are attached to the central body. Wingspread varies from two to seven inches.

Damsel flies are smaller and more fragile than true dragonflies. Damsel flies fly over reeds and grasses around ponds where they obtain food by catching insects. At rest, damsel flies hold their wings straight up from their bodies.

True dragonflies are larger, stronger, and more ferocious. They chase insects through the air, use all six legs to catch the prey, and crush it with strong jaws. At rest, true dragonflies spread their wings flat, at right angles to their bodies.

THE LIFE OF A CRAYFISH

(By Cassandra Ringel)

The Crayfish is closely related to a lobster. Like the lobster, the crayfish is also edible. The crayfish is considered good food in Europe and North America. The crayfish lives in swampy places. It lives along lakes, rivers, and under stones in wet soil. Crayfish are fresh-water crustaceans and are also called crawfish. Crayfish seldom grow over six inches long.

The colors can range from white through pink, orange and brown to greenish black and dark blue. Crayfish have a hard back structure called an exoskeleton. At night and at daybreak, crayfish are most active. Most crayfish find their food at night including snails, small fish, tadpoles, and insects. Crayfish have five legs on each side of its body. The front two legs are shaped as sharp claws used to capture prey. The other legs are used for walking and also structured for swimming. These legs are called swimmerets. Crayfish can shed a leg or claw if it gets caught and a new one will soon grow back.

The crayfish have bad burrowing habits that may destroy cropland or weaken levees and mill dams. They breed in the fall and the females curl up their tails to form a basket for carrying eggs until they hatch the next summer.

THE MUSKRAT

(By Steven Wahrle)

The muskrat is a relative of the beaver. It is equally aquatic but much smaller. This little animal rarely reaches three pounds. With its plump little body, whiskered face, and long naked tail it looks like an overgrown mouse. The tail of a muskrat is flattened on the sides and is quite scaly. The hind feet of this rodent are partially webbed. This give them additional thrust when swimming. The soft upper fur of the muskrat is a uniform dark brown in contrast to its gray underparts.

The muskrat gets its name from two little scent glands. These glands, or castor bags, produce a reeking musk-like odor, especially strong in breeding time. The muskrat feeds mainly on plant material. Muskrats sometimes add meat to their diet. They have been seen eating fish, clams, insects and snails. The muskrat especially enjoys mussels and regularly explores the banks and bottoms of lakes to find them.

Muskrat lodges vary in size. Some of the biggest lodges have been known to be ten feet in diameter and four feet high. The smallest lodges are hardly larger than a bushel basket. A muskrat's home may be built on a dense mass of sweet flag, a group of willow sprouts or a pool choked up with emergent plants and silt. The muskrat will most often choose a moist little promontory and have to dig a channel and plunge hole several feet below the floor to reach navigable water.

THE COMMON SNAPPING TURTLE

(By Brad Judy)

This nocturnal reptile can be very vicious or calm. The Common Snapping Turtle is about 18" long and weighs 20-30 pounds. The Common Snapper is a relative to the larger Alligator Snapping Turtle which is usually about 26" long nad weighs 150 pounds. Although the Common Snapper has a longer neck, they both have powerful jaws.

The Common Snapper's diet is one third plants and the rest is divided between fish, young waterfowl and aquatic invertebrates. It forages its food from the bottom of its muddy, still watered home where it spends most of its time.

The Snapper's vicious temper on land makes them dangerous to handle. When captured, they secrete an unpleasant odor. Often found basking on the surface, this turtle rarely comes on land. In the water, though, it is seldom ill-tempered.

SQUIRRELS

(By Jenny Clay)

Many people have been fascinated by squirrels for years. There are roughly 1300 different kinds of squirrels. The word squirrel comes from two Greek words meaning "shadow tail." A squirrel's tail serves many purposes. A tail will ease falls if a squirrel falls down. Squirrels use their tails as shields when fighting. They also use them as unbrellas when it rains, as a blanket when it's cold, and when balancing on high tree tops. Squirrels live in all parts of the world. They can adapt very easily. Some squirrels live in hollow logs and treetops. Others live in burrows under the ground. Squirrels build nests of trees or leaves. The offspring are born in the spring or the summer. There are 2-6 squirrels in a litter. The young ones stay in the nest for up to 7 weeks. Squirrels are blind and hairless when first born. At 10 weeks they are completely weaned. At 5 or 6 months the squirrels are on their own. The mother will leave the nest for them and build another one for herself.

Some squirrels can be 3 inches to more than on foot long. The tail can be just as big. The color of a squirrel can vary from black, reddish-brown, to gray. A squirrel's diet consists mostly of nuts, fruits, berries, and wild honey, but they will eat anything. They will eat pine seeds, even pine cones, fungi, tree buds, bark, birds, and eggs.

Squirrels can be classified into two different groups, ground squirrels and tree squirrels. The squirrel is usually diurnal, but some are nocturnal. A diurnal (daytime) squirrel's main enemies are the weasels and hawks. A nocturnal (nightime) squirrel's main enemy is the owl.●

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I hereby submit to the Senate the latest budget scorekeeping report for fiscal year 1990, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in response to section 308(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended.

This report was prepared consistent with standard scorekeeping conventions. This report also serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 311 of the Budget Act.

This report shows that current level spending is under the budget resolution by $3.5 billion in budget authority, and over the budget resolution by $4 billion in outlays. Current level is under the revenue floor by $5.2 billion.

The current estimate of the deficit for purposes of calculating the maximum deficit amount under section 311(a) of the Budget Act is $114.6 billion, $14.6 billion above the maximum deficit amount for 1990 of $100 billion.

The report follows:

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, February 26, 1990.

Hon. JIM SASSER,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The attached report shows the effects of Congressional action on the budget for fiscal year 1990 and is current through February 23, 1990. The estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues are consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of the 1990 concurrent resolution on the Budget (H. Con. Res. 106). This report is submitted under section 308(b) and in aid of section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended, and meets the requirements for Senate scorekeeping of Section 5 of S. Con. Res. 32, the 1986 first concurrent resolution on the budget.

Since my last report, dated February 22, 1990, there has been no action that affects the curent level of spending or revenues.

Sincerely,

ROBERT D. REISCHAUER,
Director.

CBO WEEKLY SCOREKEEPING REPORT FOR THE U.S. SENATE, 101ST CONG. 2D SESS. AS OF FEB. 23, 1990

[In billions of dollars]

	Current level [1]	Budget resolution H.Con.Res. 106	Current level +/− resolution
FISCAL YEAR 1990
Budget authority	1,325.9	1,329.4	−3.5
Outlays	1,169.2	1,165.2	4.0
Revenues	1,060.3	1,065.5	−5.2

Guaranteed loan commitments	114.7	107.3	7.4
Deficit	114.6	[2] 100.0	[3] 14.6

[1] The current level represents the estimated revenue and direct spending effects (budget authority and outlays) of all legislation that Congress has enacted in this or previous sessions or sent to the President for his approval and is consistent with the technical and economic assumptions of H. Con. Res. 268. In addition, estimates are included of the direct spending effects for all entitlement or other mandatory programs requiring annual appropriations under current law even though the appropriations have not been made. The current level of debt subject to limit reflects the latest U.S. Treasury information on public debt transactions. In accordance with sec. 102(a) of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Reaffirmation Act (101 Stat. 762) the current level deficit amount compared to the maximum deficit amount does not include asset sales.

[2] Maximum deficit amount [MDA] in accordance with section 3(7)(E) of the Congressional Budget Act, as amended.

[3] Current level plus or minus MDA.

TRIBUTE TO GENE JOYCE, OAK RIDGE, TN

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. Gene Joyce of Oak Ridge, TN, who recently retired from the law firm he joined nearly 40 years ago. Of course, it's hard for those who know Gene to imagine that he'll ever really retire. Even after official retirement, his involvement in the business and political life of Oak Ridge continues to be as effective and widespread as ever. Gene's merely doing what he's done so well for half a century—making a difference.

Since coming to work for Tennessee Eastman during World War II, Gene Joyce has been a vital leader in the development of Oak Ridge as one of the Nation's premier scientific research centers. From serving as Oak Ridge's first city attorney to helping start the city's first bank, Gene has been a key force behind Oak Ridge's success. Among the many organizations Gene has helped develop or lead are the Roane/Anderson Economic Council, the University of Tennessee Research Corp., the Tennessee Resource Valley on Regional Economic Development, and the Tennessee Technology Corridor. In my opinion, it's because of people like Gene Joyce that the United States has a bright future in technology development and a continued role as the world's scientific leader.

Although Gene may never slow his pace and enjoy the leisurely retirement he deserves, I am pleased to have this opportunity to let him know how grateful his fellow Tennesseans are for his faithful efforts on behalf of Oak Ridge and the entire State.●

TRIBUTE TO HARRY MOSKOS—RELIGION JOURNALIST OF THE YEAR

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, today, I would like to join with the Tennessee Association of Churches in commending editor, Harry Moskos and the Knoxville News-Sentinel for "its imaginative venture in reporting religion."

Harry Moskos was recently honored by the Tennessee Association of Churches as its "Religion Journalist of the Year" during the association's 40th annual general assembly in Nashville.

The association singled out Mr. Moskos and the News-Sentinel for moving to expand the print space devoted to coverage of religious news and renaming the section "Family and Religion."

Mr. Moskos, is an Archon of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of the Greek Orthodox Church, and an active member of St. George Church in Knoxville.

Before joining the News-Sentinel, Mr. Moskos was executive editor of the El Paso Herald Press. He had also served as managing editor of the Albuquerque Tribune, and as bureau chief for the Associated Press, Honolulu bureau.

Mr. Moskos is regarded by his peers as both a thorough and fair journalist. Under his stewardship, as editor of the News-Sentinel, he continues to be both insightful and innovative in his efforts to ensure that the paper reflects the views and concerns of the Knoxville community.

Clearly, Harry Moskos' dedication to the community, as well as his commitment to the values of faith and family, make him a most worthy recipient of this award, and I congratulate him and the staff of the News-Sentinel.

Mr. President, I would like to request that the article which appeared in the Orthodox Observer recognizing this honor be inserted following my remarks.

The article follows:

[From the Orthodox Observer, December 20, 1989]

HARRY MOSKOS NAMED RELIGION JOURNALIST OF THE YEAR

KNOXVILLE, TENN.—The Tennessee Association of Churches recently honored Harry Moskos, editor of The News-Sentinel, as its Religion Journalist of the Year. His newspaper was singled out for its "imaginative venture in reporting religion."

The association noted that The News-Sentinel doubled the space given to religious news and renamed the section Family & Religion.

Moskos, an Archon of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, accepted the award at the association's 40th annual General Assembly in Nashville.

Before joining the Knoxvillle daily, Moskos served as executive editor of the El Paso Herald Post. Previously, he was managing editor of the Albuquerque Tribune and also was a former chief of the Associated Press' Honolulu bureau.

While in Hawaii, Moskos helped organize Sts. Constantine and Helen Greek Orthodox Church. He also played a key role in organizing St. Nicholas Church in El Paso. He is currently an active member of St. George Church in Knoxville.

Moskos is a former member of the Archdiocesan Council and has served on the Denver and Atlanta diocesan councils.●

AUTHORITY FOR USE OF HART SENATE OFFICE BUILDING ATRIUM

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 249 authorizing the use of the Hart Atrium on March 5, 1990, for a performance by the Western Kentucky University Choir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 249) authorizing the use of the Hart Senate Office Building Atrium on March 5, 1990, for a performance by the Western Kentucky University Choir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 249) was agreed to.

The resolution reads as follows:

S. RES. 249

Resolved, That the Western Kentucky University Choir under the sponsorship of Senator Ford is authorized to use the Hart Senate Office Building Atrium on March 5, 1990 for a musical performance beginning at approximately 12:30 p.m. and ending at 1:00 p.m.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE—HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 87

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 28, upon the conclusion of the first rollcall vote, the Senate proceed immediately, without any intervening action or debate, to the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 87, concerning Iranian persecution of the Baha'is, provided the resolution has been received by the Senate.

I further ask unanimous consent there be no time for debate on the resolution; that no amendments or motions be in order except a motion to reconsider and table; that the Senate proceed immediately to vote on the resolution; and that Senators be permitted to insert statements in the RECORD relating to the resolution until the close of business on Wednesday.

I further ask unanimous consent that it now be in order to request the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I dislike doing this, but I did not know about this particular request myself, and therefore I am constrained to object. Perhaps by morning we can work it out.

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the Republican leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is noted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to executive session to consider the following nominations:

Calendar No. 608, Erich W. Bretthauer, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

Calendar No. 609, Jacqueline L. Phillips, to be Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission;

Calendar No. 610, Hilda Gay Legg, to be Alternate Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission.

I further ask unanimous consent that the nominees be confirmed en bloc, that any statements appear in the RECORD as if read, that motions to reconsider be laid upon the table en bloc, the President be immediately notified of the Senate's action and that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

Erich W. Bretthauer, of Nevada, to be an Assistant Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

Jacqueline L. Phillips, of Maryland, to be Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission.

Hilda Gay Legg, of Kentucky, to be Alternate Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now return to legislative session.

REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY—TREATY DOCUMENT 101-13

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the Consular Convention with the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria (Treaty Document No. 101-13), transmitted to the Senate today by the President.

I also ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time; that it be referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed; and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The message of the President is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I am transmitting, for the Senate's advice and consent to ratification, the Consular Convention between the United States of America and the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria signed at Washington on January 12, 1989. I am also transmitting, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to the convention.

The signing of this convention is a significant step in the process of enhancing and broadening the relationship between the United States and Algeria. There currently does not exist a bilateral agreement on consular relations between the two countries. The convention sets forth clear obligations with respect to matters such as notification of consular officers of the arrest and detention of nationals of their country and protection of the rights and interests of nationals of their country.

The people of the United States and Algeria have a tradition of friendship and cooperation. I welcome the opportunity through this consular convention to promote the good relations between the two countries. I recommend the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the convention and give its advice and consent to ratification.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 27, 1990.

MEASURE TO BE PLACED ON CALENDAR—H.R. 3910

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 3910 providing for a national assessment of programs under title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 be placed on the calendar when received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPRESENTATION BY SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator MITCHELL, I send to the desk a resolution to direct the Senate legal counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in a pending case in the U.S. Supreme Court and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 251) to direct the Senate Legal Counsel to appear as amicus curiae in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, et al.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Supreme Court will be considering this term several challenges to a policy of the Federal Communications Commission to promote ownership by minorities and women of television and radio stations. Among the questions being presented to the Supreme Court is whether the Congress acted constitutionally in enacting legislation, most recently as part of the Commerce, Justice, and State Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1990, that requires the Federal Communications Commission to continue to implement its affirmative action policy.

The Congress has recognized two needs in legislating in this area during the last decade. One need, as recognized by a House-Senate conference committee in 1982, is to overcome "the effects of past inequities stemming from racial and ethnic discrimination [that] have resulted in a severe underrepresentation of minorities in the media of mass communications." H.R. Rept. No. 765, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 43 (1982). The other, as articulated by the Senate Committee on Appropriations in 1987, is to promote diversity in station ownership in order to promote, in turn, "diversity of programming and improved service to minority and women audiences." S. Rept. No. 182, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 76 (1987).

While the Federal Communications Commission is defending its policy in the Supreme Court, the Department of Justice has filed a brief for the United States as amicus curiae in one of the pending cases, Metro Broadcasting, Inc., versus Federal Communications Commission, which joins the petitioner in challenging the Commission's policy. Under the aspect of the policy that is directly involved in this case, the FCC, in evaluating applications for licenses, gives credit to minority and female ownership in addition to other attributes of applicants such as broadcasting experience.

It should be emphasized, as the court of appeals did in the opinion that is under review in this case, Winter Park Communications, Inc. v. FCC, 873 F. 2d 347, 354-55 (D.C. Cir. 1989), that the Commission's policy is a flexible one that does not involve any quotas or fixed targets, and that the policy has been endorsed by the Congress, which the Supreme Court recognizes to possess particular competence and authority to enforce the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection.

The following resolution would authorize the Senate legal counsel to file a brief in the name of the Senate as amicus curiae in support of the Commission's policy and the actions that the Congress has taken to ratify the policy and to require its continuation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 251) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution and its preamble are as follows:

S. RES. 251

Whereas, in Metro Broadcasting, Inc., v. Federal Communications Commission, et al., No. 89-453, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, the petitioner has presented for review a question of the constitutionality of a provision of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-162, 103 Stat. 988, 1020, and related measures for fiscal years 1988 and 1989, to provide for the expansion of minority and women ownership of broadcasting licenses;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(c), 288e(a); 706(a), and 713(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. §§ 288b(c), and 288l(a)(1988), the Senate may direct its Counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in any legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, et al., in support of the constitutionality of provisions of the Departments of Commerce, Justice, and Senate, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-162, 103 Stat. 988, 1020, and related measures that the Congress has enacted to promote the expansion of minority and women ownership of broadcasting licenses.

MODIFICATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 1266

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that amendment No. 1266 to S. 1430 just agreed to be modified to reflect the change which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. No objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

RECES UNTIL 10:30 A.M.; MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, as it now almost has, it stand in recess until 10:30 a.m. tomorrow morning, Wednesday, February 28, and following the time for the two leaders there be a period for morning business until 11 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, on tomorrow, Wednesday, at 11 a.m., the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1430, the National and Community Service Act of 1989. Rollcall votes can be expected early and continuing throughout Wednesday's session.

RECESSS UNTIL 10:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I see the Republican leader has no further business. If there is no other Senator seeking recognition, I now ask unanimous consent the Senate stand in recess under the previous order until 10:30 a.m., Wednesday, February 28.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 7:56 p.m. recessed until Wednesday, February 28, 1990, at 10:30 a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate February 27, 1990:

APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

JACQUELINE L. PHILLIPS, OF MARYLAND, TO BE FEDERAL COCHAIRMAN OF THE APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION.

HILDA GAY LEGG, OF KENTUCKY, TO BE ALTERNATE FEDERAL COCHAIRMAN OF THE APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

ERICH W. BRETTHAUER, OF NEVADA, TO BE AN ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY.

THE ABOVE NOMINATIONS WERE APPROVED SUBJECT TO THE NOMINEES' COMMITMENT TO RESPOND TO REQUESTS TO APPEAR AND TESTIFY BEFORE ANY DULY CONSTITUTED COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IT IS TIME TO ADDRESS THE ROOT CAUSES OF THE PROBLEMS IN KOSOVO

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, recent reports have told the American people about the bloodshed in Kosovo and the tragic history of that province. Over 30 innocent protesters were killed in past weeks, and hundreds detained for peacefully demanding an end to martial law in that province and the release of ethnic Albanian political prisoners. Like millions of other Eastern Europeans who fought for change in their countries, ethnic Albanian demonstrators are asking that Yugoslavia be opened up to the winds of freedom that could bring welcome change in that country. All problems have a root cause. The lack of freedom, democracy, and respect for human rights are the root causes of the crisis in Kosovo. It is time for Yugoslav officials to quickly address the causes of the violence in that province.

The Albanians in Kosovo want free elections, respect for basic liberties, political pluralism, and the restoration of the autonomy that the province of Kosovo enjoyed until it was recently taken away at the insistence of the President of Serbia, Slobodan Milosevic. He is a rabid Serbian nationalist who is determined to reassert Serbian control of that country. His policies are driving Yugoslavia to the brink of civil war.

Mr. Milosevic is also wedded to the idea of a one party state for Yugoslavia and is determined to keep the Communist Party of Yugoslavia in the driver's seat. He should wake up and realize that his blind pursuit of these short-sighted goals is running against the tide of change in Eastern Europe. It is time for him to follow the lead of other Eastern European nations and strongly support the introduction of political pluralism, market economics, justice, and respect for basic freedoms in Yugoslavia.

I have been closely monitoring the crisis in Kosovo and want to share with other Members a thoughtful article from the French newspaper, "Le Monde Diplomatique," which carefully documents the terrible human rights abuses directed against the ethnic Albanian community in Kosovo. Our European friends share our concerns about recent tragic events in that province. After reading this article, it becomes evident that the protesters in Kosovo are voicing legitimate complaints about the absence of basic freedoms, and justice and the threats of Serbian nationalism that could lead to the destruction of Yugoslavia. It is time for Yugoslavia to join the nations of Eastern Europe who made 1989 a new dawn of freedom in those once closed societies.

I commend the following article concerning Kosovo by Mr. Antoine Garapon, a magistrate and a member of the International Federation of Human Rights, to my colleagues and want to thank Mr. Petraitis of CRS for this translation of the original article.

The article follows:

[Source: Le Monde Diplomatique, November 1989]

SERIOUS ATTACKS ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN YUGOSLAVIA—"THE DIFFERENTIATED ONES," ALBANIANS OF THE KOSOVO PROVINCE

(An explosive situation prevails in Kosovo, a province in the Serbian Republic (Yugoslavia) mainly populated by Albanians. Grappling with the reappearance of nationalism, threatened with breaking up, has the Yugoslav Federation no other means to save itself than to encourage attacks on human rights? Since the proclamation of the state of siege by the Belgrade authorities last February, the local leaders have been expanding their repression which is called "differentiation.")

(By Antoine Garapon) [1]

An atmosphere of fear reigns in Kosovo. Several individuals refused to meet the delegation of the International Federation of Human Rights coming to investigate on the spot.[2] The provincial authorities, especially Mr. Vejsel Latifi, Minister of Justice, have rejected its request to visit the prison where Mr. Azem Vllasi, former secretary of the League of Communists, as well as other political detainees are jailed, including the young Hartmona, sentenced to two and a half years in prison for having "crossed" a demonstration accompanied by a girl friend. Nevertheless, we were able to collect eyewitness testimonies thanks, especially, to the help of a Catholic priest: the majority of the population is Muslim, but often atheist, and our interlocutors were unanimous in admitting that the tensions have no religious undertones.

After several miles of a dirt road, about 35 miles from Pristina, the capital of Kosovo, we were welcomed at a very modest farm. "I was a judge in Klina," Ali Foniqi, 35, explains to us, "when on December 6, 1985 in the morning, when I was on my way to work, I was arrested by policemen in civilian dress, and taken to the commissariat where I was savagely beaten. I fainted at 11 a.m. and a physician came to examine me. From 1:00 to 8:00 p.m. they stopped beating me, but from 8:00 p.m. until 5:00 a.m. the next morning, two policemen continued to beat me, threatening to jail my wife and my brothers; during all this time I had to stay in a standing position, hands against the wall. Finally, I had to "confess" that I had crossed into Albania—which was impossible that winter due to snow and bad weather—and that I had met politicians: not knowing the names, I had to give those of singers.

"The torturing was very cruel: I urinated blood for 10 days, and I caught pleurisy due to cold water being poured on my face and body to revive me. Moreover, a physician came to give me injections. The torturing lasted two and a half months: I was interrogated from 6:00 a.m. until 2:00 p.m. every day. Afterwards the policemen took me to a psychologist who asked me stupid questions such as knowing which was heavier, one kilogram of feathers or one kilogram of lead, or which were the neighboring countries of Yugoslavia.

"I was sentenced to seven and a half years in prison in the first instance, but the punishment was reduced to a three-year term after an appeal. I have been out of prison for the last two years and I had to leave for the countryside; I no longer have the right to be hired, the same applies to my wife, who was a teacher. My passport was taken away. But I am an intellectual: I don't know how to work the land, and, since the tortures, I don't have a lot of strength; from time to time I get dizzy and even have hallucinations.

"In my opinion, all this happened because my brother really went to Albania. He thought he would complete his studies easier over there. He has been arrested and is serving his five and a half year prison sentence in Croatia."

Mr. Mustaf Krasnici's story is nearly identical: he was arrested with his father on the day of his wedding, during the reception. He was accused of possession of a book published in Albania and containing all the clippings from the international press pertaining to the 1981 events in Kosovo. Both of them were tortured, above all the father, 68, a former underground fighter who is still a member of the Communist Party. They complain that needles were stuck under their fingernails. He was sentenced to two years in jail, his father to two and half years: the latter contracted tuberculosis from which he died just after he had been released. He was not informed of the death of his wife during his detention.

At this time, Mr. Mustaf Krasnici, who is in his third year of sociology studies, works on a farm: his passport was also taken from him, as well as from all his cousins, and he is under house arrest in his village which he is not allowed to leave. He is "differentiated."

The "differentiation" is quite an official procedure which enables the League of the Communists to declare an idea as contrary to the interests of the people, and, thus, to ostracize any person who adheres to it by depriving him of his employment (the Communist Party still is issuing certificates of good ideological political standing which are indispensable for getting a job!), by banning the publication of his works, and from bequeathing him property, etc. It then becomes dangerous to visit a "differentiated" individual, and, for instance, to attend a funeral of one of his family. It is a question of the loss of all civil rights.

[1] Magistrate, member of the office of the International Federation of Human Rights.

[2] The mission of the International Federation of Human Rights [IFHR] stayed in Kosovo from September 24 to 29, 1989. It was comprised of Louise Christian, Attorney of the London Bar, Salih Kabasi, professor, member of the Slovenian Committee of Human Rights, and Mr. Antoine Garapon.

It was by pure coincidence that we met Dr. X * * * (he would not like to have his name published) the day he received a letter informing him, without motivation, that he is excluded from the League of the Communists. It is in this way that the "differentiation" generally begins. The physician is the object of strong pressures since he has signed the famous appeal which asked nothing more than to preserve the 1974 Constitution. Representatives of the Party came to his office to intimidate him and ask him to leave. "It is impossible for me to live here," he said accompanying us. "I'm aware that I'll have to leave one day: they want to prevent me from talking, but they will never be able to blind me, to prevent me from understanding what is happening; my scalpel does not differentiate between Serbians and Albanians."

X * * * is a university professor, he lectures entirely in the foreign language which he teaches. Serbian students—only three of them—have refused to attend his lectures and have demanded—and obtained—teaching in the same foreign language, but given by a Serbian.

This differentiation has caused unemployment and alienated hundreds of Albanian intellectuals for eight years, but it has not affected any Serbian.

In March 1989, on the eve of the constitutional amendment restricting the autonomy of the region, the police jailed without due process several hundred economic cadres, influential personalities, even—to a lesser degree—intellectuals. This procedure, irreproachable from a strictly formal view, because the law allows assigning special residence to whomsoever tries to trouble law and order (without specifying that it is the question of imprisonment), is called "isolation."

Mr. Rexhep Iberdemaj reports that the police came at 3:00 a.m., heavily armed, to arrest him and to take him to the Pec commissariat. Then he was taken by bus with other individuals to the Leskovac prison, where they were mistreated, some of them were even tortured.

"At the entrance, a prison guard was sitting at a table with a physician, at least a man with a white jacket with a stethoscope around his neck who asked questions about our health. When I said that I had heart trouble, they left me with a shirt and I was beaten less than the others. What was the most difficult to bear was to listen to the screams of my friends who were being tortured. Has anybody died? I cannot say this: but what is certain is that ambulances came several times. I helped a comrade who passed out several times during the night and who was vomiting." (Here we recognize certain modesty of tortured persons, always preferring to speak about the suffering of others instead of their own).

"The next morning they gave me a document by virtue of which I was isolated: "The aforementioned person is capable of uniting other individuals and leading them where he wants.

"In fact the police have never forgiven me for employing a former law professor in my cafe who had been "differentiated" and who was unemployed. I did this for humanitarian reasons to help him to regain his social security for himself and for his family.

"Since my release [from prison], they have taken away my passport. I cannot have more contacts with my brothers who work abroad; one of them did not dare to come here to the funeral of my parents."

His story is interrupted by the arrival in the pub of two policemen in plain clothes who followed us for the remainder of the day. Our witness leaves us informing us of his fears of being taken to the commissariat in the evening. * * *

Mr. Anton Kollaj, from village of Zilakuqan, and Mr. Ramadan Murtez Kraniqi from the village of Zajmi, were isolated for 86 days for opposing the renaming of an Albanian school and giving it the name of Josef Broz Tito.

In the same way as the authorities "differentiate" and isolate dissidents, it seems as if Kosovo are "differentiated" from the rest of the Yugoslav Federation and isolated from the rest of the world. The violations of human rights have reached, hidden from the public international opinion, an extent and gravity with no equal in Europe, with the exception of Romania. Until now, no assessment has been made, no report presented: "Because," Mr. Ibrahim Rugova, chairman of the Writers' Association, explains to us, "people from here have acquired a phobia of any document, such terrible penalties have been imposed for keeping at home a simple text, a list, a newspaper clipping, etc."

Even as admitted by the regional authorities, from 1981 to 1988, 584,373 Kosovars of Albanian origin were summoned by the police for various reasons (from simple questioning to imprisonment) or one third of the Albanian population of the region, and 71,000 were subjected to penal trials. The repression of the March 1989 riots officially caused 27 deaths. The organizations of the defense of human rights from Kosovo in exile established a list of 58 names.

Everything that is reported here reminds us of the most archaic Stalinism, the most primitive; and this is happening in 1989, at the time of perestroika, 1,500 kilometers from Paris, in a country like Yugoslavia, about which we thought that it had banned such methods before the other Socialist countries.

HISTORY OF THE KOSOVO REGION

1913-89

1913: The Kosovo region is integrated into Serbia following the Balkan wars. It becomes a part of the new Yugoslav State in 1918.

1974: The new Yugoslav Constitution. The Kosovo region enjoys the status of an autonomous region within the Serbian Republic, with its own assembly and government.

1980: Death of Tito.

Spring 1981: Tens of thousands of Albanians of Kusovo demand the status of Republic. Bloody repression.

Summer of 1988: Demonstrations in Serbia under the slogan, "Kosovo belongs to us!"

November 1988: The Kosovo Albanians go to the streets to support their leaders dismissed by the central government.

February 1989: General strike. February 23, Belgrade imposes the state of siege on the region.

March 1989: The Kosovo Parliament ratifies a provision of the 1974 Constitution decided in Belgrade which cancels a number of regional prerogatives. At the end of March: new riots violently suppressed. Twenty-nine dead, according to the official version.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE RUDES

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor an outstanding citizen, George Rudes. He is a dynamic community leader and a visionary philanthropist. He has the high honor of being the recipient of this year's Jerusalem Award for his passionate commitment to the State of Israel.

George Rudes has been a community activist for many years. He was the youngest member of the board of directors of the Jewish Community Center and a founding member of B'nai B'rith. At the age of 30, he was elected president of the Men's Club.

Currently, George is a key activist in a number of important organizations. He is a board member of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee [AIPAC]. As a member of the Prime Minister's Club of Israel Bonds, he plays a major role in protecting the welfare of the Jewish State. Through his work at City of Hope, research is being conducted into life-threatening illnesses and his commitment to AIDS Project Los Angeles [APLA] in helping secure resources to battle the fatal disease and provide vital services for its victims.

George is president of Saint Germain, a highly successful contemporary sportswear firm that he founded in 1978. He is married to Maria Teresa and they have three children—Leslie, Lisa, and Kenneth.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join with me in saluting George Rudes—a dedicated leader and activist whose vision and commitment inspires us all.

NEW DEVICE LIKELY TO PARE NEED FOR ANIMAL RESEARCH

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to include in today's RECORD an article from the December 4, 1989, issue of HealthWeek. The article talks about a new device, the biosensor, which can measure a cell's biochemical response to a new drug or chemical and converts that measure into an electrical signal. As a long-time supporter of legislation to ensure the humane treatment of research animals, I am very excited about this new device because its application may do away with such cruel practices as the LD-50 test and the Draize test. Congratulations to Molecular Devices Corporation for coming up with this product.

[From HealthWeek, Dec. 4, 1989]

NEW DEVICE LIKELY TO PARE NEED FOR ANIMAL RESEARCH

(By Karen Southwick)

MENLO PARK, CALIF.—Futuristic technology that merges living cells and silicon chips may one day alleviate that scourge of scientific research—animal testing.

Instead of measuring the safety of an ointment by rubbing it into rabbits' eyes or the toxicity of a drug by determining how much will kill half of a group of mice, researchers could turn to biosensors—light-activated devices that detect metabolic changes in cells exposed to chemicals.

FINGERTIP SIZE

About the size of a fingertip, a biosensor screens a small number of cells extracted from an animal or a person. The sensor measures the cell's biochemical response to a new drug or chemical and converts that measurement into an electrical signal.

Biosensors are at least a year away from widespread marketing, but early results from a product made by Molecular Devices Corp., a 6-year-old private company here, indicate a host of potential applications ranging from chemical testing to medical monitoring.

Procter & Gamble Co., the giant household products and health care concern in Cincinnati, is trying out Molecular Devices' biosensor to assess how much new substances might irritate the skin or body.

"We think it's a revolutionary method [of testing] and has excellent potential," said P&G spokeswoman Linda Ulrey. The company has just begun comparing findings of the biosensor with traditional animal testing and expects that process to last about a year.

Cancer researchers at Stanford University in Stanford, Calif., have used a biosensor to identify tumor cells resistant to chemotherapy. They reported their results in the Oct. 13 issue of Science.

"We could tell in a few hours which cells were resistant and which were sensitive" to the cancer drug, said Kevin L. Ross, a postdoctoral fellow in the Stanford School of Medicine's oncology division. He said doctors eventually might use the biosensor to adjust the level and type of chemotherapy for cancer patients.

DRUG-SAFETY APPLICATIONS

Ross also saw the possibility of replacing some animals with biosensors in pharmaceutical toxicology testing. Early trials of a drug's safety often result in animal deaths, Ross said. For example, the LD50 test determines what dose of a drug is lethal to 50 percent of animals receiving it.

By using biosensors to monitor how different types of cells—such as those from the kidney or liver—respond to a drug, "qualitatively you could get as much information as from the Draize [rabbit-eye] test or the LD50," he said.

Animal rights advocates were predictably pleased with an alternative to animal testing.

WILL PREVENT MISERY

"Anything that allows you to use human cells [for testing] rather than animals will save animals a whole lot of misery and give more precise results," said Dr. Neal Barnard, president of the Washington-based Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine.

However, researchers cautioned that biosensors won't ever totally replace animals.

"Biosensors can do certain things in terms of screening a drug before it's tested in a living animal," said Dr. Michael Debakey, chancellor and head of surgery at Baylor College of Medicine in Houston. "But you've got to know how the whole body responds to the drug in an integrated setting."

Gillian Humphries, Molecular Devices' director of biological sensor development, agreed that biosensors probably will find their greatest use in early drug testing, when animals are subject to the most acute and painful tests.

SEES MARKET NICHE

Humphries said Molecular Devices sees drug research as the first market niche for biosensors. Next year, the company hopes to line up drugmakers willing to test biosensors' ability to measure the toxicity of new products. By early 1991, Molecular Devices plans to market biosensors for that purpose.

After that, Humphries said, the company will look at medical applications, including screening tumors. She said one challenge for the company will be simplifying the complicated technology enough for routine use.

Said Jim McCamant, editor of the Medical Technology Stock Letter in Berkeley, Calif.: "There is no question that biosensors are an interesting tool with many possible uses. The problem is deciding which ones to focus on."

THE SOUTH FLORIDA TREATMENT CENTER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to share with my colleagues the opening of a new detoxification clinic in Miami's Little Havana area.

The Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services [HRS] has granted the South Florida Treatment Center a license to administer a maintenance and detoxification program for heroin and other opiate addicts. This private clinic will open on Monday, March 5 and will be a fully bilingual center. An additional function of the center—in cooperation with HRS—will be to work with AIDS patients. Those who voluntarily inform the clinic and authorize its staff to do so, will be assisted through the AIDS/Overlay with Partner Notification and Education Program. This program consists of general helpful information and proper referrals for treatment.

In recommending the awarding of the license to the center, John C. Farie, HRS's district administrator wrote: "The location of this project will offer the Hispanic community an opportunity to receive services in a culturally competent environment. We view this as a major opportunity for us in our efforts to service Hispanics with drug problems."

The center uses a methadone detoxification program. This treatment has been successful in clinics in Orlando and Cocoa. The medical director will be Dr. David Moises; the president and owner is Mr. Carlos Ball-Llovera; Mr. Héctor J. Pérez is the program director; and, Mr. Eliseo Riera-Gómez is the clinic's public affairs coordinator.

Mr. Speaker, this center is committed to the eradication of drug use in our community. I applaud their efforts and wish them much success. They are helping us win the war against drugs.

TRIBUTE TO DR. CHANG-LIN TIEN

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate one of the truly outstanding figures in American education, Dr. Chang-Lin Tien, on his appointment as the next chancellor of the University of California, Berkeley. Mr. Tien is the first Asian-American to head a major research university in the United States.

Dr. Tien, a naturalized American citizen, was born in 1935 in Wuhan, China. He received his undergraduate degree from the National Taiwan University in 1955, and in 1965, came to the United States to study at the University of Louisville in Kentucky. He went on to earn a doctorate in mechanical engineering in 1959 from Princeton University.

Dr. Tien has contributed significantly to the field of education in California and across the Nation. He has written and edited numerous books and articles about heat transfer and infrared radiation, received the Distinguished Teaching Award at Berkeley in 1962, was a Guggenheim fellow in 1965, and has been a member of the National Academy of Engineers since 1976. Additionally, last year, he was named "most distinguished Chinese scholar" by the Society of Hong Kong Scholars, which cited his "keen sense of concern for social affairs in the world and in China."

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all my colleagues and all Americans who value a high quality of education for the next generation of Americans, I pay honor and commend Dr. Chang-Lin Tien as he prepares for his chancellorship for the University of California's prestigious Berkeley campus.

TRIBUTE TO DANIEL MILLER: FOSTERING AN APPETITE FOR READING AMONG YOUTH

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure in rising today to pay tribute to Dr. Daniel Miller, assistant vice principal of the Longfellow School, PS 94, in the Sunset Part portion of my distirct, a recent recipient of the Congressional Medal of Merit.

Dr. Miller created the successful and rewarding Reading Rainbow Program, which has encouraged his students to broaden their horizons and expand their knowledge through books. The results of this program have been astonishing. In the past 4 months, Dr. Miller's students have completed reading over 6,000 books. The children participating in this program have greatly improved their reading skills and, at the same time, have become very proud of their achievements. I have personally visited the school to see Dr. Miller and his students at work, and I am convinced that it is an exemplary program worthy of recognition nationwide.

An honors graduate of both Brooklyn College and Pace University, Dr. Miller has made a strong commitment to education from the very beginning of his career. He has gained recognition from his school for supporting the United Nations' efforts of implementing a Worldwide Children's World's Fair in Flushing Meadows, Queens. Dr. Miller has also served as acting principal in Brooklyn's District 15 with great distinction and pride.

Dr. Miller's endeavors in bettering the education of his students have not gone unnoticed. He has been honored by the Doctorate Association of New York Educators, was the recipient of the Laurel Wreath Award, and currently sits on their board of trustees. The New York City Council, the New York State Senate, and the New York Senate Assembly have all recognized his forthright attitude in creating a better public education system for the children of New York.

Dr. Miller takes pride in serving the best interests of his community. In fact, he was at one time involved with the youth of his neighborhood by becoming a baseball and soccer coach.

Dr. Daniel Miller is an inspiring individual, whose career has reached great heights. I only hope he will continue his hard work and dedication to make New York's educational system a model nationwide. I believe he is an asset to the New York Board of Education and to the communities in my congressional district, and I wish him much success in the future.

TRIBUTE TO IRVING AND LINDA RUBENSTEIN

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to two outstanding members of our community—Irving and Linda Rubenstein. They are being honored by the Valley Torah High School for their dedication to Jewish eduation and the community at large.

Irving Rubenstein was born in Glasgow, Scotland, and emigrated to Canada at the age of 2. He is a highly successful entrepreneur and businessman and with his brother, Ralph, owns and operates a leading marketing consulting firm—Premier Productions and Marketing Inc.

Both Linda and Irving are actively devoted to the task of developing and expanding Jewish educational opportunities. Irving is currently vice president of Emek Hebrew Academy and cochairman of the academy's building campaign. He is also an active board member of Valley Torah High School as well as the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue and the Western United States Orthodox Congregations of America. He is a generous philanthropist and has been honored worldwide for his contributions.

Linda Rubenstein is also a community activist. She is a past president of Emek Hebrew Academy and is currently vice president of Emek's PTA and the Shaarey Zedek Sisterhood.

Linda and Irving are the proud parents of three children—Rachel, David, and Daniel.

Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I ask my colleauges to join me in saluting Linda and Irving Rubenstein—community leaders and role models for us all.

TRIBUTE TO MARY F. BARDSLEY

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend Ms. Mary F. Bardsley for her 13 years of dedicated service to Fair Avenue Elementary School and her 37 years of outstanding work on behalf of the Los Angeles Unified School District.

February 2, 1990, marks Ms. Bardsley's retirement as principal of the Fair Avenue Elementary School. Needless to say, her colleagues and students will miss her dearly.

Ms. Bardsley has had a lifelong commitment to improving the quality of education provided in Los Angeles County. Her distinguished history with LAUSD began in 1953 as teacher at the Ivanhoe Elementary School. Ms. Bardsley worked in several positions with the LAUSD until 1967 when she entered the Sisters of Immaculate Heart.

In 1960, Ms. Bardsley earned her M.A. degree in supervision and administration. In 1972, she received her secondary teaching credential at Mount St. Mary's College taking a second major in history. She also earned her secondary administration credential at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, the striking achievements of Ms. Bardsley in the field of education make her a true hero. Congratulations, Ms. Bardsley. I hope your retirement is peaceful and fulfilling.

PRESIDENT HAVEL—ON THE CUTTING EDGE OF FREEDOM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, last week's visit to the House of Representatives by the new President of Czechoslovakia, Vaclav Havel, was a truly historic occasion for democracy. He captured the hearts, if not the minds, of all of us. He talked about politics, history and moral philosophy and I benefited from his insights into the political sea change that is now occurring in Eastern Europe. His speech was both inspiring and moving and his presence in Congress was a tribute to the man and to the spirit of freedom.

He had been imprisoned in that country for his deep commitment to democracy and his belief that one day his country would enjoy the fruits of liberty. His comments revealed that he had thought much about democracy and understands the essence of it better than most Americans who take our open system and its many benefits for granted. As he said:

A person who cannot move and live a somewhat normal life because he is pinned under a boulder has more time to think about his hopes than someone who is not trapped in this way.

I commend him for highlighting the role that America played in making the spread of freedom to Eastern Europe a reality. Although the people of Eastern Europe have themselves turned the tide against communism, and deserve our admiration for this accomplishment, I want to highlight America's role in the wondrous process of freeing Europe for the second time.

Although America sent its young men to Europe to free that continent from the madness of Hitler, this second European revolution is a revolution of democracy, an idea that America preserved and strongly supported over the years. Through America's sound foreign policy and firm military posture, we held the line against Communist expansion and told the world that democracy, not totalitarianism, was the wave of the future. America also preserved the hope for change in Eastern Europe in another way.

The millions of Americans of Eastern European descent kept the flame of freedom burning and never abandoned the hope that someday their ancestral lands would be free. When some in Washington doubted that the captive nations of Eastern Europe would ever be democratic, America's ethnic communities kept the dream alive through the dark night of totalitarian rule in those nations. They deserve our gratitude.

I also salute past and present American political leaders on both sides of the aisle for their commitment to freedom and their vision of a better world for all mankind. As President Havel said in his speech:

When Thomas Jefferson wrote that governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, it was a simple and important act of the human spirit. What gave meaning to that act, however, was the fact that the author backed it up with his life. It was not just his words, it was his deeds as well.

Jefferson and other leaders in the United States have transformed these words into deeds that often were challenging and costly.

This Nation has paid a high price for its vigilance over the years. We have sent our sons to do battle with the forces of totalitarianism in many different ways. We have sent our soldiers to confront them on distant battlefields. We have sent our diplomats to hold the line in negotiations with them and to tell the world about the advantages of freedom. We have sent our intelligence officers to counter them in other ways. Many of our fellow citizens have given their lives for America's commitment to liberty. We have also asked the average American to fund our vision of a new world order driven by democracy. Historians in the future may remember the United States for having given the world many things. Our most precious export, however, is our export of the spirit of freedom.

Eastern Europeans have bought our product. President Havel and other brave Eastern Europeans are planting the roots of democracy in their countries and are blazing freedom's trail. I wish President Havel and his colleagues in Eastern Europe good fortune as they labor in those emerging democracies and welcome them to the family of free nations.

TAX INSTRUMENTS OF TRAUMA

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from Modern Healthcare of February 19, 1990, speaks volumes in support of an idea advanced by Ways and Means Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI:

TAX INSTRUMENTS OF TRAUMA

(By Clark Bell)

Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) has come up with a good idea for raising money to relieve foundering big-city trauma networks.

The chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee suggests "imposing a tax on instruments of trauma," such as guns and motorcycles. Money from the levy should be earmarked for hospitals that are having difficulty operating their emergency departments.

The soaring demand for treatment comes at a time when many hospitals are reducing emergency services. Meanwhile, trauma care networks are deteriorating in many metropolitan areas.

People with deadly weapons are responsible for much of the upsurge in trauma care. They may have a right to own guns, but society has a right to charge them for the havoc caused by their weapons.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE TOM SHIMASAKI

HON. ROBERT MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in great sadness today to advise you that an outstanding citizen of Lindsay, CA, Tom Shimasaki, has recently passed away. He has made numerous contributions to the community and the State of California and we will all miss his presence.

Mr. Shimasaki was a man who gave of himself in many ways. Being an active member of his community was a very important priority of his. He was a prominent advocate for Japanese Americans and a volunteer with an extensive record of community service. Some of his accomplishments include: past president of the Tulare County YMCA, Lindsay Chamber of Commerce, the board of trustees of Lindsay District Hospital, the Tulare County Historical Society, the Lindsay Kiwanis Club, the Tulare-Kings Counties Underwriters Association and the Fresno chapter of the American Society of Chartered Life Underwriters, to name a few.

Mr. Shimasaki's career of public service also involved being an active supporter of the redress movement, serving as chairman for the Japanese-American Citizen League Redress Committee's Central California District Council and also serving in several national positions within the organization. His outstanding contributions to various organizations, clubs, and communites were acknowledged through his receipt of the Lindsay "Man of the Year Award" in 1965.

Mr. Shimasaki was employed as a chartered life underwriter for the New York Life Insurance Co. for 30 years and during World War II, he was involved in the Army Specialized Training Program for the Japanese language at the University of Michigan.

Mr. Shimasaki is survived by his wife, Mitsuye Shimasaki of Lindsay; his two sons, Robert Shimasaki and Lynn Shimasaki both of Pasadena; three daughters, Christine Shimasaki of Palm Desert, Janet Yoshida of Hayward, and Irene Cannon of San Diego; five brothers, Joe Shimasaki of Lindsay, Walter Shimasaki of Eureka, Sam Shimasaki of Chicago, Fred Shimasaki of Hayward, and Ira Shimasaki of Torrance; two sisters, Rinko Enosaki of Harrisonburg, VA, and Atsuko Kusuda of Madison, WI; and seven grandchildren. I offer my sincerest sympathy to his entire family and friends. We will all mourn the loss of such a giving, dedicated, and exceptional man.

TRIBUTE TO THE BROOKLYN DAILY BULLETIN ON ITS 35TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to pay tribute to the Brooklyn Daily Bulletin, a local publication circulated in the Brooklyn Heights section of my district, which is celebrating its 35th anniversary this year. I am proud that this prestigious newspaper has given my community such essential information for so many years.

The Brooklyn Daily Bulletin has continuously published since 1955, focusing on news of the court system and on real estate auctions in downtown Brooklyn. These articles consistently contain interesting and important information, and they uniquely differ from the news regularly printed in other local newspapers.

Recently, the Bulletin has expanded to cover a more extensive realm of issues, and it reaches approximately 5,200 subscribers every week. In fact, because of the escalating demand for these papers, the Bulletin is now available at local newsstands, rather than solely by mail.

The Brooklyn Daily Bulletin is a highly reliable and informative business-oriented paper, which truly benefits the communities of my district. On its 35th anniversary, I would like to wish the Brooklyn Daily Bulletin and its publisher, Dozier Hasty, much prosperity and continued success in the future.

TRIBUTE TO THE LIGA CONTRA EL CANCER—LEAGUE AGAINST CANCER

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to share with my colleagues the story of Miami's League Against Cancer, better known under its Spanish name, La Liga Contra el Cáncer. It is especially relevant due to the telecast of the liga's telethon on Sunday, May 6. Last year's telethon yielded a total amount of $2,111,827 in pledges. This money is used to treat the many patients who are treated by the liga each day.

The liga was founded in Florida in 1975, modeled after a similar organization that began in 1925 in Havana, Cuba. That organization grew to include a world renowned oncology center which operated until 1959. In Miami, the league's medical center serves as an intake and treatment facilities for individuals who have been diagnosed with cancer or who suspect they may be afflicted with the disease. The only prerequisite for treatment is that the patient be a resident of Florida. Once determined to be eligible for services, patients receive the appropriate treatment and follow-up services completely free of charge. There are also support services for patients and their families, as well as home health care. Services are provided at the clinic's own facility, in private physician's offices, and at local hospitals, depending on the need.

Since its foundation in 1975, the liga has served over 17,000 patients, adults and children alike, from over 38 countries of origin. Many lives have been saved, much suffering has been spared, and many destitute cancer victims have been able to die with a level of dignity usually reserved for those who have medical insurance or personal wealth. Liga officials believe they are the only privately supported institution of this kind in the continental United States. The liga does not deny treatment to anyone, regardless of race, ethnic origin, or creed.

Mr. Speaker, I would especially like to commend the great accomplishments of Mrs. Lourdes P. Aguila. Lourdes has been involved with the liga since Cuba. She is a founding member and vice coordinator of the Miami liga, and since 1978, she has served as the liga's general coordinator. Lourdes has always worked as a volunteer, giving her time, efforts, and love to the Liga Contra el Cáncer. Among her responsibilities are: Coordinating all fundraising activities which support the operation of the liga's cancer treatment center. Some of the activities are: Telethon; an annual gala ball; raffles; art auctions; fairs; and, fashion shows. Lourdes is an example of our community to emulate.

My thanks to the liga for this wonderful labor of love. There are so many people who are involved in the day-to-day doings of this wonderful organization that I am unable to mention all their names. They give of their time and knowledge so that others may live and face a healthy future, free of cancer's threats. All the doctors, nurses, and technicians who work for the liga are licensed volunteers, mainly recruited from the ranks of cancer specialists at Miami's best hospitals.

Mr. Speaker, this year is also the liga's 15th anniversary. My congratulations and best wishes for many more years of success, and my thanks for this marvelous task they have undertaken so brilliantly.

TRIBUTE TO BENJAMIN REZNIK

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a leader and activist in our community and someone I am proud to call my friend—Benjamin Reznik. Ben is being honored by the Encino Chamber of Commerce as he concludes an outstanding year as its president.

Ben devotes a substantial amount of his time and resources to a wide variety of organizations and causes. As an outstanding lawyer, he heads, with his wife, Janice, one of the city's most innovative practices. He also blazes a trail in using the law to protect the less fortunate. In recent months he has taken action to uphold child day care in Los Angeles and ensure affordable housing for seniors.

From 1984 to 1986, Ben chaired the legal division of the United Jewish Fund's San Fernando Valley Region. He is currently a director of Encino Hospital and last year was elected a director of the Greater Los Angeles Building Industry Association.

During his tenure as president of the Encino Chamber, Ben has, characteristically, had a tremendous impact on the chamber's growth. From a series of special events and luncheon programs to an aggressive antigraffiti campaign, Ben has given the chamber outstanding service, boosting membership, and expanding publications, services, and outreach.

Ben and his wife, Janice—an outstanding attorney and activist in her own right—have three children, Yoni, Devorah, and Sami.

Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct privilege and pleasure to ask my colleagues to join with me in saluting Ben Reznik; leader, innovator, and role model for all.

THE ERECTION OF A MONUMENT HONORING DRAZA MIHAILOVICH

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a letter I recently received from the Air Force Association endorsing a resolution I introduced, which authorizes the erection of a monument in honor of Gen. Draza Mihailovich on Federal land.

I introduced this bill at the request of the National Committee of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich. This organization will be responsible for covering the cost of the monument once the bill is passed. For over 40 years, this group of American veterans have been attempting to clear the name of the Yugoslav general who saved their lives in World War II.

Originally hailed as a hero by the Allies for his resistance campaign against the Nazis, General Mihailovich was suddenly abandoned by Winston Churchill, despite reservations on the part of the United States. The support of the Western Allies was withdrawn from the General's cause because it was believed that he was collaborating with the Nazis. Allied support then went to General Tito, the leader of the communist forces in Yugoslavia at the time. Evidence reveals, however, that this decision was based on falsified intelligence reports that charged Mihailovich with collaboration.

Even after he had been abandoned by the Western Allies, General Mihailovich and his forces were responsible for saving the lives of over five hundred American airmen who were shot down or forced down over Yugoslavia on their way back from raids on Axis oil and communication installations in Romania. Picked up, clothed, fed, medically cared for, and protected by Mihailovich's Chetnik forces throughout Yugoslavia, these airmen became eyewitnesses to the bitter battles between Nazi and Chetnik forces, and reported absolutely no incidents of collaboration.

On March 29, 1948, President Harry S. Truman, on the recommendation of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, posthumously awarded the Legion of Merit in the Degree of Chief Commander to General Mihailovich in recognition of his services to the Allied cause. Among other things, President Truman's citation said of General Mihailovich, "Through the undaunted efforts of his troops, many United States airmen were rescued and returned safely to friendly control."

I urge you to take the time to read over the letter from the Air Force Association.

AIR FORCE ASSOCIATION,
Arlington, VA, February 19, 1990.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Russell Senate Office Bldg,
Washington, DC.

Hon. PHILIP M. CRANE,
Longworth House Office Bldg.,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND AND REPRESENTATIVE CRANE: The 200,000 members of the Air Force Association salute your efforts, through the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 18 and House Joint Resolution 156, to grant authority to erect a monument to honor the memory and recognize the efforts of Yugoslavian General Draza Mihailovich.

While there has been significant controversy over the years about General Mihailovich, of one thing there is no dissention—he is responsible for saving the lives of some 500 American flyers during World War II and, for that act, this nation owes him a debt of gratitude. It is only fitting to erect a monument to his memory. This token recognition will preserve what he did as a permanent history lesson to future generations of Americans.

Many of those he saved now are deceased. Many more will be in the near future. Now is the time for this belated project to move ahead. Please let us know if we can be of assistance.

Sincerely,

JACK C. PRICE.

TAX DOLLARS DID FUND ANNIE SPRINKLE

HON. DANA ROHRABACHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I entered a statement into the RECORD concerning tax dollar subsidization of performances of porn star Annie Sprinkle at the Kitchen Theatre in New York. Unfortunately, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD made a transcription error in the amount of money the National Endowment for the Arts gave to the Kitchen Theatre. My statement was correct as submitted. Therefore, I am resubmitting the statement today:

Mr. Speaker, it appears that Annie Sprinkle, the Kitchen Theatre, and the New York State Council on the Arts have changed their tune.

But don't be fooled—the Annie Sprinkle show did receive government money—not once but twice.

First, the Kitchen Theatre in New York City, which hosted 12 performances by Annie Sprinkle, received $60,000 directly from the National Endowment for the Arts for operating expenses.

Second, the New York State Council on the Arts, which receives $500,000 in unrestricted funds from the NEA every year, funded a performing art series at the Kitchen Theatre which included Annie Sprinkle.

The Kitchen Theatre applied for $30,000 from the NYSCA to produce 36 shows in the series. The Kitchen's grant application to the NYSCA describes Sprinkle as a feminist post-porn modernist who "* * * uses her experiences within the pornography industry to comment upon gender roles and sexual identity in contemporary society." The NYSCA disbursed a partial grant of $25,000, 32 performances worth, but did not stipulate which shows were excluded from funding.

Here is what the key players initially had to say about the Annie Sprinkle show:

On stage during her performance, Annie Sprinkle announced, "Usually I get paid a lot of money for this, but tonight it's government funded."

On January 21, 1990, Bobby Tsumagari, executive director of the Kitchen Theatre in New York, confirmed Ms. Sprinkle's claim. "What NYSCA looks for from the Kitchen is a kind of risk taking, experimental programming and that is predominately what they fund us for," Tsumagari said. She added that a list of programming was submitted to the NYCSA "which did in fact represent what we were doing this year. They could have easily chosen not to fund these 12 productions."

A few days later Tsumagari said, "One interpretation is because of the way that contracting works with the NYSCA, there is no State council funding, as they are only funding 32 of our 54 performances. Another interpretation is that a list of programming was submitted to them which did in fact clearly represent what we were doing this year." But, because the council did not specifically tell the Kitchen which four performances it was not funding, Tsumagari added, "it really is a matter of how one wants to interpret the facts."

On January 21, NYSCA spokesman Tim Mulligan confirmed that the council gave $25,000 to the Kitchen for a "performance art series" that included 12 performances of Annie Sprinkle. A few days later he added, "You can't say one way or another" if four performances of Sprinkle were part of the 32 which the council eventually approved.

The Chairman of the NEA, on February 2, 1990, when asked about the Ms. Sprinkle show, said, "The point is, we are not the moral arbiter of this country. We're not going to run around and respond just because something happened somewhere that someone didn't like."

Two weeks after the story broke and after the public expressed its opinion of government funds going to Annie Sprinkle, people began to change their stories.

On February 7, the Kitchen claimed that it "did not utilize funds from the NYSCA to present these performances." The NYSCA chairman said "we specifically limited our funding because the council felt the Annie Sprinkle presentation was not of artistic quality to warrant council support." Nevertheless, despite their denials, the NYSCA has yet to produce any evidence that they excluded Annie Sprinkle from their grant or that they informed the Kitchen prior to the Annie Sprinkle performances that they were not to use their grant for that purpose. In fact, it's now clear that the NYSCA kept any misgivings they may have had about Ms. Sprinkle to themselves. As Mr. Mulligan explained in a recent Village Voice article, "The council didn't want to fund Annie Sprinkle but we didn't say it because that gets into censorship."

Make no mistake about it, the NEA, the NYSCA and the Kitchen are playing a shell game with taxpayer dollars. The NEA gives more than $500,000 to the NYSCA which, in turn, gave $25,000 to the Kitchen and Annie Sprinkle. Tracing from its source to its ultimate destination—no matter how the NEA tries to hide behind front groups—Federal dollars are going to XXX-rated pornography. Mr. Speaker, this must cease. Later this session, I will offer an amendment to the Interior Appropriations bill to end Government funding for the National Endowment for the Arts. I urge my colleagues to support my amendment. I also ask that my colleagues take a moment and read the following editorial which appeared in the Washington Times. Furthermore, I would like to place in the RECORD articles from the New York City Tribune, which broke the Annie Sprinkle story, along with their editorial on the subject.

PUBLIC FUNDING OF EROTIC SHOW STIRS NEW FUROR, ART VS. SMUT DEBATE

(By Walter Skold)

A new fight in the battle surrounding public funding of controversial art has erupted over a show in Manhattan that is called avant-garde by defenders but labeled pornographic by its critics.

Critics feel that the show, Annie Sprinkle: Post-Porn Modernist, may actually be in violation of state and federal anti-obscenity laws and think that Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau should launch an investigation.

The show, which contains very explicit sexual acts and images, was performed 12 times over the last 2 weeks at The Kitchen, a theater at 512 W. 19th St. in the Chelsea section of Manhattan. The show was part of a 32-performance series funded by a $25,000 grant from the New York State Council on the Arts (NYSCA).

Last night was the final performance of Annie. A new show will replace it, continuing the state-funded series.

Annie's main writer and only actor is Annie Sprinkle, a self-proclaimed "feminist-porn activist" who has previously appeared in more than 150 X-rated films, according to a press release put out by The Kitchen. She now says that: "porn is dead" and calls herself an artist who performs "post-porn modernism."

Her critics say that if what she did is considered art, it is "obscene" art that should not have been funded at taxpayers' expense.

As part of her performance last Thursday evening, Sprinkle did the following:

Masturbated with various "sex toys" until she supposedly experienced orgasms.

Invoked the spirits of "ancient, sacred, temple prostitutes" into the theater.

Performed oral sex on rubber penises (dildoes) and invited the audience to massage her breasts and photograph her scantily clad body.

To conclude her performance, she opened her vaginal canal with a gynecological tool known as a speculum and invited the audience to the stage to inspect her cervix.

After the show, some 50 men and women paid $5 apiece to have a picture taken with Sprinkle's large breasts resting atop their heads.

Efforts to find out who at NYSCA approved the funding for Annie and whether those involved in the decision were aware of the show's controversial content were unsuccessful.

$25,000 PROVIDED

Tim Mulligan, a spokesman for NYSCA, said that top council officials were not in the office Friday to make any comments. He did confirm that the council gave $25,000 to The Kitchen for a "performance art series" that included the 12 performances of Annie.

Mulligan said he was unsure exactly how much of the $25,000 went specifically to fund Annie.

"How somebody in a decision-making position from the state could say, 'Oh boy, let's go with that,' is beyond me," said Joseph Riley head of Morality in Media (MIM).

"You know, Gov. Cuomo is talking about no possibilities to bring the budget down further," said Riley, "but it it seems to me that this could be one of the first things to go."

This latest controversy comes in the wake of numerous political and cultural controversies last year eventually led to the passage of a congressional amendment prohibiting the National Endownment for the Arts (NEA) from funding "obscene art."

The issue exploded when the New York City Tribune reported last year that artist Andres Serrano had received NEA funding for his Piss Christ, a photo of a crucifix in a jar of urine.

Shortly afterward, photographer Robert Mapplethorpe stirred debate over an NEA-funded exhibit built around home-erotic pictures that were considered obscene by critics both in and out of Congress.

The incidents and the ensuing legislation have sparked a heated debate within both the political and artistic communities as to what the proper relationship between the artist and the state should be.

Sprinkle herself made reference to these events during her performance last Thursday.

At one point, after purportedly inducing the first orgasm with her favorite "sex toys," she smiled and said to the audience. "Usually I get paid a lot of money for this, but tonight it's government funded."

Most of the 200 men and women in the audience roared with laughter, but others failed to see the humor.

"That an indictment could be gained from a grand jury, I have no doubt," Riley said, "and what would happen at a trial is a very good question."

Riley, whose group fights obscenity nationwide, said that Morgenthau should consider investigating the performance for possible violations of the state's anti-obscenity laws.

"It is ironic that, at a time of supposed frugality, the state is funding what is arguably an obscene performance by someone who admittedly has appeared in 150 porn films."

"It's also ironic that Mr. Morgenthau was sworn in again, yet this sort of thing goes on under his jurisdiction, when to the best of my knowledge he has not sought an obscenity indictment in about a decade."

"Look, we have an $8-billion porn industry which is controlled by organized crime, according to the California Department of Justice," complained Page Mellish, president of Feminists Fighting Pornography (FFP).

"Why is tax money being used to present this pornography?" she asked.

Bobbi Tsumagari, The Kitchen's executive director, told the New York City Tribune that critics should not castigate the show without having seen it first. She fears that a "simple, verbal description" of certain parts of the show, without seeing it performed in context, could indeed make Annie sound like pornography.

Riley and Mellish did not see the risque show, but they made their comments based on the descriptions of others and a review in the latest edition of Screw magazine.

The Screw review said, "Sprinkle has always inhabited the extreme edges of the sexual underworld . . . to exploit the revolutionary, or at least irreverent, aspects of pornography."

"The piece itself is not pornographic," said Tsumagari, "but it does question, as much as contemporary art does, what is appropriate material for artists, and what is a public and a private act."

She also said it "comments on the sex industry in a very stringent way, from a first-hand point of view."

Tsumagari may have been referring to one scene that graphically and gruesomely depicted the violence and abuse often associated with pornography. At the beginning of the skit, called "100 Blow Jobs," Sprinkle becomes very angry and despondent, and admits she "met a lot of rotten people" in her career.

Then, with a background of the loud voices of demanding men shouting curses and insults at her, she proceeds to give frantic oral sex to various dildoes, which represent abusive sex partners.

"Sprinkle can claim that it's art," said Mellish, "but you can go to 42nd Street right now, and put a couple of bucks in a machine, and have the same interaction with a woman.

"Now, I don't know if those women claim [what they are doing] is art, but very few people would claim that it is not pornography," she said.

"What she is doing is no different than what is inside Playboy, Penthouse and in booths on 42nd Street," added Mellish.

Screw magazine said, "By casting her act in the form of a Tony 'performance piece,' Annie snares all the artsy nabobs who might otherwise turn up their noses at a six-shows-a-night Show World stand."

Show World is a pornographic theater in Manhattan that has movies, private booths and live-sex acts. Sprinkle herself first developed and performed some of her skits in burlesques, strip joints and in live-sex theaters.

"Some avante-garde people may consider this art, but a jury may not agree," said Robert Peters, an attorney with MIM.

He said that most people are not aware of the state's obscenity laws, a situation he blamed on a "very successful public relations campaign by the American Civil Liberties Union [ACLU]."

"The ACLU always talks about the First Amendment," said Peters, "but the fact is, the First Amendment does not protect" pornography if jurors judge it to be obscene.

MORGENTHAU CRITICIZED

Peters also criticized Morgenthau for not enforcing New York's obscenity laws against the state's booming pornography industry. He thinks convictions can be obtained if "enough political pressure is brought to bear" on the district attorney, but he said many people are tired of complaining because "they get no response."

Tsumagari disagrees with critics who say the show is obscene. "This show encourages you to think about something that you think you know about," she said, "and makes you see the issue of pornography in a new light.

"Frankly, real pornography doesn't do that, which is one of its pernicious influences," she said.

A "Post-Porn Modernist Manifesto," which is printed in the show's program and is signed by more than 20 people, describes the philosophy of such modernists who "celebrate sex as the nourishing, life-giving force."

It states, "We embrace our genitals as part, not separate, from our spirits," and adds, "We utilize sexually explicit words, pictures and performances to communicate our ideas and emotions."

The signers also "denounce sexual censorship as anti-art and inhuman."

The widespread disagreement over Annie seems to illustrate the clash between personal philosophies and public opinions that often occurs when people try to draw the line between "art," "pornography" and "obscenity."

The state obscenity law at one point describes obscenity as "patently offensive" descriptions of sexual acts like sodomy, masturbation, sadism, excretion or the rude exhibition of the genitals.

It also stipulates that material or performances judged to be obscene must, as a whole, lack "serious literary, artistic, political and scientific appeal."

Annie does contain masturbation, excretion and the displaying of genitals, but its defenders say it cannot be considered legally obscene because the show is primarily artistic in content and form.

"The current legislation [initiated by Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C.] uses a definition of obscenity which used the phrase 'without artistic merit,'" pointed out Tsumagari, "but this show, in our estimation, has a lot of artistic merit."

Steve Cain, a talk show host on WABC-AM radio, saw the show with his wife, and found it to be "enjoyable," not objectionable.

"It was artistic, enjoyable and provocative, but not pornographic," said Cain, who said he felt the show's main message to be "that society is too hung up about sex."

Mellish said her group won't "get into what is and isn't art," and Riley asked, "Is this art or garbage?"

Regarding a clear-cut, definitive answer, he said, "It's very hard to say."

Still, he and Peters said that Albany legislators should consider whether the funding of the show was a violation of the new federal regulations regarding the NEA.

The state council receives large grants from the NEA every year. Under the new regulations, the federal arts agency is not allowed to fund "obscene" material directly or indirectly.

"Obviously, I'm very much concerned about the move to restrict the NEA from using its best resources to evaluate the merits of programs," said Tsumagari. "And that is essentially what the Helms legislation is about."

She said the legislation "is not really about people stopping shows, its about people trying to prevent public funds from going to these shows, which is a different issue."

"These are the very same principles which were involved in the Mapplethorpe controversy," agreed Cain, who said the state should attempt to develop criteria for funding art "based on what is credible."

"If the state is going to fund the arts," said Cain, "it should not be able to censor the content, but should give to legitimate artists equally."

Many observers, however, have said that it is probably impossible, and maybe not even appropriate, for the state to decide just what is "legitimate" art.

The Kitchen has a tradition of presenting works that "test certain boundaries of art forms and of public acceptability," said Tsumagari, "and let's face it, that stage of public acceptability changes."

She said that what NYSCA "looks for from The Kitchen is a kind of risk-taking, experimental programming, and that is predominantly what they fund us for."

Tsumagari said a list of programming was submitted to NYSCA. "We did in fact represent what we were doing this year."

"They could easily have chosen not to fund these 12 productions" of Annie Sprinkle, she said.

She adamantly defended the grant however, saying, "You need to look at all the programming here, not just our show, so you can filter it into a balance across the board."

Mulligan was able to tell the City Tribune what the Kitchen application said about the show in question.

It described Sprinkle as a "self-described feminist post-porn modernist who "uses her experiences within the pornography industry to comment upon gender roles and sexual identity in a contemporary society."

"Her work is particularly concerned with developing physical and psychological states of health and well-being and in some of the oppressive qualities of everyday life, as well as the AIDS epidemic."

Sprinkle was not available for an interview, but the show's press release program and previous interviews give an idea of how she sees herself and her work.

A Kitchen theater release said, "The work charts writer/performer Annie Sprinkle's personal odyssey through the worlds of art and ideology, commerce and pornography, a journey which leads her to alternative models of sexual health and well-being."

FAST-PACED AND WITTY

The show's program says Sprinkle "has constructed a fast-paced and witty show which draws on her own experience as a sex researcher who has explored her own and society's sexuality in depth through work in pornography and prostitution."

It also describes Sprinkle as someone who "understands sex as her hobby, politics, spiritual discipline, expertise, main source of income, only subject matter, foremost topic of thought and conversation and the key to her great health and happiness."

During the performance, Sprinkle said her sexual obsessions are "new age" spirituality, and likened her art to ancient sacred prostitutes and Taoist masters who could lengthen their orgasms. She also prayed with the audience to invoke the spirits of past sex goddesses.

"I like to evoke spirits," she told the crowd, "they love having sex."

At one point, she mounted an altar of candles and lit them in honor of former friends and lovers who had died from AIDS. She then prayed to their spirits, lit incense, and, with the audience chanting along and applauding, induced an orgasm with a vibrator.

That skit was called "Sex Heals," and in an interview with New York Native last year, Sprinkle called such techniques "ecstatic mind altering masturbation rituals."

Riley agreed that there are similarities between ancient sexual/religions rituals and what is presently considered pornography. "But," he said "For her to talk today in that same kind of reference, is the same kind of con that Al Goldstein uses in claiming first amendment protections for what he does."

Goldstein publishes the pornographic magazine Screw and produces the cable show "Midnight Blue," which Sprinkle has often appeared on.

"What we have here is a uni-sex P.T. Barnum," said Riley. "Barnum said there is a sucker born every minute, only in this case it is almost literal."

Goldstein and Riley have clashed for years over pornography and have both become national symbols for those who either want to enforce or abolish state and federal laws restricting obscenity.

DISPUTE GROWS OVER WHETHER NEW YORK FUNDED SEX SHOW IN CHELSEA THEATER

(By Walter Skold)

A controversial performance by a famous pornography star who participated in a series of state-funded performances has lawmakers and artists arguing again about government and corporate funding of "obscene art."

Based on interviews with officials at the New York State Council on the Arts (NYSCA), and with the director of the Kitchen theater in Manhattan's Chelsea section, where the shows were performed, the New York City Tribune reported last week that public funds made possible a show that some critics called "patently obscene."

Now NYSCA denies having funded the performances of Annie Sprinkle: Post-Porn Modernist. The Council this week released a statement calling the show "not of an artistic quality." However, officials said internal records that could prove exactly what they did or did not fund are not available to the public.

Critics say NYSCA is playing a "shell game" and maintain that Sprinkle was in fact funded, because the state was the major funding source for the series in which the show appeared.

The show featured graphic and explicit sexual scenes that included masturbation, oral sex, urination, orgasmic ritual dances and the inspection of Sprinkle's vagina by some members of the audience.

Assemblyman Joseph Pillittere (D-Niagra), the chairman of the Assembly's Tourism, Sports, and Art Committee, was shocked at the content of Sprinkle's performance and said that "based on what she did in her last performance, I would not want the state to fund anything that she is involved with" in the future.

He called NYSCA's funding of the series a mistake but said the nature of the agencies funding procedures make it possible for such things to happen occasionally.

He said the funding of such events "is almost impossible to control unless you have total censorship and demand that everyone who gets state money has to predetermine what their exact performance is going to be."

Presently, contracts and applications between NYSCA and institutions are so vague, critics say, that the facts of just what the Council is and is not funding is often a matter of interpretation.

In a statement sent to the Tribune, NYSCA Chairperson Kitty Carlisle Hart said that "council contracts are drawn in broad terms for a simple reason: to avoid the slightest hint of censorship."

But critics say the cry of censorship is a smokescreen for the fact that public funds are used to sponsor art production series that include objectionable material.

"The bottom line is that if taxpayer's dollars were taken out of the formula, the show would not have been funded," said an angry Dana Rohrabacher, a congressman from California who has been extremely critical of the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA).

"The fact that artists are able to get their hands on tax dollars and use it to fund obscene and sexually graphic presentations," said Rohrabacher, "suggests there is something pretty wrong with the system."

The circumstances surrounding the performance of Sprinkle at the Kitchen seem to provide a good example of just how the sometimes complicated funding process works.

The Kitchen originally applied to the state for $30,000 to produce 36 shows in its performance art series. NYSCA only gave the Kitchen $25,000 to put on 32 performances, but it did not stipulate just which shows it was not funding.

The original application from the Kitchen included 4 performances of Sprinkle, but the show was actually performed 12 times. This happened because the Kitchen, as is often the case with theaters, added 22 more performances to its schedule after the application was submitted.

Barbara Tsumagari, the executive director of the Kitchen, said when first contacted that "one interpretation is, that because of the way that contracting works with NYSCA, there is no state council funding as they are only funding 32 of our 54 performances."

"Another interpretation is that a list of programming was submitted to them which did in fact clearly represent what we were doing this year," added Tsumagari.

But because the Council did not specifically tell the Kitchen which four performances it was not funding, she said "it really is a matter of how one wants to interpret" the facts.

When first contacted, Jim Mulligan, a NYSCA spokesman, said "you can't say one way or the other" if the 4 performances of Sprinkle were part of the 32 which the Council eventually approved.

Neither Hart nor NYSCA director, Mary Hays, were in the office when Mulligan first spoke with the Tribune however, and after the first story was published, NYSCA then said that the Sprinkle performances had in fact been turned down.

Part of the reason for the confusion is because nowhere on the approved contract with the Kitchen does it specify that the four controversial performances were being denied funding. This decision was an internal one made by the panel of artists who make recommendations on funding requests.

Still, the Council will not release these internal records because they say the decisions are meant to be confidential to protect the panelists.

"As a corollary," to not telling recipients just which shows are being denied, said Hart, "we believe that a reduced amount from requested funding is a very clear comment to the agency involved that, while much of their effort is worthy of public funding, some clearly is not."

She reiterated that "We wish to avoid the slightest appearance of censoring any artist," and claimed that "over the years, the State legislature, in every examination and reexamination of our funding process, has strongly supported this viewpoint."

While Pillittere is upset over the Sprinkle performance, he is sympathetic with the Council. He said he has talked about this funding problem with Hart and Hays and agreed that "it is almost impossible to control every aspect of the total fiscal budget."

He said the Council has a good overall record and that the Council record is good and that "Out of the total budget, this is one of the few of this type of performances that the state has been involved in" that is objectionable.

But John Mashburn, a legislative aide for Senator Jesse Helms, said that is "like saying the Exxon Valdez is only one of a thousand ships that wrecked."

Mashburn said "People are being fast and loose with just who is funding who," and added that many governmental art agencies "know who they give it too, but they don't necessarily know what the entity does with it once they get the funds."

"We are not saying that they can't do it," said Mashburn. "They can call it whatever they want to, but don't tax the American public is what we're saying."

WHO PAID ANNIE SPRINKLE TO DO THOSE DIRTY THINGS?

Did the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and the New York State Council for the Arts (NYSCA) fund a public show in which porn star Annie Sprinkle masturbated with a variety of sex toys and invited the audience to examine her vagina with a flashlight? Or were we wrong?

On January 22 the New York City Tribune reported that the Council gave a $25,000 grant to The Kitchen theater for a series of performances that included a show called Annie Sprinkle: Post-Porn Modernist. In his original story, City Tribune reporter Walter Skold quotes a spokesman for the state council, the director of The Kitchen and Spinkle herself as saying that the performances were funded by the NYSCA. The council, we noted, is funded by the NEA.

Now, in the wake of a blistering attack from Congressman Dana Rohrabacher, R-Ca., the NEA, the NYSCA and The Kitchen all say in published interviews that we got the story wrong. It's amazing how a little heat from the right person can jog one's memory.

The NYSCA says it never intended to fund the Sprinkle performances because they were deemed to be lacking in artistic merit. And the spokesman said he was mistaken when he originally spoke to our reporter. However, for more than two weeks the council has refused to provide us with documentation that could easily validate this claim. Surely, if the council reviewed the application from The Kitchen and decided not to fund Sprinkle, there must be some letter to that effect.

Is the NYSCA stonewalling us? If no letter exists then how was The Kitchen to know that the $25,000 shouldn't go to Sprinkle? The more likely scenario is that the council is in the habit of pouring tax dollars down a black hole.

Sprinkle says she was only kidding when she interrupted an orgasm to thank the government for funding her show.

The program for Sprinkle's show lists the NYSCA as a funder as well as a number of non-profit organizations that probably thought they were helping some kind of legitimate theatrical performance.

The NEA says based on press accounts, it would not have funded the Sprinkle show although it admits to giving $60,000 directly to The Kitchen for operational expenses. Their position seems to be it's not the NEA's problem if the theater happens to put on live sex shows.

In a letter to NEA Chairman John Frohnmayer, Rohrabacher, correctly notes, "No other government agency would have the gall to hold itself unaccountable for the ultimate destination of the tax dollars it disburses."

Most Americans would be shocked to know their tax dollars are wasted on the kind of pornographic anti-religious trash consistently funded by the State Council for the Arts and the NEA. The refusal of the agencies to take responsibility for their remarkably bad judgment is distressing.

These agencies have become the Exxon Valdez of American culture. They were created for good purpose, but, oh my, what pollution they have caused.

[From the Washington Times, Feb. 12, 1990]

THE WELL-ENDOWED MS. SPRINKLE

The Greek philosopher Diogenes used a lantern in his unavailing search for an honest man. Porn artiste and ex-prostitute Annie Sprinkle uses a flashlight, and the taxpayers have to shell out for it.

Actually, it's not clear whether the flashlight that serves to inspect the interior regions of Ms. Sprinkle's anatomy is funded by the American taxpayer, but parts of her bizarre stage act may be. Several newspapers in the last week have documented the passage of public money from the taxpayers through the National Endowment for the Arts to the New York State Council on the Arts to The Kitchen, one of Manhattan's steamier nocturnal haunts, where performs the incomparable Ms. Sprinkle.

What Ms. Sprinkle does on your nickel makes the homoerotic and excretory concoctions of Robert Mapplethorpe and Andres Serrano look like finger painting by the Mouseketeers. Her act includes masturbation on stage, urinating in a toilet and asking members of her audience if they'd like to peer up her nether body openings by means of the flashlight. Whatever spectators find when they accept her invitation, it's probably not an honest man.

Barbara Tsumagari, executive director of The Kitchen, denies that Ms. Sprinkle's contributions to the lively arts are financed by the NEA. She says the 12 shows Ms. Sprinkle is putting on are only part of a series of 54 performances, and taxpayers had to swallow the tab for a mere 32 of them. But the publicly funded New York State Council on the Arts spewed up $25,000 for the series and receives $500,000 annually from the NEA. The Kitchen's share of the NEA booty is $60,000 for operating expenses. Ms. Sprinkle herself, during her performance, says, "Usually I get paid a lot of money for this, but tonight it's government funded."

Meanwhile, The New York Post, The New York City Tribune and other papers have disrobed several other well-veiled instances of weird funding by the NEA: A San Francisco gallery that offers a video on "genital openings"; an excursion into "woundings and cuttings by women as a healthy response to a sick society"; and $20,000 to three lesbian writers "known for the homoerotic content in some of their works," according to The Washington Blade. Then there's Ms. Sprinkle's fellow aesthete, Johanna Went, whose performances with excrement, menstrual products and male genitals transcend the imagination of even Ms. Sprinkle and were partly funded by the NEA and the NYSCA in the 1980s.

Critics of the NEA like Sen. Jesse Helms and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher are properly volcanic over the agency's apparent inability to refrain from funding human waste products. Last year, when the Mapplethorpe and Serrano controversies broke, these and few other lawmakers proposed drastic remedies, but their colleagues overrode them with more modest measures. As a result, we find ourselves still encumbered with the likes of Ms. Sprinkle, Ms. Went and other "post-porn modernists" as these fraudulent weirdos bill themselves.

Not too long ago the whole lot of them would have been locked up by the vice squad or scooped up by the garbage trucks. Today literati and legislators solemnly pronounce them to be heralds in the vanguard of beauty, rush to champion their rights of free expression and ladle up largesse so they can indulge their tiny imaginations in comfort.

The moral here ought to be clear. Federal art almost always will be bad, small-minded stuff, and the Annie Sprinkles will always find ways to get their hands on the federal loot. Everyone hereabouts knows this political fact, but few will confess the awful truth. You can use a lantern or a flashlight, but when you peer into the bellies of Congress or the NEA, you won't find many more honest men than Diogenes did.

STEVEN ANSON HONORED

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize a leading resident of the San Fernando Valley, Steven Anson. He is being honored by the Sylmar Chamber of Commerce on completion of a distinguished term as president.

Steve's tenure was highlighted by a significant growth in the chamber's membership: an average of four new members a month. He was responsible for setting up the innovative "Business to Business Networking" program, which, by spotlighting a different area business on a monthly basis, has helped promote business cooperation and growth.

Steven was also responsible for boosting the chamber's outreach to the wider community. He added the honorary sheriff's jamboree and contest to the already successful annual parade and fair.

In addition to his chamber duties, Steve is a successful and respected businessman and banker. He is currently chairman of the Santa Clarita Bank.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in acclaiming Steven Anson, a community leader and role model for all.

FROM THE INNER CITY TO THE SUBURBS COMES A CALL AND A WARNING

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to your attention the following sermon by the Rev. Leon Sullivan, pastor emeritus of Zion Baptist Church of Philadelphia and founder of the Opportunities Industrialization Centers. He urges all people, especially those in the suburbs, to act now and invest effort and resources in the innercity. His speech serves as both a warning and an inspiration. The sermon was delivered on October 8, 1989 at the Episcopal Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields in Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia.

FROM THE INNER CITY TO THE SUBURBS COMES A CALL AND A WARNING

(By the Rev. Leon Sullivan)

From the fifth chapter of Luke, the fifth and sixth verses: "Launch out into the deep and let down your nets."

A call to the suburbs from the inner city. All too often we give up on solving problems because, in our minds, we live in a "can't do it" world. Therefore we are defeated before we begin. As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.

So I ask you today, as we face grave American problems, to try to think differently about things. If you think affirmatively, you'd be surprised what you can do. If you think problems can be solved, with the help of God, you can do extraordinary things. Unbelievable things. Impossible things.

The objective of religion is not to get people into heaven but to get heaven into people. And not just to keep people out of hell but to get hell out of people.

You must not only preach religion, but live religion. The problem in America is we have preached it, but not lived it.

The story of the Bible is a story of men and women proving with God's help that something can be done. It is the story of Moses, of people wanting to be free, but they had been slaves so long they thought nothing can be done. And God spoke to Moses and said, "Go down to Egypt and tell pharaoh to let my people go." And Moses said, "What will I use?" And God said, "Use the rod in your hand! Use what you have! Don't say it can't be done."

And the story of Jesus, when he saw the fishermen of Gennesaret holding their nets. They said, "There are no fish today." And Jesus said, "It can be done. Launch into the deep off the beach. Let down your nets. Have faith." And they launched down and their nets were so filled they almost broke.

Time and time again there have been those who launched into the deep. Impossible situations. Fifty years ago a little man in India put a loincloth about his body. Faced the most powerful empire in the world and appealed for freedom for his people, using nonviolence and civil disobedience for the first time in the modern world. And in 1947, India declared its independence from Britain, starting a movement of freedom that sprang around the world.

In 1955 a young black minister in Montgomery, Ala., said the time had come for racial segregation to end in the South. And he led a year-long boycott that aroused the consciousness of America and began the great civil rights movement that broke down barriers the length and breadth of this country.

In the city of Philadelphia in 1958, 400 black preachers led boycotts against companies that discriminated against blacks. In 1958, not a single soft-drink company had a black salesman driving a truck. There were no bank managers who were black. Except for a few, there were no blacks in any position of consequence, other than the most menial and the most servile.

For three years these black preachers launched boycotts against soft-drink companies, banks, newspapers, oil companies, large chains, until the time the little Caesars of Philadelphia said, "It's time to open the doors." And thousands of jobs were open to blacks.

In 1968, following the assassination of Dr. King, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act that prohibited racial discrimination in the sale of rental housing. Still in America today, with all we've got, with all the laws, 90 percent of our urban areas are de facto segregated. Ninety percent of our urban schools are de facto segregated, and it is still two times more difficult for a black to get a job in America than a white.

Something can be done about it. In Philadelphia you and I will launch out into the deep and let down our nets and believe something can be done, if you want something to be done. If we don't, we will see devastation.

If we do not ease the problems of the inner cities and deal soon with the problems of the homeless, the drug-addicted, the unemployed, the poorly educated—and the helplessness and hopelessness that grows and festers every day—within three years at least 30 American cities will explode.

We must launch a collective effort to steer this nation from the tragedy of urban violence. There must be a collective effort to avert this disaster because the conditions the people face now, and the increasing number affected, will make the riots of the '60s look like a picnic three years from now.

There is need in America today for new priorities for the poor, new priorities from Congress, new priorities from the President of the United States.

We will never solve the problem of drugs by saying no to drugs, or going after drug traffickers in Colombia. They will only move their operations to another place. We must deal with the hopelessness of the people in the cities who are unemployed, living in falling-down, rat-infested and decaying houses with no one reaching out with a helping hand. The fact is, we are more interested in Poland, Hungary and East Germany than the poor and the homeless of America. And we have the resources to help make the difference.

All the people in the inner city want is a job, a decent house, safety for their children and some American justice. And hope.

We are a crisis-motivated country; we only move by crisis. Society did not feel threatened by the cities until the cities were set on fire. That's the only way we act in America to help the poor. In three years, I say we will have that crisis if we do not act now. I assure you trouble is on the way. There will be marches in the streets of Chestnut Hill.

So, there must be a collective effort that will include the suburbs, to help the problems of the inner city. The suburbs will not be safe until the inner cities are safe. We are all in this thing together: blacks and whites, Jews and Gentiles, Asians, together in American now. We all came over in separate boats but we're in the same boat now.

Twenty-five years ago in an old, abandoned jailhouse in Philadelphia, with the help of a few friends, we launched a program called Opportunities Industrialization Centers. It has trained one million men and women for jobs. It started with a pinch of government help, and with a few Americans who believed they could use what they had to reach thousands of people.

Now we are going on. To the next challenge. We shall take abandoned buildings in the inner cities of America and we shall reach out to the people who need help and love. We shall bring them in, we shall turn them around, we shall dress them up and clean them up, we shall teach them, we shall motivate them, we shall help them to know that somebody out there loves them because now most of us don't think anybody gives a damn.

We shall reach out to the suburbs for your resources. We shall work in the inner cities, but you in the suburbs must help, too. You must help with your money, you must help with your churches, you must help with your resources, you must help with your volunteer assistance, you must help with doctors and nurses and medical aides, you must help with clothing. You who are executives of department stores that supply clothes for people, you who own businesses that supply food to feed the people, you in the suburbs who have but will not share with those who do not have.

It is plea to the suburbs from the inner city. This is your challenge. This is the first time I've spoken of this in a church in America, except in my own church.

Here in the suburbs I'm speaking to you and to the thousands of churches in the suburbs, around this nation, to use what you have to help those who want to help themselves. Your resources, your money, your time. The suburbs and the inner city must work together to solve the problems, while the government as yet does not perceive the poverty in this country. Until it does, we must act. We who say we love God, we must humble ourselves and pray and work toward the salvation of the people of God now.

Launch out into the deep and let down your nets. Impossible? Impossible dreams? God deals with impossible dreams, and God is able. So then let us reach out and take God's hand, and each other's hands, black and white. It is a call from the inner city to the suburbs of America.

Let us walk together, children, and not get weary, and there will still be a camp meeting in the promised land.

MISS ROSIE ISN'T ALWAYS WRONG

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, the economists who assist the administration in preparing its yearly budget proposal are often accused of basing their calculations on overly optimistic predictions about the state of the Nation's economy; figuratively put, seeing the world through rose-colored glasses. These accusations have proven to be blatantly false.

In fact, the administration's economic forecasts have been consistently more accurate than those of the Congressional Budget Office or private sector economists. This would seem to nullify any negative comments about the administration's budget based on rosy forecasts. Perhaps the blame for our budgetary problems lies elsewhere. I commend to your attention the following article, "White House Economists Spurn Ms. Rosie Scenario," by Joseph A. Grundfest, which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on February 13, 1990.

WHITE HOUSE ECONOMISTS SPURN MS. ROSIE SCENARIO

(By Joseph A. Grundfest)

Every year, come the end of January, the nation's attention turns to Washington, D.C., where there is said to live a mysterious temptress named Rose Scenario. Legend has it that Rosie casts a seductive spell on the administration's economic forecasters, enticing them to make wildly optimistic projections that distort the nation's budgetary process.

Last month was no different. The allegation: The administration was predicting healthy economic performance in order to avoid forecasting a larger deficit that would require deeper cuts in military or domestic spending, or new taxes, to achieve deficit-reduction targets. The trouble with this story, however, is that it doesn't fit the facts. Lately the administration has been doing a remarkably accurate job of predicting economic performance.

Consider the administration's mid-year forecasts issued last July. These also were criticized as having been generated under Rosie's seductive gaze. How well have those forecasts fared since they were issued?

The administration predicted 2.9% real GNP growth for 1988. Bull's eye: Real GNP grew 2.9%. Unemployment was projected at 5.2%. Bull's-eye again. Ten-year Treasury notes were supposed to close the year at 8.5%. Yet another bull's eye.

Where did the administration miss the mark in its projections? It was low by a tenth of a percentage point in its estimate of the three-month Treasury bill rate. It also overestimated growth in the consumer price index by two-tenths of a percentage point and in the gross national product deflator by four-tenths of a percentage point. (These inflation overestimates aren't, by the way, the kind of mistakes you'd expect Rosie to entice. After all, overestimating inflation doesn't make you a wild-eyed optimist.)

How many private-sector economists beat this performance?

A comparison of the administration's estimates with July's Blue Chip Economic Forecast based on a survey of 52 leading private-sector economists reveals that not a single private-sector economist hit three home runs by predicting real GNP, unemployment and long-term interest rates right on the nose. Indeed, the best private-sector performance on any of those measures was turned in on the unemployment number, where only 29% of the economists got it right.

Even when the administration missed, it was closer to the mark than the majority of the private-sector forecasters. On short-term interest rates only 12% of the private-sector estimates were more accurate than administration forecasts. And on the inflation numbers, the best the private sector could do was in the GNP deflator competition, where only 15% of private forecasters beat the administration.

"Beginner's luck!" you say. But the problem with that story is that even if one goes back to the period spanning 1984 through 1988 it turns out that administration forecasts were eminently credible. For example, administration estimates of fourth-quarter real GNP growth were more accurate than both Congressional Budget Office and Blue Chip consensus estimates in four of the five years. Moreover, given the mistakes made by private-sector and CBO economists, there is no reason to believe that they are consistently better forecasters than administration economists.

Indeed, if one is looking for biases, observe that in seven of the past eight years the CBO has overestimated the GNP deflator and three-month Treasury bill rates, thereby predicting inflation and interest rates higher than those actually experienced. Has Rosie's evil half-sister, Gloomie, been working the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue? If one wants to believe in conspiracy theories, it's not hard to concoct a tale that has congressional economists generating dour predictions to serve Congress' political goals.

Regardless of the facts, the fear behind Rosie's legend is understandable. After all, if the administration can finesse a dicey budget problem by fudging a decimal point here or there, then why not do it?

The answer is that administration economists understand that to be consistently wrong in a direction that suggests a political thumb on the scale is one of the worst events that could befall them. Congress could use that evidence to push for a greater role for the CBO at the expense of administration economists. At least some administration officials would also come to see that a politically motivated projection has the potential to backfire in the worst way imaginable.

On a more personal level, economists who toil for an administration typically have professional reputations to protect. Few charges are as professionally damning as the allegation that objectivity and principle have been compromised.

Administration economists therefore have reason to turn their backs on Rosie. They might dream of her at night, and they might flirt with her if given half a chance, but the evidence to date is that Rosie hasn't seduced them into generating unreliable forecasts.

BURGER KING CITIES IN SCHOOLS ACADEMY OF MIAMI

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, on September 5, 1989, a wonderful school opened in Miami. The Burger King Academy is the first of a group of schools serving dropout-prone students in the 9th through 12th grades. Sponsored by Cities in Schools, Inc., its purpose is to bring together existing public and private resources and people into schools where they most benefit at-risk youth. CIS is supported by a variety of private businesses, foundations, and individuals, as well as an interagency grant from the Justice, Labor, and Health and Human Services Departments.

In Miami, as well as in other cities, CIS has brought together local government, school officials, and private business representatives to form a board of directors. This board assesses the community's needs and arranges for CIS projects to be established at educational sites throughout the community.

The Burger King Academy's services include academic instruction by certified teachers, internships and jobs, skills classes, and tutoring. Students are also offered specialized counseling and access to social services. The academy staff will focus on the individual and create a family-like atmosphere where students can build self-esteem and confidence. Each school can serve up to 125 students, with classes not exceeding 20 students. The atmosphere can be most closely compared to the old-fashioned one-room schoolhouse where teachers knew students personally.

This program is so very important because it is targeting our youth. Our young people must be encouraged to continue their education, to become active and fruitful members of our society. They must be guided to a path which will lead them to a productive future: the options are so many, and education is the most helpful tool we have to prevent drug abuse and crime.

Mr. Speaker, I commend all who are involved in this marvelous program, especially the board of directors of the Cities in Schools of Miami, Inc., and the students and faculty who are working so hard to make tomorrow better for all of us.

SALUTE TO DAN SEYMOUR

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute an individual whose acting career embodies the golden age of Hollywood—Dan Seymour. He is being honored by his family and friends on the occasion of his 75th birthday, including his son Jeff—a personal friend.

Dan was born in Chicago in 1915. Excelling in his craft at an early age, by the 1930's, Dan was both acting and managing on the New York stage. He toured the country at the height of the Depression, bringing theater to thousands as he performed with a variety of road companies.

In the 1940's, Dan was persuaded to screen test in Hollywood and won his first film role with Bob Hope and Bing Crosby in "Road to Morocco." Following that success, Dan quickly became established as one of the movie industry's leading character actors. His film credits have included "To Have and Have Not," "Key Largo," "The Way We Were," and the immortal "Casablanca."

During the 1950's, 1960's, and 1970's, Dan appeared in close to 200 television shows including "The Adventures of Superman," "I Spy" and "Perry Mason."

I have followed Dan Seymour's career with special interest because of my close friendship with his son Jeff. Jeff is an outstanding member of the community in his own right and he is justly proud of his father's accomplishments. Thus, it gives me special pleasure to be a part of this celebration.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Dan Seymour, a man of talent and vision whose life and career have brought pleasure to millions.

TRIBUTE TO PERCY SUTTON

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, it's with great pleasure that I call to your attention the following tribute to Mr. Percy Sutton given by the distinguished Jamaican Ambassador to the United States, Hon. Keith Johnson. Ambassador Johnson spoke in Jamaica on the occasion of the Martin Luther King Jamaican Awards Banquet on Monday, January 15, 1990, as Mr. Sutton received the Dr. King Humanitarian Award.

Ambassador Johnson, a dedicated representative of his country and good friend of the United States, honored Mr. Sutton's selfless commitment to social and economic justice, not only in the United States but in Africa and the Caribbean. An outstanding leader in communications and business, Percy Sutton is also a humanitarian who has exemplified the spirit, principles and courage of the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr.

A TRIBUTE TO HON. PERCY SUTTON ON THE OCCASION OF THE MARTIN LUTHER KING JAMAICAN AWARDS BANQUET BY HIS EXCELLENCY HON. KEITH JOHNSON, MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1990

The Martin Luther King Award was conceived by a person who was an advisor and dear friend to our honoree, the Honorable Percy Sutton. He was also advisor and friend to me: I refer to the late Ken Sherwood. I believe that in spirit tonight Ken is following these proceedings with a special pride, knowing that those we honour exemplify the humanitarian concern, the commitment to service and the devotion to principles and justice which characterized the life and contribution of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

How well, I remember Percy as the Grand Marshall of the Martin Luther King Memorial Parade on Fifth Avenue in New York, sponsored by the 369th veterans!—a role that I had the honour of filling on another occasion.

Percy Sutton is an extraordinary man who has lived the American dream by dint of his remarkable abilities, perserverance and courage. Born to a Texas family of humble means, Percy has worked hard to achieve, and achieve he has, in his chosen arenas of law, politics, business, and service to humanity, within the United States and internationally.

Percy Sutton deserves our tribute on this occasion because, like Dr. King, he rejected the easy path to success which his brains and acumen would have assured him. He has tackled the big apple—New York City, and succeeded in its fastest tracks. First as a legal counsel and a pioneer political leader of colour and then as an opener of doors toward the economic empowerment of the minority business community. Although to count his achievements is to provide a mere glimpse of the man, yet tonight let us briefly be reminded of some of them. Percy Sutton was among the leaders of the post war Harlem political movement that defined the meaning of black political power in New York City and culminated last year in the election of Percy's long-time friend and ally, David Dinkins—as Mayor. Percy paved the way, first in the New York Assembly, then in two terms as Manhattan Borough President, and then in his historic run for the mayoralty in 1978.

Percy founded the Inner City Broadcasting Corporation when he left politics: He has built it into a broadcasting empire active in the ownership and operation of numerous radio stations, cable television franchises, and television production.

We honour Percy Sutton because he has been more than the sum total of his achievement. While accomplishing, Percy has contributed. Thus, in politics he always found the time to teach and to be mentor, and as a result we have the leadership of the Basil Pattersons, the Charlie Rangels, and the David Dinkins. In business he insisted on being rooted in the community, and as a result, in Harlem, the renovated and reborn Apollo theatre is the cornerstone of Percy's production company. The new Apollo under Percy Sutton's leadership has revitalized the community which has nurtured him and gives promise of a new Harlem renaissance.

Through it all, there is a consistency to Percy Sutton that we recognize and honour. A commitment to the international struggle of people of colour to achieve self-determination and economic progress, is a consistent stream in Percy Sutton's life. He is a Pan Africanist, giving of his time and money to the cause of political and economic liberation in Africa and the Caribbean even though this struggle promised no immediate benefit to him in his careers in politics or business. And perhaps this is the best measure of the man, Percy Sutton: That he is rooted in the principles which guided great leaders such as Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., that he follows an internal value system which does not compute the potential cost of lost influence or lost revenue, but perserveres instead toward what is right and just.

If the definition of a humanitarian is one who exemplifies in his life a consistent love for the human race, then Percy Sutton is well deserving of this award. He has endeavoured, in countless ways, to alleviate the suffering of his fellow man, to provide hope and opportunity for those too often denied it.

The Salvation Army, the Boy Scouts movement and a home in New York for the children of drug addicted mothers are among the many channels that he utilizes in this connection.

Percy Sutton relates to individuals, as well as, to mankind in general, he will provide assistance to young people without the means to go to school, he gives of his time to work with and counsel young minority business persons, he fights the evil of apartheid on the boards of Transafrica and the African-American Institute, he responds to world hunger by raising money for organizations such as Africare, and he neither seeks nor takes any credit for his good works.

Despite, this, he is the recipient of more than 400 awards honouring his contribution in the fields of civil rights, human rights, communications, business and philosophy.

Percy Sutton does not count the cost; he is there for Transafrica, for the African National Congress, struggling for the peoples of southern Africa, for the oppressed and threatened throughout the world. He has been there, when it has counted, for Jamaica and the Caribbean. Percy Sutton is a truly outstanding American—indeed a great son of the Americas. But most of all, he is a friend and a brother.

It is, therefore, a great honour for me to have this opportunity to recognize this humanitarian, this loyal friend, and to thank him for his unflagging support of many deserving Jamaican causes.

FRED AND PONI CRAF: 78 YEARS OF SERVICE TO DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on March 16, 1990, the Bronson M. Cutting Center Chapter No. 34 and the auxiliary of the Disabled American Veterans in Hayward, CA, are honoring Fred and Pomona "Poni" Graf for a combined 78 years of service. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to this dedicated couple from California's Ninth Congressional District.

Fred Graf was born on September 19, 1918, in Hebron, CO. He served as a corporal in France with the 3d Armored Tank Division of the 1st Army and was severely wounded at the Battle of St. Lo. Fred was hospitalized for a total of 2 years, first in England to save his arm, then at Fitzsimmons Veterans' Administration Medical Center in Denver, CO.

Fred has a disabled rating of 100 percent yet his disability certainly has not hindered his devotion to others. In 1946, he joined the Disabled American Veterans [DAV]. Fred has been commander of Hayward Chapter No. 34 twice and, for many years was the adjutant and treasurer of the chapter.

Fred became the first commander of DAV District No. 14. He then served for 18 years as the State executive committee officer before becoming the Disabled American Veterans representative to the Livermore Veterans' Administration Medical Center. Fred continues to serve as honorary representative.

In 1957, Fred was voted into the DAV Honor Society, the National Order of Trench Rats. The honor society is a group that honors DAV members who have devoted unusual time and service to other disabled American veterans. He became "Golden Rodent" of the local chapter, Dugout No. 135, which encompasses the San Francissco Bay area from San Francisco south to San Jose, as well as the east bay counties of Alameda and Contra Costa.

Fred has held many positions in the National Order of Trench Rats, even attaining the highest position of "Imperial Golden Rodent." He also served as "Red-Eyed Gnawer"—adjutant/treasurer—of local Dugout No. 135.

In 1946, Fred married Pomona "Poni" Davies. Poni was born on August 20, 1923, in Denver, CO. In 1956, Poni helped found charter members. She was soon elected commander of the auxiliary, a position that she held four times. She was also elected commander of the District No. 14 auxiliary and was elected department—State—auxiliary commander in 1970 and 1971.

Poni served several times on the State executive committee for the Chapter No. 34 auxiliary, and was elected to serve as national executive committee representative for the years 1972 and 1973. She also was the Disabled Veteran's Auxiliary representative to the Livermore Veterans' Administration Medical Center for 17 years and now, like Fred, is the honorary representative.

Poni was voted into the honor society of the DAV Auxiliary, the National Order of Alley Cats. Again, members of this order are selected for their devotion and service to disabled American veterans. Poni has held every position in this organization, including "Golden Cat" in the local "RatTrap" which serves the bay area from San Francisco to San Jose, including Alameda and Contra Costa counties. She has also served in various offices in the national order, including the highest post, "Exalted Golden Cat."

Poni continues to serve in many official positions of the DAV Auxiliary and the honor society. For many years, she has been the author of the chapter newsletter which goes out to all members of Chapter No. 34 and the auxiliary.

Fred and Poni have a daughter, Deborah Hageman, of Anchorage, AK, two sons—deceased—and four grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to wish Poni and Fred good luck in the future and to express my sincere thanks to them for their matchless devotion to disabled American veterans. Their dedication to this group serves as an inspiration to us all.

MOTHER MARY OF JESUS THE GOOD SHEPHERD

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising today to pay tribute to the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth, a religious order currently teaching in three parish schools in my congressional district, and to the foundress of the order, the Blessed Frances Siedliska, who was beatified by Pope John Paul II in Rome on April 23, 1989.

Born near Warsaw in Poland on November 12, 1842, Frances Siedliska became an apostle of religion in her home, her country, and her church at an early age. Inspired into religious service by Father Leander Lendzian, the priest who prepared her for First Holy Communion, Frances struggled against the wishes of her family to answer her calling.

Following the death of her father, Frances formally became a servant of God and set out to establish a new religious congregation in the church. Known by the name "Mary" in religious life, she began her new order with a small group of candidates which performed various apostolic services while Mother Mary directed her efforts to the formation of the spiritual life of the members of the congregation.

Officially founded in Rome in 1875, Mother Mary opened the congregation's first convent in Cracow, Poland, in 1881, and her work expanded rapidly throughout Poland and then to England and France. Moving to the United States in 1885, the flock expanded splendidly, and, despite many obstacles and difficulties, the vigorous efforts of Mother Mary led the way for the establishment of 29 foundations worldwide, 20 of which are in the United States.

Through all of this, the pervasive thought and message that dominated the life and teachings of Mother Mary of Jesus the Good Shepherd was love—love of God, which shows itself in the active love of neighbor. She modeled her congregation on the hidden life and virtues of the Holy Family of Nazareth, and the chief purpose of the order she founded was total self-immolation through prayer, work, and suffering for the intentions of Christ and the church.

When Mother Mary finally succumbed to illness in 1902, she bequeathed to her congregation—and all those familiar with her good work—the personal example of her life and teachings, and her spirit, on which her Sisters depend as they fulfill her mission.

Presently teaching at three parish schools in my congressional district—St. Stanislaus Koska School, and Saints Cyril and Methodius School in the Greenpoint section, and in Our Lady of Czenstochowa School in the Sunset Park section—the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth respond to the contemporary needs of the church and the world by engaging in a diversity of services, mindful that their particular gift to the church is ministry to the family.

I am proud of the exemplary service that these devoted Sisters have given to the residents of my district for so many years, and in commemoration of this magnificent occasion, I am delighted to honor Mary the Mother of Jesus the Good Shepherd and the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JOE NALL

HON. LINDSAY THOMAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on November 27, 1989, Mr. Joseph T. Nall, a member of the National Transportation Safety Board, was killed in a plane crash near Caracas, Venezuela. He was in Caracas to deliver a speech to the Venezuelan Aeronautical Congress.

Joe had been by my office on a number of occasions to discuss the needs of transportation safety in America, and his enthusiasm and commitment to service were invigorating.

But in addition to his professional life in Washington, Joe was a generous and committed person in his church and his community.

I would ask that I be permitted to include in the RECORD at this point a memorial statement by my administrative assistant, who knew Joe through his membership at Riverside Baptist Church in Washington. I also include statements by Rev. David Jordan, Mrs. Jean Davis, and Rev. Bill Smith, delivered at Riverside's December 5, 1989, memorial service in honor of Joe Trippe Nall.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT H. HURT, ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT TO U.S. REPRESENTATIVE LINDSAY THOMAS

The term "public servant" has become an expression we use so often that most of us forget the magnitude of its meaning. But Joe Nall put power into the words "public servant," and those of us who are privileged to serve in some capacity in our government could have loved him for that fact alone.

In short, he was the uniquely American "public servant"—someone who loved his country and his government, but who was restlessly anxious to make it serve its people better. He took pride in the dedication of his colleagues and staff. He took exception to the wearisome inefficiencies of a bureaucracy.

He also enjoyed the excitement of the political process, and so he enjoyed the company of the men and women who were elected to Congress, and the staff members who work to serve them.

When Joe Nall entered a room, the air seemed to crackle with his special energy and enthusiasm.

But his was not the energy of self importance that is so often a facet of official Washington—it was an energy that flowed through the bright light of his love for life and his interest in others.

As a fellow deacon at the Riverside Baptist Church, I had the pleasure of seeing Joe's special energy in action in his church life as well as his professional life. His attitude was the same in both—to volunteer to do whatever was needed, to back up his words with his deeds, and to take joy in getting to know the people he worked with.

For me, Joe Nall's life will always be a reminder of how much one person can give—to his family, his friends, and to God.

And it will also be a reminder of the eternal truth of how short our lives are, and how we fail ourselves if we do not live the days we have to the fullest.

I remember that soon after Joe's death, I called our fellow deacon Bill Clohan to talk about that tragic event, and I was struck by the fact that we shared the same two powerful feelings—the pain of Joe's loss, and the fact that we had in some way cheated ourselves by not spending even more time with him.

It had seemed that there would always be time to do everything with Joe, to enjoy his company, to learn from him, and to be engaged by his quick mind that was always ready to learn a new fact and make a new friend.

But, of course, there was not enough time, and so we have learned an old lesson in a sorrow-filled way.

Joe used his time to make a memorial to his memory more perfect than any stone we might carved or words we might speak in his honor. His memorial is written in the hearts of the men, the women, and the children who shared the joy of knowing him.

As our government begins this new year and this new decade, we will do so in a diminished way because we will be without one of our very best.

We will all have to try a little harder and work a little longer, because one of the finest "public servants" I have known is close to our hearts, but no longer at our side.

INVOCATION BY THE REV. DAVID JORDAN, PASTOR, TWINBROOK BAPTIST CHURCH, ROCKVILLE, MD

Dear Lord, we come together today with many feelings. We feel anger at the unfairness of having such a wonderful friend taken from us. We feel shock. We feel sadness. We do not understand why this has happened, and we are frustrated that we have no answers.

We will miss Joe Nall in many ways. We will miss his willing spirit. We will miss his enthusiasm that would light up a room. We will miss his love of children. We will miss his friendship. We will miss his companionship. We will miss the deep and abiding love that he brought to You and to Your Church.

We will miss the special human things about Joe Nall. We will miss his cute Southern accent. We will miss his Dr. Zhivago good looks. We will miss his warm smile that would light up a room. We will miss that stupid beeper he always wore.

We thank you for giving us such a great friend. We ask Your blessings in bringing Your peace to our hearts. In the name of Jesus Christ, we pray, amen.

MEMORIAL TRIBUTE TO JOE NALL

(By Mrs. Jean Davis, Board of Deacons, Riverside Baptist Church)

It is an honor to represent the Board of Deacons of this church and speak on its behalf to pay tribute to our fellow deacon, Joe Nall. I do this with both joy and sorrow. (A former Deacon in our church described such occasions as "Sadhappy" . . . Life for a Christian, filled with "Sadhappy" events). I am sad that Joe is gone; but I am happy that we had him for the time that we did.

I must confess that presently the sorrow and sadness seem to far outweigh the joy and happiness. That is probably the case with all of us. However, the joy and happiness will emerge upon reflection of Jesus' promises to us; upon reflection of Joe's wonderful life, and strength in our personal faith. Joe was such a good man! A wonderful person! Joe was good by any standard that one could apply in evaluating a good person. The first, and I believe, the highest standard would be his Christianity. He lived his Christianity! He was kind. He was sensitive. He loved his neighbor. The neighbor that he loved crossed all boundaries of education, race, economics, and geography. He helped feed the hungry, he cared for the poor, he lived a life that promoted the kingdom of God. Jesus said, "Thou shall love the lord, thy God, with all thy heart and thy neighbor as thyself." Joe heard him!

When I was elected Deacon to this church a year ago, our pastor gave to me a book entitled, The Emerging Role of Deacons. In reading that book, several points struck me as I struggled to learn what being a Deacon means. One line said "Deacons exist to serve God and the Church." Another, "Deacons are ideally people of vision, excitement, and creative energy." Another, "Deacons take upon themselves a major duty to families, and the families develop the feeling that they are now being ministered to in a special way." And finally, "The fundamental impact is that in Deacons, God has special church servants through whom he continues to share a ministry of compassion." Those of us who served with Joe as Deacons here at Riverside can take those thoughts, take out the word Deacon and place in its stead, Joe, and have a powerful wonderful description of the man who's life we celebrate today.

For you see, Joe existed to serve God and the Church. Joe was a—person of vision, excitement and creative energy. Joe took upon himself families and ministered to them in a very special way. . . and we have witnessed his compassion.

Our sadness and sorrow over being separated from Joe is perhaps understandable. It is certainly human. For we will miss seeing him on Sunday mornings, and Tuesday nights; we will miss him singing in the choir; attending Deacons' meeting, helping with communion, sharing his knowledge and his talents with us. We will miss the warm and loving fellowship that each of us enjoyed with him. (Joe had the uncanny ability, when talking with you, to make you feel like the most important person on earth to him at that time). We will miss all of that.

However, there is joy and hope today because Joe did live and we got to share his life. We are thankful for that life, and the opportunity we had to share in it. (What if he had taken another job . . . never had come to Washington . . . think what we would have missed!) We can be happy that he touched our lives and having touched us, we are better people.

The ultimate job will come when we are re-united with Joe, as Jesus has promised. For he teaches us that when he returns, he will gather all believers and there will be a new heaven and a new earth. Being a body of believers, we take comfort in the knowledge that we will be gathered together . . . Joe will be there and we will all spend eternity together. That belief is the source of my joy today and hope for tomorrow.

WORDS IN MEMORY OF JOSEPH T. NALL

(By William H. Smith, Pastor, Riverside Baptist Church)

Jesus told the story of a man who put his business affairs in the hands of his servants while he left the country on an extended journey. When the man returned he called his servants to give an accounting. He was delighted with a servant who had not only taken good care of the capital entrusted to him but had actually doubled the value of the investment. The proud master said,

"Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord." (Matthew 25:23)

I am sure that Monday evening, November 27, 1989, Joe Nall heard those same words, "Well done, good and faithful servant . . . enter thou into the joy of the Lord." Our confidence that Joe has met Christ and received his reward gives us comfort to bear the pain of our loss through his death.

We are also helped in our grief by our good memories of Joe. I have my own memories of this fine Christian to share. On the day before he left to go to Venezuela I had lunch with Joe. Because he was preparing to go out of town he wanted me to come up to the office and spend some time talking with him about church concerns before he left. We talked about his plans to help the church in its outreach program. He wanted more people to know about the good news of our faith. He wanted the church to include more people in its witness. He wanted to help more children in our tutoring program. As always Joe was upbeat about the work of the church and dedicated to widening the circle and including more people. We talked about family. He asked about my children. With great pride he gave me the latest news about Molly and Anna Kate. I don't think I ever talked with Joe for any length of time that he didn't mention his daughters and his great pride in them. He shared his excitement about Bernard, his pupil in the church tutoring program, and the good progress that Bernard was making. We also talked about his work. He appreciated those who shared his mission at the National Transportation Safety Board. He believed in the importance of their task and was proud of the high competence of the team. He obviously liked the people with whom he worked. As we made our way through the building toward the cafeteria, Joe stopped again and again to say hello, to introduce me to a co-worker, to make some friendly inquiry. On the elevator he got so involved in conversation that we missed our stop and had to back-track a couple of floors. When I said good-bye that afternoon I felt again, as I always did with Joe, his intense human warmth and enthusiastic good will.

There is one word that I can use as a summary description of my memories of Joe Nall. The word is enthusiasm. He was enthusiastic about his family, his church, his work, and his friends. I especially like this word, enthusiasm, as a description of Joe because it derives from two Greek words, en Theos, words that we find in the Bible. Those words mean, "in God." Joe was enthusiastic. Joe was in God. He was God-filled. His enthusiasm, by his own testimony, came from his faith. His life ambition was to be a good and faithful servant of Jesus Christ. On this day of grief we are comforted by our faith and by our memories. We can say together, thanks be to God for the life of Joe Nall. Amen.

TRIBUTE TO LEONARD SHANE

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, we rise today to honor an outstanding individual and exemplary member of our community—Leonard Shane. He is being honored for 50 years of public service by American Associates, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev [AABGU], where he will receive an honorary doctorate at AABGU's 1990 tribute dinner. It is with particular pride that I note that this is the first time such an honor has been bestowed in California.

Leonard's record of commitment and leadership extends across both the public and private sectors. He was the founding president of the Los Angeles Zoo, president of the Orange County Jewish Federation, chairman of the United Jewish Welfare Fund and currently serves on the boards of the Orange County Performing Arts Center, the Orange County Philharmonic Society and Orange County Public Television.

Leonard has received over 300 citations and awards from civic groups and organizations. He is also the holder of the Ben-Gurion Medal from the State of Israel and the Humanitarian Award from the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Leonard's work for Ben-Gurion University of the Negev is of particular importance to him. He currently chairs the southwest region and is national vice president of American Associates. He is a member of the university's international board of governors and the Shane family has founded the Hubert Humphrey Institute for Social Ecology and endowed a chair in education at the institution.

Leonard is chairman and CEO of the Mercury Savings and Loan Association. He has been married to Marjorie for almost 50 years and they have four married children and seven grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, it is our privilege and pleasure to ask our colleagues to join us in saluting Leonard Shane, a leader in our community, a role model for all and a man we are proud to call our friend.

RESPONSE TO FDIC CHAIRMAN WILLIAM SEIDMAN

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, many experts give Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC] Chairman William Seidman high marks for his performance in guiding the FDIC during a tumultuous period in our Nation's commercial banking industry. Mr. Seidman is now entrusted with an additional important responsibility—assisting the Resolution Trust Corporation in managing the massive bailout of our savings and loan industry. But on February 19, 1990 at the Phoenecian Resort in Scottsdale, AZ, Mr. Seidman made statements about a sector of our Nation's financial institutions that he apparently still needs to learn more about—our Nation's 15,000 credit unions.

According to a February 20, 1990 Associated Press story, Mr. Seidman told the American Bankers Association National Conference for Community Bankers the following:

First, credit unions are growing extremely fast; second, credit unions are increasing their investments in areas where they have little experience; and third, the strength of the credit union Federal deposit insurance fund may be overstated.

I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight for my House colleagues as well as for Mr. Seidman:

Credit unions are not growing quickly. In fact, in 1989 credit unions experienced their third straight yearly drop in growth of assets, posting a modest growth of just 5 percent.

Credit unions are not engaging in risky investments. They remain heavily involved in their traditional and best investments—loans to their members. In fact, loans in 1989 increased nearly 5 percent as a percentage of total assets. Credit unions may have slightly increased residential lending to their members, but commercial banks still have nearly double the amount of assets in residential and risky commercial loans. Federal law also prohibits credit unions from making investments in risky activities such as junk bonds and luxury resort hotels such as the Phoenecian.

The Credit Union Share Insurance Fund [NCUSIF] has enjoyed success and stability in recent years. Its reserve-to-insured deposits ratio is far superior to that of the Bank Insurance Fund [BIF]. While BIF lost $2.60 per $1,000 in 1988, NCUSIF lost only 38 cents. In addition, NCUSIF's reserve ratio has averaged over $1.25 per $100 insured since 1985. In contrast, the BIF lost $4.5 billion last year.

Mr. Speaker, when an official in Mr. Seidman's position makes erroneous remarks about the soundness of 15,000 of our Nation's safest financial institutions it is a very serious matter. When these remarks are made at the Lincoln Savings and Loan financed Phoenecian Resort—a nationally known symbol of the abuses that caused the thrift debacle—this borders on irresponsibility. I would strongly suggest to Mr. Seidman that he learn the facts the next time he chooses to publicly discuss financial institutions that he is not responsible for regulating. Charles Keating did not rise from the ranks of the credit union industry.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of important legislative initiatives that are desperately needed in order to improve the lot of our children today. We are the only industrialized Nation in the world in which children are the poorest age group—13 million children and over 1 in 5 live in poverty. On any given night, 100,000 children have no home. There is a 50-percent dropout rate in our innercity high schools. One-half of our Nation's black females become pregnant before they reach the age of 20. We're all familiar with these statistics and there is legislation targeted at each and every one of these problems. But I feel legislation is also needed that will define desirable goals for our children and then spur local action to reach these goals. This legislation will outline a national young policy for America.

The Young Americans Act introduced by our beloved colleague, the late Senator Claude Pepper, is the youth policy our country needs. The goals of the Young Americans Act are lofty but its methods are down-to-earth as evidenced by its overwhelmingly successful parent, the Older Americans Act. Passed in 1965, the Older Americans Act began with a vision that went far beyond what its modest $6 million budget would realistically allow. But the vision to improve the lot of our elderly served as the impetus for people at the local level to design innovative programs to reach out to seniors—Meals on Wheels, transportation services, adult day-care, home renovation programs—and the Older Americans Act has expanded to a $1 billion endeavor which has remarkably improved the nutrition, health and general well-being of our elderly. And it is this same kind of spirit which will make the Young Americans Act a building block for future children services at the community level.

The Young Americans Act was extremely important to Senator Pepper. He greatly wanted to see this legislation enacted. In order to gather momentum for passage, I have been collecting names of Members of Congress who wanted to be on record as supporters of this important legislation. The names of these following Representatives are in addition to the other 56 Representatives who are on record as supporting H.R. 1492:

Congressman JOHN J. LAFALCE, Congressman MARTIN FROST, Congressman ROBERT W. DAVIS, Congressman HAROLD E. FORD, Congressman ENI F. FALEOMAVAEGA, Congressman JAIME B. FUSTER, Congressman JAMES H. BILBRAY, Congressman TERRY L. BRUCE, Congresswoman JOLENE UNSOELD, Congressman TOM SAWYER, and Congressman BART GORDON.

There is no greater social task than to improve the lot of our children. I urge other Members to support this extremely important legislation to invest in the future of America.

TRIBUTE TO A FINE YOUNG AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, Thomas Charles Lizardo has just retired as executive director of Young Americans for Freedom [YAF] and I wish to recognize the valuable service which he provided to that organization during his tenure and his exemplary loyalty to the conservative cause.

YAF is a conservative youth organization founded on the principles of the "Sharon Statement," scribed in 1960 at the Connecticut estate of William F. Buckley, Jr. The organization has a long and proud history of conservative activism on high school and college campuses across the Nation.

Thomas C. Lizardo planned and implemented the largest and most successful fall offensive in YAF history, and as executive director he worked diligently and tirelessly to advance the goals and principles of the organization. His achievements have earned for him the great respect and admiration of his fellow YAF'ers and of myself.

I wish to honor Thomas Lizardo for his distinguished record, and extend my sincere best wishes for continued success as he battles the forces of evil with only a sword and a shield—these being the right of free will under God, and "Roberts Rules of Order Revised." Keep up the good fight, Thomas.

SALUTE TO JO ANN AINSWORTH

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today and ask this House to salute Jo Ann Ainsworth. She is being honored by the Sylmar Chamber of Commerce for outstanding service as its executive manager.

Jo Ann has been the Sylmar Chamber's executive manager for the past 4 years. During that period she has played a key role in expanding the chamber's outreach and has involved herself in the development and promotion of the Sylmar business community. She has launched new initiatives and has been a bedrock of professionalism and competence for the chamber's executive officers.

In addition to her chamber work, Jo Ann has been deeply involved in a wide range of community organizations. She is a vice-president of the Kiwanis, an activist in the Foothill Advisory Booster Association and a board member of Sylmar Baseball.

Jo Ann is married to Alfred and they have three children.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Jo Ann Ainsworth, a community leader of whom we can all be proud.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH—SELMA TO MONTGOMERY NATIONAL TRAIL STUDY ACT OF 1989

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, as we near the end of Black History Month 1990, I believe we can honestly say that this month illustrated the importance in studying this rich history and the valuable lessons to learn from it. One facet of black history is being addressed through H.R. 3834—the Selma to Montgomery National Trail Study Act of 1989—introduced by Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. I am here today to request your support on this piece of legislation which would amend the National Trails System Act to designate the route from Selma to Montgomery for study for potential addition to the National Trails System.

This legislation recognizes the historic march from Selma to Montgomery in March 1965, which led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, achieving the legal right to vote for all Americans. Events associated with the march from Selma to Montgomery and from what came to be known as "Bloody Sunday" sent shock waves around the world, raised the Nation's consciousness, and convinced political leaders that the time had come for voting rights legislation. It is very important that we all consider this piece of legislation, for it recognizes the tremendous contributions made by our black leaders during times of turmoil. These courageous leaders furthered our Nation's pursuit of our most fundamental rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Through remembering events such as the Selma to Montgomery march, we are called to remember the ignorance of racial prejudices which ran rampant in the sixties. Since our founding, our country has prided itself as a melting pot of all races, creeds, and cultures. We achieve our excellence through this diversity. Throughout this month we have given recognition to the tremendous contributions made by all black men and women in furthering our Nation's excellence.

In closing, I ask you to support this legislation, for it serves as a reminder to all the importance of interracial harmony as well as the sacrifices made by men and women who dedicated their lives to achieve voting rights for all Americans.

EAGLE SCOUT HONORED

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues, an outstanding young individual from the Fifth Congressional District of Illinois who has completed a major goal in his Scouting career. On Sunday, March 25, 1990 at the Doremus Congregational Church located in Chicago, IL, John Risley will be honored at an Eagle Scout Court of Honor.

It is important to note that less than 1 percent of all young men in America attain the rank of Eagle Scout. This high honor can only be earned by those Scouts demonstrating extraordinary leadership abilities. This young individual has clearly demonstrated such abilities through his dedicated community service and deserves special recognition.

In light of the commendable leadership and courageous activities performed by such a fine young man, I ask you, my fellow colleagues, to join me in honoring John Risley for attaining the highest honor in Scouting—the Eagle Scout. With God's blessings, let us wish him the very best in all of his endeavors.

TRIBUTE TO ZONTA CLUB OF SANTA BARBARA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the Zonta Club of Santa Barbara on its 60th anniversary of service to the community of Santa Barbara. The Zonta Club of Santa Barbara was established in February 1930, as a branch of Zonta International, a global network of executives in business and the professions working to improve the legal, political, economic, and professional status of women. Founded in 1919 in Buffalo, NY, it has become a worldwide network sponsoring projects such as the Ann Frank Village in Germany, the School for Girls at Ramallah, Jordan, and UNIFEM projects to teach functional skills to women in Latin America and Third World countries.

The club's local projects include the Santa Barbara Search and Rescue Team, Shelter Services for Women, the Rape Crisis Center, and many others. The Zonta Club of Santa Barbara also participates in the Amelia Earhart scholarship fund, which gives scholarships to women for advanced studies in aeronautics and aerospace.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the U.S. House of Representatives, I commend and congratulate the Zonta Club of Santa Barbara for its 60 years of achievement and service to the community, and extend our warmest best wishes for the future.

THE INSURANCE FUND FOR CREDIT UNIONS WORKS

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, last year, Congress enacted the most significant banking law since the Great Depression—the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989 [FIRREA]. The widely perceived purpose of this legislation was to come to the financial rescue of the faltering savings and loan industry. In fact, it did much more.

FIRREA is wide ranging legislation that went to the core of how our Nation's depository institutions are regulated and operated. Its countless regulatory and operational changes impact not only savings and loans, but also credit unions and commercial banks. FIRREA also authorizes numerous studies to identify areas that will still need improvement. These studies will have particular significance because it is becoming increasingly evident that—for as far as FIRREA went—many problems still remain for Congress to solve.

Foremost among these issues is deposit insurance reform. By now, the multibillion dollar collapse of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation—now known as the Savings Association Insurance Fund [SAIF]—is well known. However, few realize that $4.5 billion in losses were experienced last year by the Bank Insurance Fund [BIF]—formerly known as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC]. Moreover, in less than 2 years, BIF's reserve-to-insured deposits ratio has dropped over 25 percent from a $1.10 per $100 insured to just under 80 cents.

These severe losses indicate that there may be something systemically amiss with these two insurance funds. However, while BIF and SAIF have been experiencing record losses, their credit union counterpart—the National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund [NCUSIF]—has enjoyed success and stability in recent years. NCUSIF's reserve ratio has averaged over $1.25 per $100 insured since 1985. Additionally, while BIF lost $2.60 per $1,000 insured in 1988, NCUSIF lost only 38 cents.

One reason for the credit union fund's success is that it's structure was modernized by Congress in 1984. Prior to that time, NCUSIF was—like its bank and thrift counterparts—operated as a premium-based insurance fund. Under this system, credit unions payed annual insurance premiums to the NCUSIF based on the amount of their insured accounts. Credit unions typically payed 8.6 cents per $100 insured each year.

In 1984, Congress recognized the shortfalls in the credit union fund's system. Congress required credit unions—not the taxpayers—to recapitalize their depleted insurance fund. It also changed the fund from a premium-based to a "pay as you grow" system. Credit unions must now maintain a deposit of 1 percent of their insured accounts with the NCUSIF. If a credit union grows, it must pay 1 percent of the amount of its growth to the NCUSIF. Furthermore, the NCUSIF keeps all the interest earned off the 1 percent deposits and may assess an additional premium if necessary. Because the credit union industry has been so healthy, this additional premium has not been necessary.

It has been suggested that had the credit union insurance system been imposed on banks and savings and loans earlier this decade, the FIRREA may never have been necessary. At the very least, the $300 billion cost of the thrift bailout could have been reduced. Here's why:

First, the credit union system provides for a virtually "fail proof" insurance fund. Again, the NCUSIF's reserves to insured accounts ratio stands today at 1.25 percent—more than 50-percent stronger than BIF. Nearly $400 million of the NCUSIF is in retained earnings, while $1.6 billion consists of credit union deposits equal to 1 percent of insured accounts. In the unlikely event that retained earnings are expended to cover losses, credit unions would be required to restore any and all money necessary to keep the fund at a 1-percent reserve ratio. For example, had such a mechanism been in effect at FDIC last year when its reserve ratio dropped from 1.10 to 0.80 percent, insured banks would have been automatically required to provide roughly $3.5 billion in new funds to restore FDIC to a level of 1 percent. If thrifts had such a requirement when FSLIC's reserve ratio dropped below 1 percent in 1983, the hemorrhage from the FSLIC could have been reduced.

Second, a direct consequence of this system is that it imposes market discipline upon deposit insurance. Since insured credit unions are collectively responsible if losses drive the insurance fund's reserve ratio below 1 percent, the system places a strong economic incentive on credit unions to operate in a safe and sound manner. An additional incentive is that if NCUSIF losses are negligible and its reserve ratio grows beyond 1.3 percent, credit unions are entitled to a rebate of funds above this level.

In the coming year as Congress continues to contemplate the future regulatory framework in which our Nation's depository institutions will operate, perhaps we should consider using the one Federal deposit insurance fund that has worked—the credit union fund—as a model for the others to follow.

INTRODUCTION OF THE MICKEY LELAND MEMORIAL DOMESTIC HUNGER RELIEF ACT OF 1990

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, agriculture is a way of life in the United States and touches each and every one of us on a daily basis. Many people contribute to the bountiful harvest we all enjoy. No one should be left out of this harvest; and yet we know there are people among us who are in dire need and lack the resources to obtain nutritious diets. That is why I have joined with my colleagues to introduce a bill that will provide food assistance to needy families through the Food Stamp Program and through the Emergency Food Assistance Program, better known as TEFAP.

It is fitting that this bill is named after my close personal friend and colleague, Mickey Leland. Mickey and I shared a dream of a world in which no person ever went hungry. He and I had long discussions on this topic in the halls of the Congress and whenever we traveled here and abroad. I particularly remember our last trip to Ethiopia in the spring of 1989—almost 1 year ago. I remember Mickey with children who had not eaten a decent meal in their brief lives. I remember how much he cared and wanted to help, and I believe this bill furthers the goals he and I and so many others aspire to.

I firmly believe that in our Nation of abundance, it is a tragedy for any child, elderly person, or anyone to go hungry. We are a generous country. That is why we have programs like the $16 billion Food Stamp Program and other supplementary programs to feed needy people. When these programs do not work or provide insufficient help we have a responsibility to know why and then do something about it. That is what I hope this bill will do.

The bill my colleagues and I are introducing today reflects what we hope to be able to do to improve the Federal food assistance programs. I do realize that the budget resolution for 1991 has not yet been adopted by the Congress. Whatever additional funding that is provided in the budget resolution will dictate the parameters of our efforts in the food assistance area. I feel confident saying that the final bill, what will eventually be a title in the 1990 farm bill, will be in accord with the budget resolution. Additionally, as we have done in the past, should there be sequestration, as provided for by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the additional spending provided in the food assistance bill will be adjusted.

The manner in which we, as a country, provide assistance to needy families should be governed by a sense of compassion, a desire to help people get back on their own feet when their need is temporary, and a clear view that the system now in place must be reformed from one in which we have programs for food, programs for financial assistance, and programs for special needs. Remember, we are trying to help whole people, not just parts of them. A program that provides help for those unable to help themselves and makes taxpayers out of the able-bodied is my ultimate goal.

The bill my colleagues and I are introducing today accomplishes several important goals, most importantly, it reauthorizes the Food Stamp Program and the Emergency Food Assistance Program [TEFAP]. From the aspect of Federal food assistance programs the mainstay of feeding programs is the Food Stamp Program. It is a program that will provide $16 billion in benefits this year, as compared to the $9 billion provided in 1980.

FOOD STAMP PROGRAM

This bill makes several changes in the Food Stamp Program. Food stamp benefits are increased across-the-board through an increase in the Thrifty Food Plan. Participants will have their benefits based on 105 percent of the Thrifty Food Plan by 1995. In addition, by 1994 the ceiling on the excess shelter expense deduction will be lifted. Currently 25 percent of the food stamp households are not able to deduct full shelter and heating expenses because of the ceiling on that deduction. Lifting the ceiling will allow full accommodation of shelter costs of food stamp participants.

The definition of a household for food stamp purposes is simplified. This has been one area that has proved to be a significant problem for States administering the Food Stamp Program. Under the bill introduced today, the household, for food stamp purposes, will consist of persons purchasing and preparing food together. Parents and their minor children must apply together as a single household.

This bill also proposes to exclude the first $50 a month paid as child support from consideration as income in the Food Stamp Program, consistent with the AFDC regulations. This provision highlights the importance of securing child support payments from absent parents, who, I believe, have the obligation to support their children. It is extremely important that Federal assistance programs stress this responsibility. I am pleased that the USDA is proposing to provide the child support enforcement services now available to AFDC families, to food stamp families. I am anxious to review the USDA proposal and have it included in the food stamp reauthorization.

Other changes proposed to be made to the Food Stamp Program include an increase in the $4,500 limit on cars to $5,500; allowing persons 50 years and older who are college students to participate in the Food Stamp Program, if otherwise eligible; and, an increase to $75 per month the amount of actual expenses that may be reimbursed during participation in the Food Stamp Employment and Training Program.

In addition, States will be required to implement automated data processing systems by October 1993, with annual review by the secretary. The Secretary will be permitted to waive these requirements for small States and in certain other circumstances. This provision will contribute to the efficient administration of the Food Stamp Program, provide necessary help to overworked administrators, and help provide a means to deliver the correct amount of benefits in an effective manner.

An extremely important provision in the bill introduced today concerns the complicated nature of the Food Stamp Program and the AFDC program. Both programs are designed to serve needy families. However, the rules and regulations differ to a great degree providing confusion and inefficiency for participants and administrators alike. For those families receiving AFDC, we ought to be able to provide food stamp benefits without requiring them to go through a maze of applications, forms, verifications and procedures that are different from those applicable to the AFDC program. After all, we are talking about needy families—families needing income and food assistance.

When a family is in need of help, that need often crosses program lines. Need for income assistance often means need for housing assistance, food assistance, and for some, help in finding and keeping a job. The hurdles that families must scale in applying for help are immense. They often must go to different agencies, different eligibility workers, meet different eligibility standards and abide by different rules and regulations. That they are able to receive help is often a reflection of their abilities, rather than the system presented to them.

Administrators of these programs—both on the State and local levels—have similar problems. The resolution of the differences in the Federal assistance programs is often not within their ability to achieve. Many efforts have been made by States; but they may have gone as far as they can go. The proposal in the bill introduced today makes an initial step to resolving the differences between the two major assistance programs—AFDC and food stamps. We are proposing that certain sites be allowed to determine food stamp eligibility based on the AFDC regulations, for those AFDC families in which all members receive AFDC. While we propose that AFDC rules be applied in almost all instances, food stamp rules will be used for income deductions and processing standards, including the provision of expedited services for families in immediate need.

This important, innovative procedure is a first step in the process of resolving the differences among the several Federal assistance programs. Needy families are not well served by the complicated, confusing process now in place. Administrators on the State and local level cannot get a handle on the myriad of programs and deliver services to needy families in an effective and efficient manner. The current system does not deliver benefits to needy families in either a compassionate or efficient manner. I hope this bill will change that.

COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROGRAMS

One of the debates that arose during the consideration of the Hunger Prevention Act of 1988 concerned the differences between the Food Stamp Program and TEFAP. Both programs are valuable and necessary programs. However, for some of the ability to receive commodities through TEFAP may mean the only assistance they receive. Some needy families, especially elderly families, were much more likely to desire and receive commodities through TEFAP. That is why this bill requires the purchase of $190 million in commodities for TEFAP for each of 1991 and 1992; $220 million is authorized each year for 1993, 1994 and 1995. I am an ardent supporter of the commodity distribution programs. I believe this is an efficient and effective means by which we can provide food to needy people. The rural, elderly poor are able to benefit from commodity distribution programs much more readily than the Food Stamp Program.

Homeless people are also in need of food assistance. Therefore this bill continues the commodity homeless program at the level established in the Hunger Prevention Act of $32 million. This program is continued through 1995, so that soup kitchens and food banks can receive commodities and serve needy people without permanent homes.

Other changes to the commodity distribution program include establishment of a commodity supplemental food program for elderly persons, permanent food bank projects, and a requirement that the Secretary of Agriculture make surplus commodities available to emergency feeding organizations when available and if necessary, on an irregular or seasonal basis, depending on availability.

I hope my colleagues will join with me and the other sponsors of this bill to work to provide food assistance to needy families and individuals in a compassionate and efficient manner. My ultimate goal is to see true reform of the welfare system—through which we provide benefits to needy people through coordinated and simplified programs and also provide employment and training to able-bodied participants.

We have a responsibility to maintain programs for those who are aged or disabled; but we also must simplify the programs we have now and provide a method to make taxpayers out of those able-bodied people now in need of help.

TRIBUTE TO HAIM AND SARAH ARAZI

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute Haim and Sarah Arazi. They are being honored by Chabad of the Valley at the organization's Banquet-Concert '90 for their outstanding support of Chabad's work in our community.

Haim was born and raised in Cairo where he experienced firsthand the persecution and eventual expulsion of the Egyptian Jewish community. Haim went to Israel where he quickly became active in building the young country. He moved to New York in 1969, met Sara and together they founded a series of successful businesses.

Since their arrival in Los Angeles almost a decade ago, Sarah and Haim Arazi have devoted large amounts of their time and resources to various charitable and religious institutions within the Jewish community. They have been instrumental in establishing schools, summer camps, community centers, and outreach programs. They are also active in several congregations in the city and pioneered Chabad's most recent expansion program.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in acclaiming Haim and Sarah Arazi, community leaders and role models for all.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE NICARAGUAN PEOPLE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate President-elect Violeta Chamorro and the Nicaraguan people on their stunning victory over Daniel Ortega and the Sandinista party. All eyes were focused on this election and many predicted a Sandinista win, but the true desire of the Nicaraguan people prevailed, the desire to live in peace and freedom.

It is my hope that world attention does not fade from Nicaragua as the path just chosen by its brave people is a long and arduous one. The success that Ms. Chamorro and her new government will achieve depends significantly on the obstacles she will encounter when she is sworn in on April 25, 1990.

Among these obstacles are control of the Nicaraguan military and interior police who still owe allegiance to Ortega and the Sandinista party. Dismantling this Sandinista apparatus will be the first major challenge of the newly elected democratic government. To alleviate the fear of violence and instabliity, it is clear that the Sandinista party must make a full transference of political and military power.

Mr. Speaker, Daniel Ortega said the voice of the Nicaraguan people would be heard on election day. It was, and it sang of democracy. My message to the Nicaraguan people is "Viva Violeta, viva Nicaragua, y viva la democracia."

ALBANIANS DENIED HUMAN RIGHTS IN YUGOSLAVIA—STATE DEPARTMENT REPORT CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT POLICY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, the annual State Department report to Congress—"Country Reports on Human Rights Practices"—was released last week. Media coverage of the contents of the document have focused on a few high-profile countries with serious human rights abuses, but the media has not given appropriate attention to one extremely serious problem—treatment of ethnic Albanians in Yugoslavia.

Since this State Department report is one of the most important documents on human rights conditions in 1989, it is important that we be aware of its conclusions regarding Yugoslavia. I would like to call some of the comments regarding human rights abuses against the Albanian ethnic community to the attention of my distinguished colleagues in the Congress.

Yugoslavia is a multiethnic federal state which has enjoyed excellent relations with the United States in the past. Currently Yugoslavia is undergoing significant social and political changes, as are the other countries of Eastern Europe. Unfortunately, the trends in Yugoslavia are not consistently in the direction of greater democracy, pluralism, and observance of human rights. While positive democratic progress has taken place in the northern Republics of Slovenia and Croatia in the Kosovo Autonomous Province of the Serbian Republic and in the Macedonian Republic, Yugoslav citizens of Albanian ethnic background are increasingly subject to serious human rights abuses.

The State Department report notes that "according to government reports released in 1989, of 436 persons officially acknowledged to have been sentenced for political offenses in Yogoslavia, 336 were in Kosovo. March demonstrations by ethnic Albanians protesting the Serbian effort to assert greater control over the Province of Kosovo led to at least 25 deaths." Official government statistics for 1988 indicated that "of 517 political charges filed nationwide, 43 percent of the defendants were ethnic Albanians from Kosovo" and "Albanians were tried in other republics as well as in Kosovo." It is absolutely shocking, Mr. Speaker, that Albanians, which make up only 8 percent of the population of Yugoslavia should make up well over half of those punished for supposed political crimes in Yugoslavia. This is a case of serious discrimination by Yugoslav authorities.

Mr. Speaker, an area of great concern is arbitrary arrest and detention. Here there appears to be a deterioration of human rights conditions in Yogoslavia, particularly as they apply to ethnic Albanians. The State Department reports:

As part of government measures to counter demonstrations by Albanians protesting Serbian efforts to expand Serbian influence in Kosovo Province, Yugoslav authorities subjected 237 Albanians from Kosovo to a legal procedure knows as "isolation" which has not previously been used in Yugoslavia in this fashion. These people were rounded up and held for up to 3 months, in most cases denied access to attorneys or to familes. The majority were not held in Kosovo but in prisons in Serbia, where they were subjected to beatings, cold, inadequate food, and harsh interrogations. Isolated prisoners were reportedly detained under suspicion of belonging to illegal organizations, contact with "hostile" emigre groups, illegal arms trafficking, and organizing strikes and demonstrations. Of the 237 persons isolated, 41 were eventually charged with criminal offenses and 18 with misdemeanors.

Azem Vlasi, an ethnic Albanian who was a former leader of the League of Communists of Kosovo, was arrested in February and put on trial in November. That trial is still continuing. Based on the charges brought forward against him by government prosecutors, however, Yugoslav human rights advocates have argued that the charges against Vlasi amount to holding him criminally liable for policies he carried out as a leader in Kosovo which were counter to those policies being pursued by the Serbian Republic. This denial of a fair trail and the conditions of his imprisonment are in serious violation of human rights.

Mr. Speaker, limitations by Yugoslav officials on freedom of speech and freedom of the press, particularly against Albanians, are a very serious matter. In March of last year, an ethnic Albania was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment for shouting slogans in a restaurant and in a public square in the Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. The State Department report notes particular discrimination against ethnic Albanians in this regard: "Albanians in Kosovo may well be jailed for calling for their Province to be given republic status within Yugoslavia, while in other parts of the country journalists or public figures may openly advocate this step."

Academic freedom was severely damaged in the Province of Kosovo when at least 30 instructors were expelled from the University of Pristina, and large numbers of teachers at all educational levels were disciplined or fired under suspicion of influencing students toward Albanian separatist views. Those who espouse views not favored by the Serbian Government are not only subject to expulsion from the Kosovo Communist Party, but party officials have demanded that they be fired from "leading positions," including those in managerial level of business enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, the freedom to peacefully assemble and the right of association are human and civil rights that we in the United States consider the cornerstone of our democratic system. These are rights which citizens of East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria are finding essential in their march toward democracy and the establishment of pluralistic political systems. For ethnic Albanians in Yugoslavia, however, these are rights they are still explicitly denied.

With regard to the right of association, the State Department report noted:

Association for the purpose of hostile activities is a crime under Yugoslav criminal law, and this law has been used to prosecute ethnic Albanians who advocate republic status for Kosovo. In February [1989] 11 Albanians were convicted in Pristian, Kasova, on this charge, receiving sentences of from 4 months to 8 years. In April, 10 ethnic Albanians were convicted in Prizren, Kosovo, on this charge, receiving sentences of from 1 to 6 years.

With regard to the right to assemble peacefully, the State Department notes the following about Yugoslav efforts to suppress demonstrations by ethnic Albanians:

In 1989 there were a number of large demonstrations in Serbia, Kosovo, Montenegro, and elsewhere. Demonstrations by Serbs were tolerated or even encouraged if they coincided with the Serbian leadership's objectives. Albanian demonstrators in Yugoslavia, even if peaceful, faced possible use of force by police and dismissal from their jobs. Albanian demonstrations in Kosovo were banned and eventually dispersed by force.

In Macedonia, one ethnic Albanian was sentenced to 10 years and four others to terms of 6 to 8 years for organizing a demonstration of ethnic Albanians. In another Macedonian city, 10 ethnic Albanians were tried for hostile propaganda, association with the aim of carrying out hostile activities, and counterrevolutionary acts. Another eight ethnic Albanians in Macedonia were sentenced to prison terms of 5 to 11 years for participating in a demonstration on language rights.

In February and March of last year, there were major protest demonstrations by ethnic Albanians in Kosovo against the Serbian Republic's effort to reduce the autonomy of the Kosovo Province. Serbian officials cracked down harshly against the Albanians who dared to protest—1,180 Albanians were indicted for misdemeanors and 56 more for more serious crimes in connection with these March demonstrations. These demonstrations turned violent, resulting in the official toll of 25 deaths, including those of 2 police officers. "Unofficial sources assert that the security forces used excessive force in dispersing the demonstrators, including by beating them, indiscriminately firing on them—sometimes from helicopters—and using ammunition designed to increase deaths and injuries." Unofficial reports assert that the number of demonstrators killed was substantially larger. In November demonstrations were held protesting the imprisonment and trial of Azem Vlasi, and at least 3 people were killed and 138 people were convicted of misdemeanors in connection with the demonstrations.

Mr. Speaker, not only has there been serious human rights violations in Yugoslavia, but international human rights groups have been restricted in their ability to monitor deteriorating conditions there. A factfinding mission from the European Parliament in June was denied a meeting with political prisoners and was harshly criticized in the press. A September delegation from the International Helsinki Federation met unofficially with ethnic Albanians and Serbs but was denied any meetings with government officials."

The State Department report specifically raises concerns about discrimination against ethnic Albanians.

There is legitimate suspicion that certain government policies on family subsidies are specifically aimed at ethnic Albanians, who have the highest birthrate in Europe. Macedonia already limits "social welfare" payments to the first three children in a family; Serbia is considering plans to follow suit. Macedonian authorities have manipulated building code regulations governing the height of walls to justify the bulldozing of walls that traditionally surround Albanian homes in the Republic.

Albanians have been subject to serious discrimination because of official Serbian policy to encourage Serbs to remain in Kosovo and other areas where the proportion of Albanians has increased in recent decades. For example, "In an effort to reverse the emigration of Serbs and Montenegrins from Kosovo, Serbia restricts all sales of real property in Kosovo by Serbs and Montenegrins to Albanians." Some individuals have attempted to avoid the restriction by engaging in secret sales, which are a criminal offense. "In September two ethnic Albanians were sentenced to 60-day jail terms for secretly buying Serbian property" but "only Albanian buyers are prosecuted for such transactions, not Serbian sellers."

Similarly, "jobs and housing are reserved for ethnic Serbs who wish to move back to Kosovo." The State Department report notes that "some Albanians were fired simply to make room for returning Serbs. In one instance, the nephew of the former Kosovo party chief Azem Vlasi was fired because 'his presence was an irritant to the Serbs in the workplace,' according to the Yugoslav press."

Mr. Speaker, I have only summarized some of the particularly disturbing aspects of the State Department human rights report on the treatment of ethnic Albanians in Yugoslavia. There is no question in my mind that we have here one of the most blatant examples of human rights violations. I urge my colleagues to consider these serious problems that our State Department has identified and join me in urging the Government of the Serbian Republic and the Government of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to take much needed action to correct these very serious human rights abuses.

ESCALATING ANTI-SEMITISM IN SOVIET UNION

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, despite the many positive changes appearing in the Soviet Union, disturbing reports are emerging about an increase in anti-Semitism in Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Baku and elsewhere. As the Soviet political climate improves, many of us in Congress are concerned that some will feel that they have a free hand, that Soviet authorities will not prosecute violators of human rights.

I have joined a number of my colleagues in signing a letter to Soviet President Gorbachev, asking him to denounce anti-Semitism and other forms of hatred. We have also asked him to state clearly that Soviet law enforcement agencies will protect targets as well as prosecute any violators.

The letter reads as follows:

We are pleased to witness the positive changes concerning human rights that are taking place in the USSR under your leadership. We are encouraged by the improvements your government has made in granting people their basic human right to live in the country of one's choice or, should they decide to stay in the USSR, to observe their cultural and religious heritage without government interference. We hope you will continue to expand these rights so that all citizens wishing to emigrate may do so, and those who choose to engage in cultural activities may do so with the official recognition of your government.

We are writing to you now regarding an equally serious matter. We have been receiving frequent reports of escalating anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. We regard this as a very disturbing development, and we believe that public statements made by you denouncing this menace would be very useful in discouraging the perpetuation of these ugly activities. We also urge you to make clear that law enforcement agencies will give full protection to any potential victims of such efforts.

In his recent State of the Union address, President Bush took the opportunity to condemn racism, bigotry, and anti-Semitism. We think you would agree with us that these forms of hatred have no place in any society. With that in mind, we hope that you recognize the importance of forcefully denouncing the espousers of anti-Semitism and provide full law enforcement protections to all of their potential targets.

Mr. Speaker, we have an obligation to speak out against anti-Semitism and all other forms of hatred whenever we encounter them. I hope President Gorbachev shares our concerns, and takes immediate action to ensure the safety and dignity of all those who reside in the Soviet Union.

REGARDING THE INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO DIVEST THE SAN CARLOS INDIAN IRRIGATION PROJECT

HON. JIM KOLBE

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues from the Arizona congressional delegation in sponsoring legislation to get the Bureau of Indian Affairs out of the business of acting as an electric utility in Arizona. This legislation has been 5 years in the making. It will directly effect over 10,000 families in at least a dozen different communities.

When this process is finally completed, these central Arizona communities will enjoy more reliable power; the Department of the Interior will be rid of a system that has outgrown its usefulness and effectiveness; and the Gila River and San Carlos Apache communities will have made a giant step toward economic self-sufficiency and self-determination.

Today, I am introducing legislation to divest the San Carlos Indian Irrigation Project's power transmission and distribution system. I introduced a simpler and shorter version of this bill, H.R. 2060, in 1987. At that time, the bill simply amended the act of September 22, 1961 (25 U.S.C. 15). That act permits the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of BIA electric utility system except those, like SCIP that were constructed and operated as part of an irrigation system. H.R. 2060 proposed to change that narrow exception.

At that time, the Department of the Interior testified that they would support enactment of the bill if certain concerns could be addressed. In order to address these concerns, the Interior Committee instructed me to go back with the various parties involved in this matter, and negotiate a resolution to various questions that would naturally follow from divestitute of this utility system by the BIA. Three years, countless meetings and several agreements later, we believe we are now ready.

At that hearing in June 1987, six entities expressed interest in providing power to the area served by SCIP after completion of divestiture. Those parties, the Arizona Public Service Co., Electrical District 2, the Gila River Indian Community, the San Carlos Apache Tribe, the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District, and Trico Electrical Cooperative, left that hearing with the committee's message that they were to decide among themselves how to divide the service area, with the Arizona Corporation Commission, our public utilities commission, as the final arbiter of the new franchise areas. There was only one instruction from the committee that SCIDD, the original bond holder for the project's off-reservation electrical system, would have the right to establish an economically viable system.

After the initial hearing in Congress there followed lengthy negotiations regarding divisions of territory, the reallocation of Federal hydroelectric power, wholesale power contracts, and the distribution of unobligated balances collected by SCIP. An initial agreement appeared to be reached near the end of the 100th Congress. But significant community-based opposition to some specific divisions of territory caused parties to go back to the negotiating table. This is an example of how these decisions were made; not in the back room, but in a public-oriented fashion.

Less than 1 year after that, the parties reached a new set of agreements. Since then, staff has been drafting legislation to put these agreements into effect. An initial draft was sent out last fall, and based on comments received, a final draft was completed this week.

Certain issues remain to be resolved. First and foremost, the Interior Department has been conducting an audit of the assets of the project. This audit takes into account every pole, every line, every transformer, and every dollar. The final audit report is expected within a few weeks. With that, and a subsequent hearing, final details of this legislation can be worked out.

Divestiture of SCIP must follow a very precise and detailed course. Specific guarantees and assurances must be met to ensure that everyone, including the U.S. Government and its tax-paying citizens, receive fair and equitable treatment under this Act.

Upon enactment of this act, and upon approval of the Arizona Corporation Commission, the Secretary will enter into an agreement with the Gila River Indian Community, the San Carlos Apache Tribe, and the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District for the division of project assets. All agreements necessary for the reallocation of Federal hydroelectric power will be executed and SCIP contracts will be assigned to GRIC, SCAT, and SCIDD.

Off reservation, SCIDD will be the successor in interest to the project. In return, for succession to this interest, SCIDD will enter into an agreement with the Secretary to pay an amount equal to the present value of the SCIP electric system debt obligation owed by SCIDD to the United States. Once that obligation has been satisfied, SCIDD will sell the system assets they do not intend to keep to Arizona Public Service and to Trico Electrical Cooperative, consistent with the statement of principles entered into.

On reservation, the Secretary will transfer to the Gila River Indian Community that portion of the system on their reservation. The Secretary will transfer to the San Carlos Apache Tribe that portion of the system on their reservation.

Finally, the bill calls for a feasibility study to be performed on repairing the power generation facilities at Coolidge Dam.

The fundamental motivation for this bill is the desire of the Gila River Indian Community and the San Carlos Apache Tribe to establish their own utility authorities. Without the two tribes to serve, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has no reason to be in the business of providing electrical service to anyone else.

Generally speaking, the current situation is one in which the project's electric power system has come to principally serve the needs of "secondary and non-project" beneficiaries, or, non-Indians. This bill will provide a method for the BIA to disengage itself from the responsibility of administering, operating, maintaining, and requesting Federal appropriations for the project.

In addition to providing certainty and reliability to electrical service throughout central Arizona, this bill will accomplish some other important goals. It will settle debt obligations of the two main clients of the San Carlos project: the San Carlos Irrigation and Drainage District and the Gila River Indian Community. The money received from these debt settlements will go to establish an environmental protection account. This account will go to solve any problems uncovered associated with the disposal of transformers or equipment which contain hazardous materials.

The existence of these hazardous materials is not confirmed, but the rumors come from reliable sources. The sponsors of this legislation believe it is important to investigate and solve problems if and where they exist. Five years after enactment of this act, any funds remaining in the environmental protection account will revert to the General Treasury.

I want to also add a word about the employees of the San Carlos Irrigation project. Currently, 65 people are employed at SCIP whose jobs are related to the power system. Many of these may be affected by the disposition of this legislation. Let me add a personal word to these people. This legislation is not intended to reflect on their work. Clearly, the Federal Government is not able to dedicate sufficient resources to manage a project that has grown in a way that could never have been foreseen.

I truly regret any hardship that this divestiture may have on those dedicated individuals involved in operation of the project, and I would assure them that we will see that these employees are treated fairly and equitably. This divestiture will create opportunities for many to work in an environment where their efforts will not only be vital to the quality of service, but can be appreciated and rewarded.

We have included language in this legislation to provide a greater variety of post-divestiture employment opportunities to these Federal employees.

This process has been going on for over 5 years. During that time, the uncertainty associated with divestiture has only added to the problems that existed when I was moved to advocate divestiture. It is time to eliminate that uncertainty—it's time to provide reliability and opportunity to the people in Gila, Pinal, and Pima Counties. This legislation is a comprehensive and thoughtful approach to the issue. With Chairman UDALL's support, I look forward to early hearings on this bill and to quick passage in the House.

SETTING THE RECORD STRAIGHT

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, our political system enshrines freedom of expression as the best means of discovering the truth and achieving democratic self-government. Therefore, it is painful to see that freedom used to spread baseless lies and deceive public opinion. A case in point is the article, "The Prince Metternichs of Congress," authored by David Brock and published in the American Spectator of February 1990. As Dan Matthews, editor of Africa Insider, recently observed, "Brock's pitch is cleverly done, but smacks of the ugly, rock-bottom smear campaign stuff expected on some United States-Africa policy issues during this congressional election year." (Africa Insider, January 31, 1990, p. 3.)

Particularly outrageous is the personal attack on Steve Weissman, staff director of the House Subcommittee on Africa, for his role in congressional criticism of repression and corruption in Zaire. Brock's blend of false facts and falsely attributed motivations, published without any attempt to contact Mr. Weissman, has in turn been diffused to Members of Congress and others by Zaire's lobbyist, van Kloberg and Associates.

In order to set the record straight so that my colleagues and others can see this effort at character assassination for what it is, I am entering into the RECORD Mr. Weissman's response to Mr. Brock's article.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, January 22, 1990.

R. EMMETT TYRELL, Jr.,
Editor-in-Chief, The American Spectator, Arlington, VA.

DEAR MR. TYRELL: Congressional policy towards Zaire is a legitimate and important issue, worthy of informed public debate. However, David Brock's article, in your February issue, contains a number of inaccurate statements about my personal experiences and motives that amount to character assassination.

Contrary to Mr. Brock's reporting, I was not a Peace Corps Volunteer in Zaire during the 1960's. Nor did I publicly criticize the Mobutu Government resulting in my getting thrown out of the country. And therefore, I haven't "harbored a grudge ever since" contributing to a "zeal" to oppose Mobutu.

The truth of the matter is that I was engaged by the autonomous, Protestant-supported Université Libre du Congo in Kisangani as an Associate Professor of Political Science during 1969-1971. My salary was paid by the Congo (now Zaire) Government. During an episode of peaceful student protest against internal unversity policies, which resulted in the expulsion of the entire sophomore class and the temporary arrest of several hundred students, I and other faculty perceived to be privately sympathetic to the students were forced to leave the University and go to the capital city of Kinshasa. There both President Mobutu and his Minister of the Interior were helpful to me and my family. We subsequently left the country voluntarily but continued to be paid by the Government. Well before this incident I had completed my doctoral dissertation at the University of Chicago on "American Foreign Policy Towards the Congo 1960-1964". That work, subsequently revised and published by Cornell University Press in 1974, contained a scholarly critique of the United States' association with the overthrow of the elected Lumumba Government and the rise of the Mobutu regime.

Mr. Brock's article contains other inaccuracies on Zaire as well (e.g., his contention that Subcommittee on Africa Chairman Howard Wolpe refuses to talk to Mobutu. In fact, Wolpe has done so several times, most recently at a Foreign Affairs Committee coffee he hosted for Mobutu last summer).

But what is most shocking to me is that you and your publisher, Ronald E. Burr, would publish material defaming me without even requiring that the author interview me to obtain my reaction to these allegations.

Sincerely,

STEVE WEISSMAN,
Staff Director.

PUERTO RICO GOVERNOR CRITICIZES STATEHOOD MOVE

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, hearings will begin this Friday, March 2, before the House Subcommittee on Insular and International Affairs on legislation designed to hold a congressionally sanctioned political status plebiscite in Puerto Rico next year. The choices will be between statehood, independence, and an enhancement of the existing commonwealth status, which I favor.

As you know, similar legislation was marked up last August by the committee of jurisdiction in the other body, the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. The legislation in both bodies is complex and far reaching, and I hope we, in the House, can act expeditiously in what is shaping up as a rather short legislative year.

Having said all that, Mr. Speaker, I now commend to the attention of my colleagues a succinct and perceptive article by the Governor of Puerto Rico, the Honorable Rafael Hernandez Colon, which appeared on the op-ed page of the New York Times of February 26, 1990. In this article, Gov. Hernandez Colon explains well why commonwealth status, more than statehood, is in the best interest of both Puerto Rico and the United States.

Our economic and cultural circumstances in Puerto Rico are different, Mr. Speaker. We have great respect for the institution of statehood, but, as Gov. Hernandez Colon explains, it is commonwealth that best addresses the unusual realities of Puerto Rico.

Thus, I urge my colleagues to carefully study the issues raised by the Governor of Puerto Rico in the following article:

STATEHOOD FOR PUERTO RICANS

(By Rafael Hernandez Colon)

SAN JUAN, P.R.—Next year, the people of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico may have a chance to vote themselves into the Union as America's 51st state. I am firmly convinced that statehood is not in the best interest of Puerto Rico or the United States. I believe that the present commonwealth relationship should be continued and enhanced.

But others, including President Bush, want statehood for Puerto Rico. They have endorsed a bill, now before Congress, that contains three options: commonwealth, statehood or independence. Puerto Ricans would vote on these options in 1991; as soon as 51 percent of the voters made their choice, their decision would be implemented automatically.

But the bill as it now stands does not strike a fair balance among the three options. For example, under statehood, the Federal safety net—food stamps, Medicaid, Social Security and welfare benefits—would be extended to all Puerto Ricans. Yet, under the commonwealth option identical protections would be denied to the same U.S. citizens.

The present bill does not create an even playing field for free determination. To be fair, the bill should make clear that the sovereignty of the commonwealth government would be unequivocal. It should also make clear that such self-government measures as negotiating air routes, setting shipping rates, etc., would be granted.

As little as 5 percent of the population of Puerto Rico has expressed a preference for independence. But if Puerto Ricans were to vote for statehood, there would be many adverse consequences.

Under statehood, our economic development could not continue. Why? Because under the existing arrangement with the U.S., no Federal taxes are levied on the island. This has enabled Puerto Rico to undertake a highly successful economic development program, which has raised its per capita income from $342 in 1950 to $5,574 in 1989. Still, that is less than half of that of Mississippi, the poorest state. Our unemployment rate is now about 14 percent.

Our economic growth is sustained mainly by investments in manufacturing, which accounts for 40 percent of our gross domestic product. Such investment has been promoted since the 1950's through tax incentives offered to industry under commonwealth arrangements. It is the only proven policy to reduce the gap with the mainland in jobs and income.

Our industrial development program could not exist under statehood. The U.S. Constitution demands that Federal taxes throughout the nation must be uniform, thus making our Federal-tax incentive impossible. Taxes in Puerto Rico, except for exempted industries, are already higher than the combined Federal, state and local taxes of most states. Federal taxes on top of these would sink our developing economy into stagnation.

Puerto Rico would be the first state to come into the Union as a dependent of the Federal Treasury. After our transition to statehood, our economy almost certainly would decline. The Federal Government would have to spend $2 billion to $3 billion annually in excess of revenue generated in Federal taxes paid by Puerto Ricans to provide the safety net necessary to make up for a devastated economy.

Another set of problems with statehood are cultural and linguistic. Puerto Rico's language is Spanish; 60 percent of the people do not speak English at all. If Puerto Rico became a state bilingualism would in effect, become official U.S. policy.

Culturally, making Puerto Rico a state is the same as making Costa Rica, Honduras or the Dominican Republic a state. Puerto Ricans, including those advocating statehood, consider themselves a people with a strong national identity. A recent poll showed that 91 percent of the people think of themselves as Puerto Ricans first and Americans second.

The U.S. was founded on the premise of e pluribus unum—from many, one. Advocates of statehood would change that into e pluribus duo to accommodate, as a state, a nationality living on its own territory—something quite different from an ethnic minority scattered on the mainland. So far, this potentially emotional issue has merited no debate in the Congress. It deserves serious attention.

The Congress thus faces some tough political, economic, fiscal and cultural decisions in order to go ahead with the referendum bill. The task calls for fairness and statecraft of the highest order.

Otherwise, the people of Puerto Rico might choose to become the 51st state simply because this prospect offers some quick revenues through the Federal system. Yet statehood would destroy our economic achievements and the possibilities of commonwealth—a noble experiment in flexible political relationship for people with different cultures.

HONORING RALPH AND LAURA KOSTANT

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Ralph and Laura Kostant. They are being honored by the Shaarey Zedek Congregation for their dedication to the synagogue and the community at large.

The Kostants have been members of Shaarey Zedek for 11 years. After graduating from Cornell University, she received a master's degree in romance languages from Ohio State University and spent 18 months in Colombia on an Organization of American States grant. Ralph received his bachelor's degree from Stanford University and his law degree from Arizona State University where he graduated magna cum laude.

After their marriage in 1976, Ralph and Laura volunteered in Israeli development towns, tutoring disadvantaged children.

Since that time, Ralph and Laura have become active and involved members of the community putting their knowledge and experience to good use. Ralph is a board member of Shaarey Zedek and serves as the congregation's parliamentarian. In addition he is on the board of Emek Hebrew Academy and is a regional vice president of the American Jewish Committee.

Laura is a past president of the Carmiel Chapter of Emunah Women and is also an Emek board member.

Laura and Ralph are the proud parents of Sara, Esther and twins, Elise and Nathan.

Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure to ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Laura and Ralph Kostant, community leaders and role models for all.

HONORING CUBAN POLITICAL PRISONERS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the thousands of brave men and women who suffered as political prisoners in the jails of Fidel Castro's Cuba.

We just recently celebrated the anniversary of Cuba's independence, February 24, when the independence war began which made Cuba a free and independent country.

So it is fitting that we should pay homage on this occasion to honor these political prisoners who risked their lives for the cause of freedom, just as the Cubans in 1895 did.

It is that same fighting spirit, in favor of freedom and democracy, which carried these brave men and women forward in the last century, just as in this century.

The Cuban people fight today to reestablish freedom of speech and expression, freedom to worship God, freedom from want and fear.

However, there are still many political prisoners in Cuban jails and they are deprived of their basic human rights. These men and women are being kept in jail after having completed their sentences and some are being held in solitary confinement.

This terrible plight continues for women political prisoners who are especially subject to cruel and inhuman treatment.

It is proper, therefore, to honor brave women political prisoners who have survived the horrors of Cuban jails. It is fitting that we praise them for their solidarity and their preservation of the human spirit.

There are hundreds of surviving women political prisoners living in the Miami area and beyond and I offer a strong "Thank you" to them for their brave sacrifices in favor of freedom and democracy.

LIFECARE LONG-TERM CARE ACT (H.R. 4093)

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, on February 22, I along with Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR, introduced the Lifecare Long-Term Care Protection Act (H.R. 4093). This bill is the companion to the bill S. 2163 introduced by Senator EDWARD KENNEDY last Thursday.

As the bipartisan Commission on Comprehensive Health Care makes its recommendations and we move more heavily into the debate over health and long-term care reform, I would hope this bill contributes to a meaningful debate resulting in comprehensive health and long-term care reform. I would like to take this opportunity to provide the Members with a detailed description of this long-term care initiative.

Though this is the companion bill to the bill by Senator KENNEDY, the House bill has several unique features. First, it ultimately extends the basic nursing home coverage—6 months or under—and home care coverage to persons of all ages as of the fourth year after enactment. (See sections 2112 and 2122.) Second, coinsurance costs for the Federal Long-Term Care Insurance Program are subsidized for persons with incomes under 200 percent of poverty. (See section 2136.) Both bills subsidize the premium. Third, the bill directs the Secretary of DHHS to make the Federal long-term care insurance open to persons of any age. (See section 2137.) Persons aged 45 to 65 are eligible in both bills.

THE LIFECARE LONG-TERM CARE PROTECTION ACT

LEGISLATIVE SUMMARY

The Lifecare Long-Term Care Protection Act was introduced in the Senate as S. 2163 by Senator Edward M. Kennedy and in the House of Representatives as H.R. 4093 by Edward R. Roybal and Mary Rose Oakar on February 22, 1990. This act is designed to provide long term protection for both younger and older Americans whether their needs be for nursing care or for home and community-based care.

Section 2. Lifecare Long-Term Care Protection Program

Part A—General Provisions

Sec. 2101. Definitions are provided for activities of daily living, long term care providers, care plans, case management services and team, comprehensive needs assessment, and covered services.

Sec. 2102. Long term care agencies are defined including Long-Term Care Screening Agencies (screening for overall eligibility) and the Long-Term Care Case Management Agency (case management for eligible beneficiaries).

Sec. 2103. As a condition of their residents being eligible for this program States are required to contribute funds equal to the amount spent on long term care under current Federal-State entitlement programs.

Part B—Coverage of Home and Community-Based Care Services

Sec. 2111. Benefits covered must be determined as necessary by a Case Management Agency, be described in the care plan, be eligible services and be consistent with the need for care of the individual.

Sec. 2112. Eligible individuals include Medicare beneficiaries (a) who are completely dependent in at least one age-appropriate activity of daily living or unable to perform two or more age-appropriate activities of daily living without human assistance or supervision, or (b) cognitively impaired and requiring substantial supervision. They also include persons under age 19 unable to perform one or more age-appropriate activities of daily living or require a medical device to avert death or major loss of bodily functional capacity. Persons would also be eligible if (a) they would be eligible for Medicare except for the required 24-month waiting period, (b) if they are completely dependent in at least one age-appropriate activity of daily living or unable to perform two or more age-appropriate activities of daily living without human assistance or supervisions and (c) if their life expectancy is 12 months or less. As of January 1 of the fourth year after enactment, persons of all ages are covered subject only to the ADL and cognitive impairment requirements.

Sec. 2113. Respite care is covered and can include nursing home or home and community-based services for short periods of time not to exceed 30 days or 720 hours during a calendar year.

Sec. 2114. Qualified home and community-based service providers include a home care agency certified by the State, a home health agency certified by the Secretary of HHS, an adult day health care center certified by the State other certified or licensed providers.

Sec. 2115. Payment for services is provided to the Case Management Agencies by the Secretary based on the number and type of eligible individuals. The Case Management Agencies pay the services providers and the service providers are required to accept those amounts as payment in full, except for any coinsurance.

For the first three years after enactment, payments are limited to a maximum of 65 percent of the cost of nursing home care under Medicare in that geographic area. After that, payments are limited to nursing home care less the cost of room and board and are adjusted to match the severity of need for services. In the case of children, the maximum amount is tied to 100 percent of the cost of institutional care under Medicaid.

Beneficiary coinsurance is set at the lesser of 10 percent of service costs or 5 percent of the beneficiary's Social Security check.

Sec. 2116. The Secretary is required to establish a Home and Community-Based Advisory Council with 60 days of enactment.

Sec. 2117. States are required to establish Quality Assurance Boards and Community Advisory Boards.

Sec. 2118. Under quality assurance, the Secretary is required to establish a consumers' bill of rights, set up home and community-based provider quality assurance requirements (compliance with bill of rights, handle grievances, adequate training). The Secretary is required to establish quality assurance requirements for Case Management Agencies. Also, standard and extended survey requirements will apply to home health agencies and home care agencies.

Sec. 2119. States are required to certify provider agencies and individual providers.

Sec. 2120. Certified providers are required to provide services and accept reimbursement as payment in full, subject to any coinsurance.

Part C—Coverage of First 6 Months of Nursing Home Care

Sec. 2121. For a spell of illness, six months of nursing home coverage is provided which can include nursing care, room and board, physical/occupational/speech therapy, medical social services, and such other health services necessary to the health of the patient and generally provided by a nursing home facility. Additional coverage may be provided if (a) there is a different diagnosis or a substantial worsening of the patient's condition, and (b) six months have elapsed since the last stay.

Sec. 2122. Eligible individuals include Medicare beneficiaries (a) who are completely dependent in at least one age-appropriate activity of daily living or unable to perform two or more age-appropriate activities of daily living without human assistance or supervision, or (b) cognitively impaired and requiring substantial supervision. They also include persons under age 19 unable to perform one or more age-appropriate activities of daily living or require a medical device to avert death or major loss of bodily functional capacity. As of January 1 of the fourth year after enactment, persons of all ages are covered subject only to the ADL and cognitive impairment requirements.

Sec. 2123. Reimbursement is the amount necessary, taking into account the average cost of providing care. The Secretary is required to establish a prospective payment system based on resource utilization for different types of patients.

Sec. 2124. Certified nursing homes are required to accept reimbursement as payment in full.

Sec. 2125. This program will be a secondary payer to any other Federally administered entitlement program, not including Medicaid.

Part D—Insurance Coverage for Nursing Home Care That Exceeds 6 Months

Sec. 2131. The Secretary is required to establish a voluntary insurance program for individuals 45 and over to cover nursing home stays that exceed six months.

Sec. 2132. Eligibility for benefits is subject to a determination by a Screening Agency. Persons have the option to purchase this coverage within six months of their 45th and 65th birthdays. In the first two years after enactment, certain limitations apply to people already in nursing homes or hospitals.

Sec. 2133. Premium rates are set separately for those purchasing at age 45 and age 65. The Secretary is to establish rates that cover 45 percent of the estimated cost of nursing home stays exceeding six months.

For poorer persons, a 100% subsidy of the premium is provided for those under 100 percent of poverty, a 75% subsidy is provided for those between 100 and 150 percent of poverty, and a 50% subsidy is provided for those between 150 and 200 percent of poverty.

Sec. 2134. Benefits are similar to those for stays under six months, except the duration is unlimited subject to continued certified need.

Sec. 2135. Nursing homes are qualified providers if they are certified by State and meet Federal requirements and standards.

Sec. 2136. Reimbursement, on a monthly basis, is 65 percent of the amount the Secretary determines to be reasonable and appropriate. The Secretary is required to establish a prospective payment system based on resource utilization for different types of patients. Room and board costs are to be paid by the patient directly to the nursing home and are to be 35 percent of the average per diem rate.

For poorer persons, 100% of coinsurance costs is paid for those under 100 percent of poverty, 75% is paid for those between 100 and 150 percent of poverty, and 50% is paid for those between 150 and 200 percent of poverty.

Sec. 2137. The Secretary is authorized and required to modify the Federal Long-Term Care Insurance Program to allow persons other than those aged 45 or 65 to purchase this insurance. The federal subsidy for these persons can be no higher than the subsidy provided to persons purchasing at age 45 to 65. This takes effect on or after January 1 of the fifth year after enactment.

Part E—Training and Research

Sec. 2141. Grants to universities are authorized for training home care providers in amounts of $15 million for FY 1991, $20 million for FY 1992 and $25 million for FY 1993.

Sec. 2142. Grants to States are authorized for training home health aides in the amounts of $10 million for FY 1991 and 1992 and $25 million for FY 1993.

Sec. 2143. Grants to university schools of nursing are authorized for developing model consumer training programs in the amounts of $5 million for FY 1991, $10 million for FY 1992 and $15 million for FY 1993.

Sec. 2144. At least six centers for long-term care planning and technical assistance are authorized with funding levels of $10 million for FY 1992, $15 million for FY 1993 and 1994.

Part F—Demonstration Projects

Sec. 2151. The Secretary is required to establish 5-10 demonstration projects on different models of providing and reimbursing long term care for seriously mentally ill individuals and their family caregivers. Funding is authorized from the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund for FY 1991, 1992 and 1993 up to $10 million annually for the demonstration projects and $1 million to carry out the evaluation.

Sec. 2152. Secretary is required to establish demonstration projects on different models of providing and reimbursing long term home care for people with disabilities and needing long term care but who are not covered under the previous sections. Funding is authorized from the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund for FY 1991, 1992 and 1993 up to $10 million annually for demonstation projects and $1 million to carry out the evaluation.

Sec. 2153. General demonstration authority.

Section 3. Effective Date

Home and community-based care is effective one year after the date of enactment.

Nursing home coverage for stays under six months is effective on or after January 1 of the third year after enactment.

Nursing home coverage under the Federal Long-Term Care Insurance Program is effective on or after the third year after enactment.

Training and research programs begin on or after January 1, 1991.

INTRODUCTION OF THE FAIR CREDIT AMENDMENTS OF 1990

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce the Fair Credit Reporting Amendments of 1990.

This legislation is a comprehensive reform package for the Federal law that regulates the credit reporting industry, the Fair Credit Reporting Act of 1970 [FCRA]. That law has accomplished a great deal for consumers, providing them for the first time the right to obtain copies of their credit files and to dispute and correct inaccurate information.

However, in the 20 years since enactment of the FCRA and the 12 since the last amendment, technology has changed the face of the credit reporting industry. Where once records were maintained in actual paper files and banks and other creditors employed credit officers who reviewed that information, the entire process is now highly automated. Bank computers access credit bureau computers and then make credit decisions based on specified criteria and send out the appropriate form letter. Often, no human being intervenes in the credit-granting process at all. Moreover, information in a consumer's credit file has become more important to credit decisions as the relationship between the bank and the consumer has become less exclusive and personal.

Necessarily, while greater automation and dependence upon credit bureau information makes the credit-granting process more efficient and more widely available, it also makes the process more arbitrary and the impact of inaccurate information more devastating. In addition, the uses of credit file information have expanded dramatically. Some credit bureaus now use that data to prepare mailing lists for direct mail marketing of products and services completely unrelated to credit.

Together, these changes have altered the balance which was struck in the original FCRA between the right to privacy and accuracy of consumers and the need for business to have access to credit information in a timely manner. These changes have made alterations to the FCRA to provide consumers with greater and more effective protections and—even more fundamentally—with greater knowledge of how the credit reporting system works imperative.

This bill would realign that balance by requiring that credit file information be used only for credit purposes and only with the consumer's consent and by giving consumers a number of important new tools:

Consumers would be able to obtain, free of charge at least once per year, a copy of their credit file.

Consumers would automatically receive a copy of their credit file whenever they are denied credit.

Credit bureaus would be required to give consumers a "Credit Report Bill of Rights," listing all of their rights and options under the FCRA, which would include who to contact to dispute inaccurate information and which agency enforces violations of the FCRA.

Investigations of disputed information by a credit bureau would be required to follow established, published guidelines, to take into account evidence provided by the consumer, and to be completed within 30 days.

Creditors which provide disputed information, as well as the credit bureau which transmitted that information in a credit report, would be required to reinvestigate the disputed data and would have a duty and legal responsibility to ensure maximum possible accuracy of the information they provide.

The actual problems faced by consumers range from simple incorrect data, to mistaken identities in which a consumer is tagged with the bad credit rating of some other person, to outright fraud in which the consumer's credit file contains fraudulently generated bad debts. Consumers also face incredible and disturbing obstacles in correcting these errors. Some examples are illustrative of the problems and difficulties consumers constantly face in dealing with the credit reporting system:

A New York state woman, after months of fighting unreturned phone calls and unfulfilled promises, managed to get one credit bureau to correct inaccurate information in her credit file. She then discovered that two other major bureaus and two local bureaus also had the same inaccurate information and has had to go through the same battles with each separately. One of the major bureaus, CBI, has yet even to respond three months later and she only gets a computer answering machine in response to repeated calls. She still has no idea which of the many smaller credit bureaus may hold the same incorrect information and how to contact them. She also faces a $10-$15 charge with each bureau just to gain a copy of her report to see if it contains the inaccurate information.

Eight credit cards were obtained fraudulently under a California man's name which severely impacted his credit record and ended his employment with a major bureau. After extensive effort including investigations by the Secret Service and the California Attorney General's office, that record was cleared and he assumed his credit rating was secure. Later he was denied credit based on reports from other bureaus which he is still contesting three and one-half years after initially discovering the fraudulent accounts.

A New York man with a name similar to that of his father, but with a different social security number and birth date, has been tagged with the credit problems of his father. The son has been trying unsuccessfully for two years to get the error corrected.

A man living in Hawaii has been tagged with the credit problems of a California man with the same name after Chase Manhattan used the same credit card number for both people. The bureau corrected the report after ten months but soon thereafter Chase again reported the incorrect information, damaging the man's credit record, which they have not yet corrected three and one-half years after the man first discovered the error.

Mr. Speaker, this bill would help those consumers and, as a result, it enjoys the support of many consumer groups, including the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, the Consumers Union, and the BankCard Holders of America.

I look forward to working with Chairman LEHMAN of the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage and the members of that subcommittee to develop final legislation that addresses these important issues and provides consumers with the privacy and protections they need and deserve.

THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE IS AT THE CORE OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, as Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union, and South Africa take the first steps toward freedom, we Americans should be reaffirming the principles of law that have made us a beacon for the world. At such a time, it is ironic that there are those who suggest that we surrender some of our freedoms, in order to fight the drug wars.

One cornerstone of our democracy is the right under the fourth amendment to be free from unreasonable searches. That freedom is enforced by the exclusionary rule, which imposes a consequence on Government authorities who violate the fourth amendment. The rule is simple: Evidence seized in violation of the fourth amendment cannot be used in American courts.

Sadly, the Supreme Court in recent years has chipped away at the exclusionary rule and in the process has undermined our fourth amendment rights. But in a decision last month, the Court rejected, by a slim majority, a proposal to erode the rule yet further. I hope that this case reflects a renewed commitment to the principles in the fourth amendment. Columnist Nat Hentoff has written about this important decision, and I ask that his article be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 24, 1990]

EXCLUDING TAINTED EVIDENCE

(Nat Hentoff)

The justices of the Supreme Court are routinely sorted out as being "conservative" or "liberal." A more useful and accurate way of characterizing them might be to distinguish between those most concerned with protecting individual liberties against the state and those who often balance those liberties in favor of the state's need to secure the common good—very much including the efficient functioning of the criminal justice system.

From time to time some of the justices will change sides on a particular case. But two—William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall—hardly move at all from their posts as protectors, in their view, of the individual liberties safeguarded by the Bill of Rights and the 14th Amendment.

In a radio interview three years ago, a journalist asked Brennan: "Why do you let some of those creeps go? They do such bad things, and on a technicality, you let them go."

Uncharacteristically, Brennan became angry: "You and the media ought to be ashamed of yourself to call the provisions and the guarantees of the Bill of Rights technicalities. They're not. We are what we are because we have those guarantees, and this court exists to see that they are faithfully enforced. These guarantees have to be sustained—even though the immediate result is to help out some very unpleasant person. They're there to protect all of us."

In recent years, Brennan—again uncharacteristically—seemed to have just about given up hope that the Supreme Court had any intention of faithfully enforcing one of those guarantees—the exclusionary rule.

That rule forbids the use in a trial of illegally obtained evidence by the state. For decades some justices have claimed that this is just a judge-made rule aimed at deterring the police from bending the law to get the goods on someone they know shouldn't be on the streets.

Other justices, including Brennan, are convinced that the exclusionary rule is at the very core of the Fourth Amendment, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. The amendment specifically defines "unreasonable" searches as those made without the authority of a warrant and without probable cause. Any evidence seized as a result of such unreasonable searches is therefore a violation of the Constitution.

There is also the matter of judicial integrity. A court that admits this tainted evidence becomes an accomplice of law-breaking police.

Over the years, a majority of the Supreme Court, however, has permitted exceptions to the exclusionary rule. If, for instance, a defendant testifies in contradiction to certain illegally obtained evidence by the police, prosecutors can use that evidence to impeach him. If he doesn't so testify the evidence is inadmissible.

As other exceptions were added, Brennan said six years ago, in a dissent, that he figured the court had finally eviscerated the Fourth Amendment. But that mood did not last, and this year, Brennan prevented the Fourth Amendment from becoming a museum piece. For the time being.

In James v. Illinois last month, Brennan wrote for a 5-to-4 majority in refusing to permit another exception to the exclusionary rule. This one would have permitted the use of illegally obtained evidence in order to impeach witnesses for the defense. And since there are many defense witnesses than there are defendants, this exception would be very broad indeed.

Fifteen-year-old Darryl James had been indicted for murder and attempted murder after making incriminating statements to police who had arrested him. The collar had been made, however, without a warrant and without probable cause. Accordingly, James's statements were suppressed.

James did not testify at his trial, but a friend offered testimony that conflicted with the statements by James that had been illegally obtained by the police.

The trial court then allowed what James had said when arrested to be used at the trial in order to impeach the testimony of his friend. James was convicted and sentenced to 30 years. The Illinois Supreme Court agreed that the exclusionary rule should be exempted to include defense witnesses in order to prevent a defendant from engaging in perjury "by proxy."

But the Brennan majority, in one of Brennan's most satisfying victories in recent years, reversed the Illinois Supreme Court, insisting that "So long as we are are committed to protecting the people from the disregard of their constitutional rights during the course of criminal investigations, inadmissibility of illegally obtained evidence must remain the rule, not the exception."

Justice Benjamin Cardozo once complained that criminals sometimes go free "because the constable has blundered." But years later, Justice Tom Clark answered: "If the criminal goes free . . . it is the law that sets him free. Nothing can destroy a government more quickly than its failure to observe its own laws."

THE NECESSITY OF REFORM OF THE SUGAR PROGRAM

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, since the early days of the Republic, the Federal Government has intervened in the sugar market—primarily to protect the domestic industry from the vagaries of the international market, but also to attempt to stabilize domestic prices. For most of our history, this intervention took the form of protective tariffs. In 1934, the Roosevelt administration, through authority granted under the Jones-Costigan Act, moved U.S. sugar policy away from tariffs to a system of domestic production and import quotas which governed access to the American market. Subsequently, Congress passed a series of sugar acts and agricultural acts that combined the quota allocation system with price supports for domestic sugar producers.

In 1974, Congress permitted the sugar act to expire, thereby ending 40 years of direct Federal management of the domestic sugar market. The international sugar regime also expired at that time. Market uncertainty and significant price volatility followed.

In addition to wide fluctuations in sugar prices, American producers began to confront two other challenges. One challenge eminated from the European Community [EC]. Under the sugar provisions of the EC's common agricultural policy, the Community, which had been a net importer of sugar in 1967, became a major exporter of sugar by the early 1980's. The second challenge arose from the emergence of corn sweetners as economically viable substitutes for cane and beet sugar in a number of finished products.

In an effort to regain control over prices and stabilize the agricultural sugar economy, a domestic price support program was reestablished by Congress in 1981. In an attempt to manage the program effectively, the Reagan administration exercised its authority to reimpose import quotas the following year. In the Food Security Act of 1985, Congress mandated a minimum nonrecourse loan rate of 18 cents per pound and required that the sugar program operate at no net cost to the Federal Government.

The effects of these policy decisions were almost predictable. In spite of an approximate 15-percent decline in the domestic consumption of sugar between 1981 and 1988, domestic cane and beet sugar production increased about 23 percent over the same period. This unprecedented increase in domestic production, which bore no relationship to demand, directly threatened traditional foreign suppliers to the American market.

During the brief relatively open market period of the late 1970's, the annual average level of sugar imports was 4.4 million short tons. With the reimposition of import quotas in order to maintain the integrity of the price support program, imports fell rapidly. As late as 1984, imports totaled roughly 3 million short tons. The following year, imports fell to 2 million short tons. In 1988, imports were originally limited to 758,000 short tons—a nearly 75 percent reduction over a 5-year period.

Drought conditions in the United States over the last 2 years have slightly eased these trends. The 1990 annualized import quota is currently 1.6 million short tons. However, given domestic consumption and production trends, absent further drought conditions or changes in the program, the recent improvement in foreign access to the U.S. market will be an aberration. The overall trend of escalating domestic production under a relatively high Government guaranteed price support program, declining consumption, and a contraction in market access to foreign suppliers will ultimately make the United States self-sufficient in sugar. At that juncture, which, in my view, is not far off into the future, the no net cost provision of the program will become untenable.

The trend in domestic production, relative to consumption, is worrying in and of itself. Domestic overproduction is a direct result of the incentives built into the current sugar program. However, it is clear that the administration of the program is also having a deleterious effect on traditional foreign suppliers to the American market in violation of our international obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT].

In September 1988, the Government of Australia challenged the tariff headnote authority of the United States to impose restrictive quotas on sugar imports. In May 1989, the three-member panel examining the Australian complaint found in favor of Australia. The panel concluded that the U.S. quota regime is inconsistent with article 11 of the GATT and could not be justified under the provisions of article 2 of the agreement. On June 22, 1989, the GATT Counsel, with the concurrence of the United States, adopted the panel report.

The United States has two basic options in order to settle the dispute with Australia. We can either terminate the offending import restrictions, or we can bring them into conformity with the GATT. Although the GATT does not contain provisions providing for a timetable in the dispute resolution process, delay could lead to either demands for compensation by Australia and, presumably, by other contracting parties who are similarily affected, or could lead to retaliation against American products. Delay in resolving the dispute with Australia is clearly not in our interest.

We are faced with two distinct, yet intertwined, problems. On the one hand, the integrity of the domestic price support program is clearly at risk given consumption and production trends. On the other hand, attempting to maintain the integrity of the program has led the United States down a road that places us squarely outside our international obligations to our trading partners. What are our options? Certainly, there is more than one option. I will concentrate on what I believe to be the preferable one.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have long been critical of the dynamics of the sugar program in stimulating overproduction and the negative effects on international trade that have resulted. I continue to believe that an adjustment in the nonrecourse loan rate for sugar is the key to solving these problems. H.R. 1055, the Sugar Supply Stabilization Act, which Representative DOWNEY and I introduced earlier in this Congress, contains two basic elements. The first is a reduction in the nonrecourse loan rate by 1.5 cents per pound over a 4-year period. The second is a recommended increase in imports of 500,000 short tons per year.

Philosophically, this is the proper direction for American policy. I recognize, however, that the adverse panel report adopted by the GATT in response to the Australian complaint renders H.R. 1055 an inappropriate response as a comprehensive solution to the problem. It is likely that H.R. 1055 would also be found to be inconsistent with the GATT. Although the numbers change, the sugar program would be administered in the same manner under H.R. 1055 as it is now. Although the Government of Australia has indicated it would be prepared to accept implementation of H.R. 105 as an interim measure, because it would ease import restrictions, all parties recognize that it would not be sufficient, in and of itself, to resolve the underlying issue. Therefore, Representative DOWNEY and I have developed a new proposal, based on H.R. 1055, that we believe is consistent with our GATT obligations.

This legislation, H.R. 4042, the Sugar Equity and Reform Act, would:

Continue the basic method of operation of the current sugar program;

Reduce the nonrecourse loan 5 percent per year over a 5-year period;

Reduce the gap between the market stabilization price [MSP] and the loan rate slightly by basing the MSP on the Hawaiian loan rate for cane sugar rather than on a national average (effectively calculating the MSP from the base from which it was originally intended) and by removing the incentive factor;

Establish a minimum import quota of 1 million metric tons (equivalent to approximately 1.1 million short tons) which would increase over a 5-year period to 2 million metric tons (equivalent to approximately 2.2 million short tons);

Retain all current quota allocations and duty preference on quota sugar; and Attain GATT legality through requiring the President to exercise his existing authority to establish a tariff rate quota for sugar.

Mr. Speaker, some have suggested that the sugar program be extended, in its present form, for at least a year pending the outcome of the negotiations in the Uruguay round of the GATT. Merely extending the present program would be an affront to the dispute resolution process in the GATT. We are certain to hear complaints about the trade distorting practices of the EC. I agree with my colleagues who suggest that the policies of the Community are a major factor in depressing world sugar prices over the long term. However, our immediate dispute is with Australia, not the Community. Failing to deal effectively with that could invite consequences that no one wants.

Others have suggested the possibility of marketing and/or production controls as a solution to the problem. Press reports of proposals circulating within some producer groups concern me greatly. Any proposal to adopt marketing and/or production controls, combined with some form of subsidized exports of sugar, would essentially be replicating the EC's program. If our goal in the Uruguay round is to reduce all trade distorting subsidies, particularly in agriculture, it would be a significant setback for the Americn position if we adopt changes in sugar policy that mimic the worst practices we are attempting to eliminate in Geneva.

In that vein, I was disappointed earlier this month when the administration released its proposals for the 1990 farm bill. In 1985, Congress enacted changes in most of the major commodity support programs. The trend in Federal support is downward in an effort to reduce outlays and reduce Federal incentives for overproduction. The administration has proposed some changes in the dairy program, alterations in the honey, wool, and mohair programs, and significant changes in the peanut program. The administration's package is silent on sugar.

I understand the preference of the administration to deal with sugar in the Uruguay round. I simply disagree with that approach. The round has not affected our efforts to open the Japanese and Korean markets to United States agricultural products, it did not affect renegotiation of the steel VRA agreement with Japan, and it did not hinder completion and implementation of the United States-Canadian Free Trade Agreement. In addition, the round also has not affected the administration as it continues to press for resolution of the case we argued successfully in the GATT against the EC on oilseeds.

The United States has proposed tariffication in the Uruguay round as the best road toward an international trading environment free of restrictive practices. Tariff rate quotas, which the GATT recognizes as legal, are the inevitable waystations along that road. The dispute with Australia offers the United States an opportunity to lead. We would not be unilaterally disarming, as critics of sugar reform like to call it. We would be strengthening the U.S. position in Geneva which can only work to the long-term benefit of American agriculture.

As I indicated earlier in my remarks, there are compelling reasons to move forward on reform of the sugar program. I recognize that H.R. 4042 is likely to be but one option on the table. It is not a panacea. I believe, however, that it offers the best hope to provide support for domestic producers as necessary and to bring the United States into compliance with its international obligations. I urge my colleagues to join Mr. DOWNEY and me in this effort.

COUNTRY MUSIC GRAMMY AWARDS

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, last week in Los Angeles, CA, the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences [NARIS] paid tribute to the top performers, songwriters and music industry personnel in the recording industry during the 32d annual Grammy Awards.

I would like to take this opportunity to salute the Grammy winners in various country music categories, many of whom live or work in my hometown, Nashville, TN.

During the past 60 years the country music business has grown from infancy to an industry which has annual sales of over $550 million. According to a recent Harris survey, country music is the best liked music in America, with over 60 percent of adult Americans stating that country music is their favorite music.

I am very proud to represent Music City U.S.A., the home of country music. I am equally proud to honor this year's Grammy Award winners in the different country music categories.

Last October my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate joined me in adopting House Joint Resolution 401, officially proclaiming October as Country Music Month. Today I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting these talented individuals.

Country vocal, male: Lyle Lovett.

Country vocal, female: K.D. Lang.

Country vocal, duo or group: the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band.

Country instrumental, Amazing Grace, by Randy Scaggs.

Country song, After All This Time, by Rodney Crowell.

Bluegrass recording, the Valley Road, by Bruce Hornsby, and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band.

There are two other awards which went to country music artists and writers which should be given special recognition.

Larry Henley and Jeff Silbar won the prestigious Record of the Year Award for Wind Beneath My Wings. What made this honor particularly noteworthy was the fact it is given for the best pop song of the year.

Larry and Jeff cowrote the song in Nashville in 1980 while working as songwriters for House of Gold. Larry is still living in Nashville and writing more great songs, while Jeff has moved to Los Angeles.

The song has been recorded by several artists and won the Record of the Year Grammy for the version recorded by Bette Midler. The fact that the song achieved such recognition nearly a decade after it was authored simply proves that great music lives on forever.

Perhaps the most notable achievement of the 32d annual Grammy Awards was the award won by a father and his son over 37 years after the father passed away.

Hank Williams and Hank Williams, Jr., were honored for country vocal collaboration for the song "There's a Tear in my Beer."

In my opinion these two country music legends have achieved more success in the music industry, and have had the most important impact on music history, of any father and son in the history of recorded music.

Hank Williams, Sr. is responsible for writing some of the most touching and memorable songs ever recorded. He was a pioneer and perhaps the first true country music superstar in history. It is estimated that his songs have sold over 100 million records.

His son, Hank Williams, Jr., has sold more than 50 million records worldwide. He has won numerous awards including being honored five times as the Country Music Association and Academy of Country Music's "Entertainer of the Year." And Hank Williams, Jr., like his father, has been a pioneer and trailblazer in the country music industry.

The Grammy Award they shared last week was the first Grammy ever awarded to Hank Williams, Sr., or Hank Williams, Jr. They both certainly deserved this recognition.

I also want to salute Nancy Shapiro, executive director of NARIS in Nashville, and Lisa Neideffer, her executive assistant, for the outstanding job they do year after year in helping to coordinate Grammy-related events in Nashville. They should also be recognized for their time and effort on behalf of civic and charitable causes in the Nashville area undertaken on behalf of NARIS.

I have said before that "there is nothing more American than apple pie, our Flag and country music." Today I am proud to represent the community that is the home of country music, and I consider it my distinct privilege to pay tribute to this group of talented musicians and songwriters.

SALUTE TO LUIS LAINER

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise today to salute a truly outstanding member of our community and an individual I am proud to call my friend—Luis Lainer. He is being honored by Bet Tzedek Legal Services for his years of dedicated service—as a founder, executive director, president and board member of one of our city's premiere nonprofit organizations.

After graduating from Yale Law School, Luis served as a VISTA volunteer, bringing legal services and resources to the Puerto Rican community. Inspired by that experience, Luis came to California and, after a brief stint in private practice, joined a group of other young activists determined to ensure access to the law for all regardless of ability to pay.

In 1973 they established Bet Tzedek Legal Services on the premise that clients should be entitled to the highest standards of service provided to paying clients in private practice. Luis and his associates wanted clients to develop a sense of empowerment, as they became participants in solving their own problems in a caring and supportive environment.

Luis became Bet Tzedek's first executive director—building the organization from scratch. He is currently completing a 4-year term as president of Bet Tzedek and he can reflect with pride on an organization that has helped thousands of clients and has won several landmark cases on behalf of some of the most defenseless and disadvantaged members of our society.

In addition to Bet Tzedek, Luis is involved in a wide range of community activities. He is a governor of the Jewish Federation Council, regional chair of the New Israel Fund, a Los Angeles board member of Haifa University and a past chair of the Chicano-Jewish Dialogue of the Jewish Federation Council.

Luis is married to lee and they have three children—Jesse, Anne, and Zachary.

Mr. Speaker, It is my distinct honor to ask my colleagues to join with me in saluting Luis Lainer—visionary, leader, and role model for all.

VIETNAM VETERANS EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer a bill which executes promises to Vietnam veterans before they risked their lives for democracy. I would like to invite my esteemed colleagues to join me as a cosponsor of H.R. 3889, which ensures that all veterans eligible to receive educational assistance under the Veterans' Educational Assistance Program [VEAP] have 10 years after discharge or release from active duty in which to use their educational benefits. It also provides 1 day of additional assistance for every day a veteran served in combat in Vietnam.

Vietnam-era veterans entered the military with the understanding that the educational benefits granted under the VEAP would be available upon their discharge. Because the December 31, 1989, termination date has passed, these educational benefits are no longer available to those who chose to prolong their service in the U.S. Armed Forces. Educational assistance was promised to these citizens as they marched off to sacrifice their lives for democratic justice. This promise should not be broken. Educational aid should be provided to those who defended our country in combat.

According to the national Vietnam veterans readjustment study conducted by the Research Triangle Institute, many Vietnam veterans who participated in combat in Vietnam are more susceptible to encounter difficulties in educational and occupational ajustment. One of the findings of the study determined that combat veterans suffered greater complications adapting to civilian life. The study subsequently demonstrated that veterans who participated in combat were less educated than those veterans who did not. Their need for educational assistance is critical.

We assured these brave citizens of our support before they joined our Armed Forces. To turn our backs on them at this crucial stage is unforgivable. We owe them the educational assistance that was promised and deserved. Vietnam veterans deserve action, not rhetoric.

DETECTIVE BEN ARMSTRONG DALLAS POLICE OFFICER FOR THE MONTH OF JANUARY

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, our local law enforcement agencies and their dedicated employees are our first line of defense against crime. It is always a great pleasure for me, as a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary and its Criminal Justice Subcommittee, as well as a Dallas resident, to join in paying tribute to some of our best local law enforcement officers.

Dallas Police Detective Ben Armstrong has been recognized as January Officer of the Month, and I take pride in calling his achievements, described in the Dallas Police News, to the attention of my colleagues and fellow citizens:

OFFICER OF THE MONTH ARMSTRONG RECEIVES JANUARY HONOR

Det. Ben Armstrong of the Identification Division has been selected as the January Officer of the Month by the Dallas Community Police Awards Committee. He will be honored during a luncheon hosted by the Dallas Market Center Rotary Club.

A 15-year veteran, he started his law enforcement career as a police officer with the Henrico County Police in Virginia. During his DPD career, Det. Armstrong has received 25 commendations including two for identifying, through latent fingerprints, suspects wanted for two double murder offenses of elderly couples.

He is also the recipient of a Certificate of Merit, 10-Year Safe Driving Award and five Marksmanship Awards.

For the past 10 years, Det. Armstrong has kept abreast of automated fingerprint identification (AFIS) technology. When AFIS funding was approved in 1987, Det. Armstrong was selected as a member of the evaluation team.

As the first member selected for the new AFIS Unit, he assisted in the implementation of the system and made sure performance criteria was met. Because of his hard work, the AFIS Unit identified more than 100 suspects in cases ranging from capital murder to burglary of a motor vehicle during its first two months of operation.

MERGER MANIA

HON. MICHAEL DeWINE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, James Brock, professor of economics at my alma mater, Miami University, and Prof. Walter Adams have examined the effect larger scale mergers have had on our national economy. Their concise analysis recently appeared in the Cincinnati Enquirer. The article is a summary of their book, "Dangerous pursuits: Mergers and Acquisitions in the Age of Wall Street." In their article, Professors Brock and Adams detail the extent of "Merger Mania" in the past decade and its negative effects on our economy. I urge all of my colleagues to read this thought-provoking analysis of the economic inefficiencies created by the explosion of leveraged acquisitions:

MERGER MANIA ISN'T HELPING U.S. ECONOMY

(By James Brock and Walter Adams)

In the annals of American business history, the 1980s will go down as the decade of the deal—a trillion-dollar corporate feeding frenzy that produced phenomenal profits for a few but economic stagnation for the country.

Acquisitions exploded from 1,565 corporate deals in 1980 worth $33 billion, to 3,487 deals valued at $227 billion in 1988—a spectacular 600 percent jump. In all, some 26,000 corporate deals have been consummated since 1980, totaling more than $1 trillion in value.

But this deal-mania isn't creating new plants or new jobs, instead, it amounts to rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic.

This is because for a nation, as for individuals, there is no such thing as a free lunch. A decade of managerial energy devoted to concocting—or fighting off—corporate deals is a decade during which energy has been diverted from the critically important task of investing in new plants, new products, new state-of-art manufacturing techniques and new jobs. By the same token, the hundreds of millions of dollars absorbed in deals by legal fees and bankers' commissions have not been plowed directly into the nation's industrial base.

It is especially sobering that in 1986, corporate America spent more on mergers and acquistions—$204 billion—than it did on research and development—$55 billion—and net new plant investment—$81 billion combined. This hardly bodes well for a nation struggling to reindustrialize in the face of massive foreign trade deficits.

Further, a raft of studies show that typical merger is followed by deteriorating profit performance, and losses—not gains—in operating efficiency.

The American steel industry poignantly illustrates the futility of the merger game. The industry giants are the product of eight decades of mergers and acquisitions, beginning with the formation of the U.S. Steel Corporation in 1901 as a consolidation of hundreds of formerly independent plants.

But, alas, America's steel giants are anything but models of economic efficiency. They have lost jobs and market share, not only to foreign producers, but to small, hyper-advanced steel minimills at home.

The economic infirmities of mergers, takeovers and acquisitions are graphically reflected by their atrocious failure rate. As summarized by Business Week, a half to two-thirds of all mergers don't work, with one in three later undone. Management expert Peter Drucker puts the record in even starker terms: On average, he finds, two mergers out of five are "outright disasters," two "neither live nor die" and one works—scarcely a stirring testimonial for claims that deal-mania benefits the nation's economy.

Nor is deal mania a boom for investors. Studies find the stock values of acquisitive firms to typically fall following takeovers—losses that cancel out gains in the stock of target firms at the time of takeover. Bondholders—who also are investors—have been slaughtered by deal-mania as high takeover premiums, high debt-equity ratios and astronomical interest payments erode the value of their holdings.

In the final analysis, a nation chooses the kind of economic game it plays. A nation chooses, either explicitly or by default, the kinds of skills it will encourage by virtue of the rewards it provides. A nation also chooses the economic consequences it will have to endure, based on the kind of economic game it plays.

If the objective is improved productivity, enhanced efficiency and accelerated innovation, then corporate deal-mania is simply the wrong game to play.

The challenge is to channel business activity away frrom speculative capitalism, and into creative capitalism. This distinction is crucial: Creative capitalism generates new productive wealth; speculative capitalism merely redistributes ownership claims. Creative capitalism gives birth to new goods, new services and new production techniques; speculative capitalism merely rearranges control over the production process. Creative capi talism contributes to economic growth; speculative capitalism is a sterile zero-sum game.

Henry Ford personifies creative capitalism as its best. He took the automobile, considered as a luxury for the few, and turned it into an affordable commodity for the many. He did it by building, not by buying; by creating, not by trading what already existed.

Fortunately, Ford is not an anachronism from a bygone age. America is still blessed with innovative entrepreneurs like Edwin Land, inventor of the instant camera and founder of the Polaroid Corporation; Ross Perot, who founded Electronic Data Systems (EDS) with $1,000 and built it into a multibillion dollar business; and Steven Jobs, the wizard who from his family's backyard garage revolutionized the computer industry with his MacIntosh personal computer.

As a society, we must decide which game we want the business community to play. We must decide between enterprise and speculation. We must decide between enterprise and speculation. We must decide between creating wealth and trading it—between investing in the future or wasting it away in an economically counterproductive game.

Given the right rules, American business can play the right game. It can rise to the challenge of world-class competitiveness.

EAGLE SCOUTS HONORED

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues, an outstanding group of young individuals from the Fifth Congressional District of Illinois who have completed a major goal in their Scouting careers. On Sunday, April 29, 1990 at the Morriane Valley Community Church located in Palos Hills, IL, James Gillen, Joseph Grzesik, Erick Hanson, Eric Krzystofiak, and Bradley Poynter will be honored at an Eagle Scout Court of Honor.

It is important to note that less than 1 percent of all young men in America attain the rank of Eagle Scout. This high honor can only be earned by those Scouts demonstrating extraordinary leadership abilities. These young individuals have clearly demonstrated such abilities through their dedicated community service and deserve special recognition.

In light of the commendable leadership and courageous activities performed by such a fine group, I ask you, my fellow colleagues, to join me in honoring James Gillen, Joseph Grzesik, Erick Hanson, Eric Krzystofiak, and Bradley Poynter for attaining the highest honor in Scouting—the Eagle Scout. With God's blessing, let us wish them the very best in all of their endeavors.

WHO WILL BUY THE ELECTRIC CAR?

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I recently read with great interest a commentary in Forbes Magazine written by Peter Huber, entitled "Who Will Buy The Electric Car? I commend this article to my colleagues.

WHO WILL BUY THE ELECTRIC CAR?

At the beginning of January, with some modest fanfare, General Motors rolled out a prototype, two seater electric car. It's called the Impact, as in "environmental." The car comes with good acceleration, pretty good range [120 miles between recharges] and the electric car's classic weakness—a battery pack that costs too much and dies too young. Sooner or later, however, better batteries will be developed.

And then what? Then the fate of electric cars will be up to government types and environmentalists. Judging from their early reaction to the Impact, the bureaucrats and self-appointed protectors of the earth will mostly vote the wrong way. And that will be bad news for both the environment and our national economy.

For now, the gasoline engine enjoys a huge advantage over any potential competition: an established network of fuel and service stations. To crack that advantage, the first generation electric cars will have to shine in some other way that counts. Barring miraculous advances in battery technology, the edge won't be either the price of the electric car or the cost of running it.

The first potential advantage is national interest. The gryrating price of oil was behind President Carter's economic problems in the 1970s, just as it has been behind Comrade Gorbachev's in the 1980s. Oil imports acount for half of our trade deficit and 60 percent of the Soviets' hardcurrency exports. The point is, oil remains the most politically potent commodity on the planet, at both ends of the pipeline. Today, we import two out of every five barrels that we burn—which is to say, we import only a bit more than it takes to run our cars. Get the oil out of the car and we win a huge new measure of national independence.

Then there's the environmental side of things. Contrary to intuition, it's better to burn fuel in the external combustion engine of an electric power plant than in the internal combustion engine of your average car—even if the fuel is oil, which it rarely is in a power plant.

Technology Management Services of Washington, D.C. has worked the numbers. A good electric power plant converts about 35 percent of its thermal energy into electricity. The best car engine can convert barely 20 percent of its heat to mechanical energy at the wheel. Transmitting electricity, charging a battery and running an electric motor entail some energy loss, but refining oil for cars entails even more.

Add it all up and it becomes a good bit more efficient to burn oil and distribute electricity than to refine oil and distribute gasoline. That means that right off the bat generating electricity for transportation causes less pollution than refining and burning gasoline.

Besides, even if it has a smokestack, an electric power plant can be sited miles from urban areas, operated with high-temperature, well-maintained combustors and sanitized with scrubbers and such. Internal combustion engines, by contrast, stick close to people, and exhaust is dirty even when run through the best catalytic converter on the market. And when it's up to millions of individuals to tune the engine and maintain the pollution controls, millions won't. As recent research has confirmed once again, auto exhaust is far harder on the environment than anything coming out of power plant smokestacks.

If the electric car is still a distant prospect, the electric train isn't. Most U.S. locomotives rely on internal combustion diesel engines, hardly more efficient than car engines. Europe and Japan (by contrast) are rushing to embrace all-electric locomotives. Batteries aren't needed here, and the electric engines are well developed. U.S. companies in fact did much of the developing in the early part of this century. Once again, burning the fuel at a power plant and delivering electricity to the train is considerably more efficient than burning fuel in the train.

You'd think with cleaner air, domestic jobs and a better balance of trade at stake, electric power would win hands down. You would also expect that the liberals and their friends in the environmental movement would be clamoring for electric transportation of any kind. No way. Why will they stand in the way of getting the gasoline out of transportation? It's a sad story.

Too many of the greens launched their careers fighting central power stations, and they shun technology that would require more. The Natural Resources Defense Council dismissed General Motors' Impact project with a sour remark: "We have to generate the electricity somewhere, and that would create a great deal more pollution."

It would create a great deal less. Electric transportation wouldn't even require much in the way of new power plants. Running every car in the country on electricity would consume about 25 percent of the power existing plants can generate. Battery recharging would occur largely at night, however, in off-peak hours when there is already abundant capacity to spare. As a side benefit, the price of electricity would fall as we squeezed major new revenues out of a sunken, often idle, capital investment.

So who will buy the electric car? No one, until we collectively put a new premium on energy independence, the balance-of-trade relief that goes with it, and the considerable environmental benefits of going electric. Those aren't priorities that any individual is going to set alone. But sooner or later the government may. If not the government in Los Angeles or Washington, DC, then perhaps the government in Azerbaijan, Tehran or Tripoli.

PUTTING THE HEART IN HEALTH CARE

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, today, Tuesday, February 27, 1990, the Finley Hospital of Dubuque, IA, celebrates its centennial anniversary. The hospital was founded on this date in 1890 with the bequest of Mrs. Helen "Corriell" Finley, who had made a provision in her will that her estate should be used to found a private, nonsectarian hospital in the city of Dubuque and that is should be named Finley Hospital in memory of her husband, Dubuque medical pioneer, Dr. John W. Finley.

A group of concerned citizens first met on June 11, 1885, to discuss the formation of the hospital according to the terms of the Finley will. They decided that the Finley residence should be purchased and remodeled to become the first hospital building.

The Finley Hospital opened to accept patients in April 1891, and could accommodate 40 patients. The mission of the Finley Hospital was to "afford medical and surgical aid to the sick, hurt or disabled persons." Hospital care was to be provided to men and women from all walks of life, regardless of their ability to pay.

From this simple beginning, the Finley Hospital has grown into a 158-bed regional medical center serving patients in a three-State area of northeastern Iowa, southwestern Wisconsin, and northwestern Illinois. Many specialized services are provided by a caring and dedicated staff.

The Finley Hospital today celebrates its 100th anniversary and the beginning of its second century of "putting the heart in health care."

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE BEATRICE COLEMAN KEMP

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that I convey to you the passing away of Beatrice Coleman Kemp, a dear friend and a community leader in the Los Angeles area. Her absence will be missed by her close ones and the community at large.

THE OBITUARY—SHE INSPIRED LOVE AND COMMITMENT TO GOD, FAMILY, FRIENDS AND COMMUNITY

Such was the life of Beatrice Coleman Kemp, beloved mother, grandmother, great grandmother, church and community worker who left us on Saturday morning, at 2:30 a.m., February 10, 1990, after 74 years, and one month on this earth.

Beatrice was born January 9, 1916 in Shreveport, Louisiana, the fourth child of Mr. Charlie S. Coleman and Mrs. Mattie Hill-Coleman, both now deceased. Also preceding her in death are one brother, Wesley Leroy Coleman and three sisters: Mrs. Bernice Coleman Moore, Mrs. Delilah Coleman Cook and Mrs. Mary Ruth Coleman Duncan.

She attended Mooretown and Davis Chapel Elementary Schools. Having attended Central High School (presently named Booker T. Washington High School) through the ninth grade, Beatrice never stopped educating herself over the years.

On March 1, 1934, when she was 18 years old, Beatrice married LeRoy Kemp, Sr., of Boley, Oklahoma. Of this union, four children were born, two deceased at birth.

A devoted wife and mother, one who always put the interest of her family first, Bea was a Christian, a strong believer in The Redeemer Jesus Christ and Prayer, as well as a devout Baptist. She was baptized at age 9 at Mount Chapel Baptist Church in Shreveport, Louisiana. Early 1926, she changed her membership to Midway No. 2 Missionary Baptist Chruch where she served on the Senior Usher Board. For 15 years, she was Secretary of the Senior Usher Board at Midway.

In 1943, Beatrice and her family moved to Los Angeles, where she worked as a maid at various hotels and in private homes. Because Bea and Roy were anxious to own their own home as they had in Shreveport, Bea and her mother crocheted and sold doilies for tables, sofas, chairs, and crocheted and embroidered sheets, and pillow cases and other beddings. Also in 1943, she joined St. Paul's Baptist Church, where she served on the Senior Usher Board until 1948.

Forty-two years ago (1948), she joined the membership of Paradise Baptist Church, where she has remained a member ever since. At Paradise, she served as a Sunday School teacher, and served on the Senior Usher Board, and served as a volunteer to various groups in the church such as the Youth Choir, and the Sunday afternoon BYPU.

Beatrice believed in and was dedicated to service and people, throughout her employment life, and community and political activities. In May 1944, she was employed by the Los Angeles County General Hospital in the Housekeeping Department in the main hospital. In 1946 she was promoted to Nurses' Aide and transferred to the staff in the Psychiatric Department. In 1951 she received another promotion, becoming a Hydrotherapist Technician.

Early on in her employment at Los Angeles County General Hospital she spent many hours endeavoring to improve and upgrade working conditions and job opportunities for all employees, as well as alleviating discriminatory practices in hiring and firing of minorities and women. With a few of her colleagues, Bea was one of the original organizers and founding members of Los Angeles County Employees Union Local 434, AFL-CIO. Although often called upon to hold several posts within Local 434, she chose to remain a Shop Steward from 1951 until her forced retirement in 1973.

Over her 47 years of residence in Los Angeles, she has held membership in many civic, social and political organizations. Among those she held dear are the NAACP, Urban League, Eastern Star (Queen Esther Grand Elective Chapter No. 19 of America), the Committee for the Rights of the Disabled, Los Angeles County Employees Union Local 434, AFL-CIO just to name a few. Politically active throughout the 1960's and 70's, Bea worked for the successful election campaigns of Augustus F. Hawkins for Congress, Mervyn M. Dymally for the State Assembly, State Senate and Lt. Governor, Billy G. Mills for City Council, Bill Greene and Leon Ralph for the State Assembly, Robert C. Farrell for City Council, Diane Watson for the State Senate, and many others too numerous to mention.

Fondly and lovingly called "Mama Bea" by family members, neighbors and friends, young and old, her heart and her home was a quiet refuge of warmth, comfort, strength and generosity to all of fortunate enough to be blessed to ahve known her.

Cherishing her memory are:

Son: Leroy Kemp, Jr., Los Angeles.

Daughter: Doris Jeanne Kemp Berryman Blaker and husband, Charles Randolph Blaker, Los Angeles.

Grandchildren: Robert Lee Berryman, Jr., Los Angeles; Randi Lynne Berryman-Phillips and husband, Carl Lorenzo Phillips, Los Angeles; Rory Lynnard Berryman and wife, Norma Jean Marshall-Berryman, Los Angeles.

Great Grandchildren: Christian Lorenzo Phillips, Los Angeles; Chrystal Lynn Phillips, Los Angeles; Cameron Lemuel Phillips, Los Angeles; Camille Leigh Phillips, Los Angeles.

Sisters: Mrs. Marie Coleman Jackson, Los Angeles; Mrs. Pearline Coleman Meriweather, Los Angeles; Mrs. Charlesezetta Coleman Miles, Shreveport; Mrs. Crealor Coleman Thomas, Shreveport; Ms. Arlillian Coleman, Washington, D.C.; Mrs. Bobbie J. Coleman Harrison, Cleveland, OH.

Brothers: Mr. Clarence Coleman, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada; Mr. Charlie Coleman, Jr., Shreveport; Mr. Frank Coleman; Mr. Jesse Coleman, Shreveport; Mr. Clifford Coleman, Sr., U.S. Navy; Reverend Nathanial Coleman, Shreveport; Mr. Tommy Coleman, Shreveport; Mr. Melvin Coleman, Sr., Shreveport.

Nieces and Nephews, 56; Great Nieces and Nephews, 77; Great-Great Nieces and Nephews, 50.

Stepmother: Mrs. Elziner Coleman, Shreveport, LA.

Uncle: Mr. Henry Coleman, Shreveport, LA.

Sisters-in-law, 8; brothers-in-law, 6; and a host of other relatives and friends.

TRIBUTE TO ST. ALBAN'S CHILD CARE CENTER

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, last week the St. Alban's Child Care Center on Beulah Church Road in Louisville was accorded a high honor: The "PERQC" Award—Project the Evaluate and Recognize Quality in Child Care—in recognition of the quality child care they provide above and beyond requirements for State licensing.

St. Alban's is just the sixth of more than 250 State-licensed child care centers in Jefferson County to receive this recognition since Community Coordinated Child Care—or 4C's—in Louisville began honoring high quality programs in this way in 1985.

St. Alban's is fortunate to have such able leaders as Fr. Lester Gross—who first envisioned the child care center years ago—and executive director Mavis Higgs, and board member Charley Smith. The individuals who work at the center should be proud, also, for it takes each person making a contribution every day to create such a quality, carring, and loving environment for the more than 200 families served there daily.

It seems just yesterday that I visited St. Alban's for the groundbreaking ceremony for the new addition and that Mavis Higgs joined me in downtown Louisville for the congressional field hearing on the ABC bill—although it was really 1988.

Since that time we have come close in Washington to passing a comprehensive child care bill which incorporates the heart and soul of the ABC bill. Unfortunately, these efforts fell apart in the last days of 1989. I am pleased the House leadership has made child care one of its top priorities for 1990 and I am hopeful we can approve a bill this spring.

I look forward to visiting the newly-completed facilities at St. Alban's soon, and commend all involved with this winning effort.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 81, A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT DESIGNATING ENGLISH AS THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF UNITED STATES

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am the primary House sponsor of House Joint Resolution 81, which would provide for a constitutional amendment designating English as the official language of the United States. The bill now enjoys the sponsorship of 64 of my colleagues, all of whom are enthusiastically supported by their respective constituencies on this important issue. Just last week, I was presented with more than 30,886 declarations of support for House Joint Resolution 81 from citizens across the Nation.

Seventeen States already have declared English their official language, including my own State of California. Twelve more are considering official English legislation. Polls and surveys continue to demonstrate that the public overwhelmingly endorses the concept of a single language in Government.

Official English is a commonsense idea. A single language in Government use, a common language, greatly enhances national unity, political stability, social equality, and economic efficiency. Contrary to the opinion of those who oppose the official language movement, such a step would not prohibit or discourage the use of foreign languages in homes, churches, community groups, private organizations, tourism, or commerce. Only Government functions would be affected. I applaud and encourage the ethnic diversity from which the rich tapestry of our heritage is woven. However the unifying thread in this varied tapestry, the thread which has forged unity from our diversity, is a common language.

As the most pluralistic Nation in the world, the United States is more dependent than any other on the unifying bond of language to facilitate communication, cooperation, and the exchange of knowledge. The petitions, I have just received, make it clear that Americans understand that dependency, and that they endorse the effort to designate English our official language. I strongly urge my colleagues to do likewise.

WEBSTER'S PULASKI BRASS BAND MARKS A CENTURY OF MUSICAL ACHIEVEMENT

HON. RICHARD E. NEAL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, 1989 was a banner year for the Pulaski Brass Band of Webster, MA. The band, which has become a respected musical resource for the people of Webster, marked its 100th anniversary last year, and will officially commemorate the event on April 29, 1990.

The Pulaski Brass Band was established in 1889 by 19 men from Saint Joseph's Parish, led by Valerian Kreft, Joseph Woznicki, John Ryzewski, Louis Kreft, and Daniel Zatorski. The original members, who were primarily Polish immigrants, named their band after the great Polish freedomfighter, and hero of the American Revolution, Count Casimir Pulaski. The selection of the name Pulaski served as an inspiration to the newcomers to the Webster area as they pursued the dreams of freedom and success that had brought them to the United States.

From its first performance on the balcony of the Joslin House in Webster in 1890, to its current summer concerts on Webster's town green, the defining characteristics of the Pulaski Brass Band have been its musical ability and the spirit of its members. The bands outstanding reputation was evidenced by the invitation it received to play before His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, on his historic visit to Boston in 1979.

Mr. Speaker, the Pulaski Brass Band has a current membership of approximately 50 musicians, ranging from young adults to retired citizens. For a century, the appeal of this organization has spanned generational lines in Webster. Through its ability to entertain, it has become a vital part of the civic and social life in the town. I salute president Robert Grzych, vice president Susan George, secretary Walter Motyka, treasurer Bernard Baldyga, historian Richard Zawislak, musical director Thomas Kruczek, and all the members of the Pulaski Brass Band on their 100 years of outstanding service through music to their community. With its proud history as prelude, I am confident that the Pulaski Brass Band will enjoy continued success as it begins its second century of musical excellence.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM LEGISLATION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am offering today a resolution which calls for the development of campaign finance reform legislation to attempt to limit the mushrooming spending in congressional campaigns and to reduce somewhat the role of PAC's in campaign financing.

My resolution sets out spending limits and PAC limits that I feel we should consider. Let me be clear that these limits only work in connection with incentives that we must develop to encourage candidates to participate.

In my resolution I suggest setting a $200,000-per-election limit on spending for U.S. House races. This would mean $400,000 including a primary and a general election. I also suggest limits of $2,500 contributions from political action committees and a $75,000 limit per candidate—these are limits for each of the primary and general elections.

Again, let me emphasize that these are simply my thoughts about some limits we should consider in reform legislation. They cannot be considered alone and they cannot stand alone. They must be related to the resolution of other issues such as political party contributions to candidates, the soft money issues, the bundling issues and more.

Most importantly, we need to take action to address these campaign issues and we need to do it in this session of Congress.

LET'S EXTEND THE JOB CORPS TO HOMELESS FAMILIES

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to introduce legislation to extend the Job Corps Program to serve homeless families. The Job Corps has proven to be an excellent Federal investment, returning $1.45 for every $1 invested. Thirty-three Members of the House have joined me as original cosponsors of this legislation.

This legislation authorizes the Job Corps to provide services and facilities at existing or special Job Corps centers to respond to the needs of members of homeless families. Participation by such families would be strictly voluntary.

The bill stipulates that an agreement be established with one or more State or local governments or agencies which requires that State and local entity: provides, in the aggregate, not less than 50 percent of the costs of such services and facilities; contains provisions to ensure that enrollees and their families are effectively assisted in obtaining all necessary health, education, and social services provided by existing Federal, State, and local programs in such State or locality; provides such transitional assistance, including housing, necessary to effect successful job placements for enrollees.

Federal, State, and local governments are now using significant sums of money simply to house many homeless families. We can make better use of those dollars in this joint venture. We can do a good job of keeping families together while providing necessary assistance to them in one setting. This legislation would also reduce the Federal costs necessary to serve these families by involving family members in food preparation and other activities at these centers.

This bill would not mortgage funds for existing Job Corps centers at current operating levels but would seek to use the successful experiences we have learned in the 25 years of operating the Job Corps and apply them to helping homeless families.

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO CREATE NATIONAL PARK IN CONNECTICUT

HON. JOHN G. ROWLAND

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to join in sponsoring legislation to establish the J. Alden Weir Farm—located in the Wilton and Ridgefield area of my district in Connecticut—as our State's first national park. The Weir Farm has received tremendous support from conservationists and local residents to have this area included in the National Park Service system.

J. Alden Weir was one of the founders of the American impressionist movement in painting. The farm, which was originally obtained by Mr. Weir in a trade for a work of art, was the site on which hundreds of landscape and rural life scenes were painted. Located approximately 45 miles from New York City, the farm has been continuously occupied by working artists and their families since 1882. Barely altered since Weir's tenure, it is a landscape of rolling hills with fields buffered from the surrounding suburban area by a hardwood forest.

Last year, the State of Connecticut approved the purchase of 60 acres included in the original Weir Farm. With the adjacent Weir Preserve owned by the Nature Conservancy, a national land stewardship organization, and a sizable open space tract owned by the town of Ridgefield, close to 175 contiguous acres are now protected.

The National Park Service recently conducted a favorable study to assess the suitability of including the Weir farm in the National Park System. The legislation being introduced today would ensure the protection of this area by asking Congress to authorize the acquisition of the remaining 2-acre core parcel of land which includes the houses, barns, and studios for an amount not to exceed $1 million. In addition, this bill allows the Park Service to enter into cooperative agreements with the State of Connecticut concerning the maintenance, restoration, and management of the lands.

I believe that this measure being introduced today offers an excellent opportunity for this body to ensure the preservation of an historic national site that has received much support already on the State and local level. I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

STUDENT LOAN DEFAULT REDUCTION AMENDMENTS OF 1990

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce the Student Loan Default Reduction Amendments of 1990, a measure which will amend the Higher Education Act of 1965 to reduce student loan defaults and increase efficiency in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

Section 2 of the bill would amend section 427(a)(2) of the Higher Education Act of 1965—the Act—and require that lenders offer to borrowers of Stafford loans and supplemental loans to students the option of repaying their loans on a graduated repayment schedule. Only the accrued interest would be repaid during the first 12 months, yet the borrower would resume payment on a normal schedule and retire the debt in the normal 10-year period.

A new paragraph would be added to the act as part of section 3. This new provision would prohibit an institution from employing anyone other than salaried employees or volunteers to conduct recruiting activities with regard to student financial assistance. An institution would also be prevented from paying a commission to an individual based directly on securing enrollments.

Section 4 of the bill would revise section 428E of the act to provide guaranty agencies with a uniform authority to garnish the wages of student loan defaulters. This would allow the agency to garnish up to 10 percent of defaulters' disposable pay.

Section 5 would amend section 484(d) of the act to require that any student admitted on the basis of ability to benefit must pass a test in order to obtain Federal student financial aid assistance. This provision would reduce the abuse of the ability to benefit criterion by limiting institutions' ability to enroll inadequately prepared students.

Section 6 of the bill would amend section 487(a) of the act to require that all institutions participating in title IV programs implement a fair refund policy, and inform prospective students in writing of that policy. These amendments would help to minimize the problem of defaults by students who drop out near the beginning of a term.

Section 7 of the bill would provide the effective dates for the amendments made by the bill.

MARXISM-LENINISM, COMMUNIST TOTALITARIANISM, IS NEVER THE ANSWER

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, on January 25, 1990, the voters of Nicaragua spoke. Their message was loud and clear. Marxism-Leninism, or more accurately, Communist totalitarianism, is never the people's choice. For years a few Americans, among them a former and a current President, and thousands of brave Nicaraguans have been saying the very same thing.

Of late, their voice had been largely ignored. One only has to look to the preelection media coverage of Nicaragua. From the Washington Post, to the New York Times and the Christian Science Monitor, virtually every major newspaper forecast a Sandinista victory. Relying on Sandinista controlled polls, they each in turn concluded that the FSLN had the support of the people.

As has happened in the past, the big Sandinista lie, like the big Soviet lie before it, was given credibility. The U.S. Congress has always recognized that communism was not the answer for Central Europe, but maybe in Central America, in a few selected poor nations, where freedom and democracy have never been the norm. Maybe in Nicaragua the FSLN could be the answer.

Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today, with a message from the Nicaraguan people. Marxim-Leninism, Communist totalitarianism, is never the answer, Not in Nicaragua, not in Angola, and certainly not in El Salvador.

MANDATORY DEPOSIT OF FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS IN THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

HON. JIM SLATTERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, section 407 of the Copyright Act—title 17, United States Code—requires deposit of two copies of every work published in the United States in which copyright is claimed. The House and Senate reports accompanying the bill later enacted as the Copyright Act of 1976 explicitly state that the mandatory deposit requirements "become applicable as soon as a work first published abroad is published in this country through the distribution of copies or phonorecords that are either imported or part of an American edition." Since the copyright registration system became the responsibility of the Library of Congress in 1870, copyright deposits have been one of the principal sources of development of the collections.

This requirement of legal deposit of printed works in a country outside the place of publication—where the publication merely is distributed—is of great concern to the International Group of Scientific, Technical and Medical Publishers [STM]. I recently received from Mr. Arly Allen, president of Allen Press, Inc., of Lawrence, KS, a copy of an article authored by the secretary of the STM Group which outlines their concerns in this regard. Allen Press, Inc., publishes a wide variety of scholarly journals and books for academic and scholarly readerships. I hope my colleagues with an interest in copyright issues will thoughtfully review the arguments presented in this article:

THE GUTENBERG BIBLE WAS PUBLISHED IN THE USA: LEGAL DEPOSIT IN THE MODERN WORLD

(By Paul Nijhoff Asser, secretary, STM Group)

"No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property" (Universal Declaration of Human Rights, art. 17).

A very curious event has happened recently and since it is potentially dangerous to publishers I believe all should know about.

The US Library of Congress is taking the German STM publisher Springer-Verlag to court because this publisher has not complied with a "demand" from the Library for free deposit copies of three research journals published in Germany.

Everybody knows—I suppose—that legal deposit is a fact of publishing life. It has an old history. In olden times, and nowadays still under many authoritarian, totalitarian or other backward regimes, publishing was subject to censorship. The authorities did not like to see things printed against them and looked for ways to prevent (their notions of) subversion, treason and/or immorality—all threatening their very authority and therefore, as they saw it, the stable structure of society. So they instituted laws and regulations requiring all those who controlled the media (i.e., the printing press) to submit one or two copies of all printed works.

Later, of course, this changed. Societies opened up, as it were; deviating theories and their expressions were tolerated. The media changed, too. Now it became more a matter of collecting, and of describing, what was printed in particular countries. For reasons of space I am skipping over the history of copyright or authors' rights: suffice it to say that in conjunction with censorship, printers/publishers were given privileges to print, and this public privilege was the original right to copy or "copy-right". Obviously, this is the historical reason why, in many legislations, the obligation for publishers to deposit one or a few copies free of charge in a national depository is still part of the copyright law, even though the "right to copy" has been disconnected completely from that obligation.

My first proposition, therefore, is that legal deposit as such does not belong in a copyright law since it has nothing to do with copyright, and that publishers of countries where it still is part of the copyright law should try to get it removed.

Next: when the art of bibliography started to come into its own and more enlightened and democratic laws came into being to mitigate censorship and to tolerate dissension, not to speak of the shift from printer/publishers' "privilege" to authors' rights, and nations started to understand that collecting and describing "the national imprint" was a worthwhile activity, it was felt that for those reasons alone a continued obligation for publishers to provide copies of their authors' books to a central depository would be justified.

Publishers considered this to be a form of unfair taxation because it was not levied on other citizens whose products were also intellectual property; some legislators were quick to react, and henceforth other producers (phonogram and film makers, designers, etc.) were also brought in. . . . Yet books remained the first target—and the taxation remained unfair since there was no such obligation on car or aeroplane manufacturers, producers of cameras, radios and television sets, and others. But you who read this know as well as I do that works of the mind are special: Books Are Different, remember? And we are, after all, proud of that (otherwise, for example, we would not be politically campaigning in Europe to obtain the VAT zero rate—and to maintain the zero rate in the UK and other such civilized countries).

However, there are advantages. Publishers recognize that their publications, archived in and bibliographically described by a central national depository, will be more accessible. And that is what they publish them for: to be tracked down, to be located, to be available, to be purchased. Somewhere, there is a copy of every book ever published; somewhere, there is a description of every title; and that title can nowadays even be "accessed" electronically by many entries: author, title, subject, ISBN. . . . Also, the sum total of all national bibliographies is one global bibliography—the goal of the Universal Bibliographical Control Programme of IFLA, the International Federation of Library Associations and Institutions.

My second proposition, therefore, is that publishers should not protest, at least not too loudly, against their obligation to give one or a few copies of their books to the nation, because there are a few not quite negligible advantages attached to it. And these, on the whole, can be balanced against the expense.

This inexorably leads to my third proposition, which is that where publishers (and in some countries other producers of works of the mind as well) are taxed over and beyond that which other citizens have to pay, and live with it because they get something "in return," the special tax should be reasonable, i.e., balanced against benefits. One example of irrationality is found in the United Kingdom which expects its publishers to send copies not only to the national depository for archiving and bibliographic capture, the British Library, but to not less than five other libraries including Trinity College Library in Dublin, Ireland! So the involuntary gift to the nation (in this case, to two nations one of which is outside British jurisdiction) is really beyond the stated function of "normal" legal deposit, which was, but is no longer, to facilitate control over the printed word as well as claims to copyright, and which is to establish and preserve a public archival collection for scholars, and to base the national bibliography on that archive.

Sixteen years ago, at 1973 prices, the sum total of all the retail prices of books deposited by British publishers during a 12-month period was estimated by the British Department of Education and Science at over £1 million. Obviously, this should be diminished by the trade discount in order to estimate the "tax" paid by the publishers, or "revenue foregone" if that term seems more appropriate. Also, the six libraries probably would not have purchased all the titles (33,000 at that time!) they would otherwise be given.

However, the title output has almost doubled since then, and new book prices have risen dramatically, too (131.7 percent over the years 1980-7 alone, as Somerset's county librarian has found—"The Bookseller," 25 August 1989, p. 582). So the one million pounds of 1973 could well be two million by 1989.

Finally, there is the problem of specialized short-run (and expensive) limited editions. It would be highly unreasonable for a publisher of such works to be forced to part with six copies without any compensation, if the total print run were something like, say, 75 or 150 copies.

The Whitford Committee, established in 1977 to revise the UK Copyright Act of 1956, concluded in this respect that, since there was 'no requirement that other aids to knowledge should be provided at the expense of their makers', it seemed hard "that the cost should fall exclusively on the authors and their publishers". Yet, "the principle that a national archive of published literature should be maintained by legislative requirement for deposit has not been challenged".

The Committee recommended, inter alia, that "the question of relieving publishers from the financial burden involved in legal deposit, possibly through fiscal concession, should be considered," and that "the revised provisions for deposit should be the subject of legislation separate from the law of copyright".

Whitford also spoke about the "uniquely confiscatory nature" of the legal deposit requirements.

What became of this in the new UK law of 1988 which recently came into effect? Nothing, unfortunately. The only consolation is that non-compliance still will be subject to a fine of £5.00. . . .

Instead I will put forward my fourth proposition. This is that voluntary deposit is better than legal (compulsory) deposit. In the matter of expensive short-run publications which I have already mentioned, an accommodation should be found anyway. In The Netherlands, which, immediately after Waterloo, abolished the dépôt légal imposed by Napoleon in 1811, the national imprint is collected by the Royal Library in The Hague on a voluntary basis: should a publisher not be able or willing to deposit free of charge, he will be asked to grant a discount. This works well, and almost all Dutch books and journals are thus collected, on a voluntary basis, and at little cost, since most professional publishers do supply their list free of charge or at a discount and only very few charge the full price. At least the voluntary system does not have the "uniquely confiscatory nature" which Napoleon imposed and which still prevails in so many countries.

This brings me to my fifth proposition. Obviously, we still have some Napoleons to cope with in our world. But to obey a ruler who is not even occupying one's country seems nowadays rather out of place—to put it mildly. So my proposition is that no one should be compelled arbitrarily to part with his or her possessions, or to be "taxed," by a foreign power. In other words, even if one accepts that publishers, under controlled and reasonable conditions, would be ready to supply their national depository with one or two copies of their publications free of charge, it would be unacceptable for them to be obliged to send free copies abroad. This serves no archival or bibliographic purpose because that has already been taken care of by the national depository or bibliographic centre in the publisher's own country.

Certainly there are exceptions one could think of. One is where the publisher has designated an exclusive distributor in the other country. Another, even more obvious exception is where the publisher has made a special edition for that other country, possibly even in a co-publishing venture with a colleague. "Transnational" publishers, therefore, could easily—and indeed do—find themselves in a position where they supply free copies not only to the national depository of the country in which they have published the book but in maybe three other countries as well, depending on exclusive agencies, co-publishing arrangements, etc. The advantage of this is that the exclusive agent or the co-publisher will be supported by the national "bibliographical control" he can offer his customers.

In all other cases, however, there is no earthly reason why a publisher should be deprived of his property by a foreign country. The benefit is not his: it is the other nation's alone.

Unfortunately, the Library of Congress, the richest library of one of the richest countries of the world, has chosen to enforce a section of the U.S. Copyright Act (Section 407) by initiating a court action against Springer-Verlag of Heidelberg, Germany. Springer-Verlag had not complied with a "demand" from the Library to supply three research journals. Why these journals? Because the Library needed them. Why not buy them? Because the Library allegedly has a legal right to receive anything free of charge that is "published with notice of copyright in the United States of America".[1] But these journals are not published in the United States of America at all, they are published in Heidelberg, Germany! Yes, they are published in the United States of America, "after first publication in Germany" . . .

The solution to this riddle is simple: according to the US law, "publishing" means "distributing"—even "offering for sale"!—and so you can publish something in, say, Bristol, England, and then, by just sending a copy of your catalogue to a library in, say, Kalamazoo, "again" publish it in America: and this leads you "legally" into the trap of the obligation mentioned in Section 407.

Thus, because there are copies of the Gutenberg Bible in a few US libraries (including the Library of Congress), and the book therefore must have been distributed in the USA, Gutenberg would be surprised to learn that his Bible was published in America. . . .

How legal is legal? This is something to be found out. How this story will end cannot be foreseen, but it would be a sad day if and when the Librarian of Congress (who has so far disregarded pleas from IPA and STM to use his discretionary powers) got his way. That would mean that he, in order to "enrich his collections" (the stated purpose of the deposit requirements!), could "demand" virtually all publications wherever published in the world. How embarrasing. But also, what a glorious example for other countries to follow—countries that genuinely have not enough money to buy what they need! Golden times for India, Mexico et alii!

Admittedly, the Library of Congress has so far used this extraordinary, "uniquely confiscatory" power given it by Congress, only sparingly. It is actually the first time since the new Copyright Act came into effect in 1978 that a foreign publisher has been taken to court—although it is certainly not the first time that the Library has "demanded" foreign publications for free deposit. Many publishers ignored these demands. Some complied, grudgingly, to avoid hassle. But the Library indeed never "demanded" all foreign publications. In fact, it can hardly cope with the enormous mass of domestic publications it receives now—let alone with all the foreign ones it would receive if every British, French, German, Soviet, and Dutch publisher (or, for that matter, all other 150 nations) obeyed the U.S. law. So why enforce such an impracticable law? Why does the Librarian say that he has "no choice" while he has? Was it simple greed, or just ignorance, that prompted Congress in 1976 to interpret "publishing" in a way no bookman or -women, let alone a publisher or a librarian, would even dream of? An easy way to save money on the acquisitions budget? Would the Library act in the same way against a Soviet state publishing house because it "needed" its publications? Against an Indian one? A Japanese?

Why would the Library of Congress risk its reputation and good relations with the publishing community for a budget item which is—for them—negligible? and maybe cause the U.S. Department of Justice, the German Justizministerium and, last but not least, Springer-Verlag to spend perhaps millions of dollars, partly American and German texpayers' money, in legal expenses?

It is all an absurdity and if it were not true, I am sure you would not believe it. The only thing one might, very tentatively, suggest is that Springer-Verlag should perhaps have complied in the first place? I believe this cannot simply be answered by a yes or no. There is a limit to which people, or indeed publishers, will go. It is not as if this has not been going on for years: already in 1984-5 even the Association of American Publishers complained to the Library that the danger of retaliation by other countries was threatening their own members; yet the Library stuck to its guns.

Is it then strange that at one point one publisher stands up and says, like Churchill, "This is something up with which I will not put," and fights for his rights?

Laws, however, have a habit of being powerful and not easy to change. In countries other than the USA, a case like this might be laughed out of court, but in litigious America it is no laughing matter. Let us hope that a solution will be found which takes into account at least the normal usages and decencies that are commonplace in civilized society, and between citizens of different countries. The present bizarre confrontation only leads to the opposite.

You may have noticed, by now, that the action of the Library of Congress is based on exactly the opposite of all my propositions:

The U.S. Copyright Act contains a provision on deposit which has nothing to do with copyright whatsoever;

The Library's legal deposit requirements are unreasonable because foreign publications are allegedly included;

Its deposit regulations are compulsory, not voluntary;

The compulsory deposit of foreign publications only serves to enrich the US collections and so does not provide any advantages in return to those who allegedly are obliged to part with their property.

I have not even gone into the arbitrary nature (Why journals? Why these journals? Why this publisher?) of the "demands". There seems to be no guide as to what criteria are applied except the rather lame, "we need these journals (books, materials, etc.)". This reminds us of the thief who was asked why he had robbed a bank. His reply was: "Because that's where the money is". At least his target was clear. The Library's explanation—seemingly backed up by the Copyright Law—has no such specific target: its "demands" are arbitrary and this is enhanced by their not having to be justified to anyone, least of all to the victims. "No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property" is one of the categorical articles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Need more be said?

My last proposition, therefore, is that the book world (publishers and librarians in particular) should get together in an effort to arrive at a uniform or at least harmonized world system of deposit and bibliographical control. The present excess is an unfortunate interlude; but maybe we can turn it to our advantage.

If a reasonable, professional solution cannot be found, things may get seriously out of hand, worldwide, and authors and publishers—not just Springer-Verlag—will suffer. The matter is too serious to be left to the politicians.

POST SCRIPT:

The following Policy Statement was accepted and endorsed by the General Assembly of STM (International Group of Scientific, Technical and Medical Publishers) on 10 October 1989, and by the International Committee of the International Publishers Association on 14 October 1989.

STM Policy Statement on Legal Deposit ('dépôt Légal')

1. In many countries, compulsory legal deposit systems enable the national patrimony of publications, in particular of published writings ("the national imprint"), to be as comprehensive as possible.

At the same time, such a central archive of the nation's publications may serve as a basis for the national bibliographic control to the fullest extent possible.

The advantages of these two aspects of legal deposit, both to the public and to the publishers, are obvious.

2. It is for this reason that publishers in general, and publishers in the sciences and the humanities in particular, on the whole do not object to their being legally obliged—in the countries where this applies—to supply one or two copies of each of their publications to their national depository.

3. Although some countries still maintain the legal deposit system in the national copyright laws even though deposit is not a condition of copyright protection, publishers consider this to be nothing but a remnant of olden times when "copy-right" was a "privilege" against which copies had to be presented to the authority who exercised censorship and who conferred the printing monopoly.

[1] In the new version of the Copyright Act, after the US accession to Berne, this wording was changed to: "published in the United States of America".

Legal deposit is no longer related to copyright and should not ever be again, as the Berne Convention makes clear.

Publishers should call upon the national legislators, wherever necessary, to remove from their copyright laws the references to legal deposit.

4. Compulsory deposit without payment is often regarded as a form of discriminatory taxation of one section of the public, or as expropriation of private property without compensation: "for the many by a few". Publishers share these views if free deposit is required of more than two copies in their national depository or bibliographic centre, or if free deposit is required of more than two copies to more than two deposit libraries in their country, or if they have to pay for the postage, packaging and handling as well.

5. Publishers should not be obliged to deposit their publications in national depositories other than their own. For purposes of national archiving and national bibliographical control, the national depository should be uniquely designated; amalgamating the national bibliographies results in an international bibliography.

Compulsory deposit of publications in foreign depositories, therefore, serves other purposes which are of no benefit to publishers. At best, such deposit should be voluntary; if a publisher cannot or will not deposit free-of-charge, the foreign depository should purchase the relevant publication.

6. Voluntary deposit of paper and micro publications is better than involuntary deposit, as practices in some countries show.

Opto-electronic publications should be subject to the same voluntary deposit rules, and pubishers should call upon their national bibliographic centres to collaborate with them on exclusive arrangements for use by the public in this respect.

7. For low print-run publications in general, and bibliophile editions and other rare and expensive items such as facsimiles, special relief should be available.

8. Finally, for purposes of defining the "nationality" of a publication, publishers maintain their traditional usage in that a book, journal or other information carrier is published in one certain fixed location, although it may be distributed and sold in thousands of places worldwide. Publishing and distributing are emphatically not one and the same thing.

The place of publication is the point of attachment for legal deposit, not the locations or countries of sale and distribution; collecting "the national imprint" is the purpose of deposit.

Where sole agents or exclusive distributors are appointed for certain regions or countries other than the country of origin, these agents or distributors may consider themselves to be the publisher in these regions or countries, and to be subject to legal deposit requirements there, in particular if a special edition has been produced for that region or country.

EDUCATION'S IMPORTANCE IN AMERICA

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in discussing the importance of education. As a member of the House Education and Labor Committee, and as the Representative of a congressional district with one of the largest African-American populations in America, I know all too well the relationship between obtaining a good education and achieving success in life.

When I travel through my district, it is apparent to me that for the majority of my constituents, the key to their upward mobility is not the lottery, or a big inheritance from a wealthy relative. For the vast majority of them, the key is education. I was heartened on February 20 when the other body finally passed H.R. 2281, legislation I introduced to extend the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act. By extending this measure, we are keeping the Federal Government committed to addressing a segment of our youth—high school dropouts—who would othewise end up as part of the permanent underclass of society.

While I am proud of the fact that as a result of my School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act, 82 dropout prevention programs have been funded across the country, I am dismayed that we still are unable to serve the vast majority of students who are at risk of dropping out of school or who have already dropped out. This Nation is too rich and too progressive to allow upward of 750,000 young people to drop out of school. While the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act, with its limited $50 million authorization level is a good beginning, without additional resources, it is simply not going to be enough to keep thosands of our young people from a lifetime of self-imposed poverty and lost opportunities.

I believe we can do better and I challenge my colleagues to join me in addressing our Nation's education needs. Our children are our most precious commodity and educating them is our Nation's best defense. Let's not shortchange them under the guise of a budget deficit. Investing our money in them today will provide us with untold resources tomorrow.

NATIONAL EMPLOYEES HEALTH AND FITNESS DAY

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a joint resolution requesting the President designate May 16, 1990, as "National Employee Health and Fitness Day."

As a member of the leadership task force on health, the Maryland Commission on Physical Fitness and a longtime fitness advocate, I would like to introduce this resolution because of my strong commitment to the importance of a balanced diet, regular exercise, and physical fitness activities. One out of every three adults in the United States participate regularly in sports or exercise programs. Studies have shown that a regular program of physical fitness activities have increased higher productivity levels, higher morale, less sick leave and a significant reduction in health care costs among private and public sector employees.

In 1988, over 1.5 million people died from coronary disease and 333,000 underwent heart bypass surgery. These figures represent people who could have benefited from regular fitness programs. Regular health and physical fitness activities strengthens the mind as well as the body and have been shown to prevent coronary disease, hypertension, and in several cases the occurrence of colon cancer.

I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting this worthwhile endeavor.

CITY OF HOPE HONORS DAVID G. HOLLANDER

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, on March 3, 1990, the Pembroke Pines Florida Auxiliary of the City of Hope will honor David G. Hollander by establishing a Cancer Research Fellowship in his name.

Mr. Hollander, president of Silver Builders, Inc., is being recognized by the City of Hope for his many philanthropic endeavors. David and his wife, Stephanie, have four children, Evan, Melissa, Marnie, and Brett. Mr. Hollander has always been involved in community events and has been more than generous to those less fortunate than himself. A charter member of the Boys and Girls Club of Hollywood, FL, and an active participant on the Citizen's Advisory Board of the City of Hollywood, David Hollander has been tirelessly involved in a diverse array of important causes. He is dedicated to supporting research for such terminal illnesses as cancer, diabetes, cerebral palsy, muscular dystrophy, and multiple sclerosis. Additionally, Mr. Hollander is a member of the Fort Lauderdale, Hollywood, and Miramar/Pembroke Pines Chambers of Commerce, the Center for Family Learning Advisory Board, Rotary Park, Commitment to Youth, and his Temple's Brotherhood. David Hollander is a man who demonstrates every day that much can be done when community dedication is combined with an energetic sense of social and moral responsibility.

The establishment of the David G. Hollander Cancer Research Fellowship will enable the City of Hope to expand its services and provide even greater medical care. The City of Hope has been long recognized as an institution that serves to improve health centers and medical care by supporting such projects in south Florida as a Pilot Medical Center and the Beckman Research Institute. Personalized care is made available to patients free of cost at this ultramodern facility. Patients at the center suffer from serious diseases—primarily cancer and leukemia. By pioneering new approaches in individualized attention, the center combines innovative treatments with a warm compassion to produce the highest quality of care.

I commend the City of Hope for honoring David G. Hollander by establishing the Cancer Research Fellowship in his name. Mr. Hollander's compassion and generosity has been and, now, will continue to benefit all who live in south Florida.

TRIBUTE TO EDWARD LaSOTA, PIUS THE IX CHAPTER OF THE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to one of the most inspiring men in Berks County. I am speaking of Mr. Edward LaSota, who, for the past 2 years, has been the faithful navigator of the Pius the IX Chapter of the Knights of Columbus in Reading, PA. On March 3, 1990, the Pius the IX Chapter will be honoring Mr. LaSota for his remarkable leadership of the chapter for the years 1988 and 1989.

Edward LaSota has been intimately involved with the Knights of Columbus for the past 14 years. He has chaired various functions for the chapter, and his past successes naturally led to his being chosen as faithful navigator for the past 2 years. In this most honored position, Edward LaSota represented the chapter throughout the region and across the Nation with other Knights of Columbus groups. As you know, Mr. Speaker, members of the Knights of Columbus are actively involved in helping those less fortunate and in bringing help, guidance, inspiration, and leadership to the communities they serve. Their selfless efforts have brought much light into the lives of many, and Edward LaSota epitomizes the essence of civic and community service. Mr. Speaker, Edward LaSota's compassion has touched Berks County and the surrounding regions, and it is only fitting that he be recognized for his leadership and endeavors to better his community. It is an honor and privilege to commend Edward LaSota and to say congratulations and thank you for many years of service.

OTTAWA COUNTY CELEBRATES ITS SESQUICENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY

HON. PAUL E. GILLMOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GILLMOR. Mr. Speaker, Ottawa County, OH, is celebrating its sesquicentennial anniversary this year. I want to take this opportunity to extend the celebration of this important anniversary from Ohio all the way to this esteemed Chamber, the House of Representatives.

It is with great pride, Mr. Speaker, that I mention that I am a resident of Ottawa County. It is a beautiful and neighborly Ohio county sitting on the shores of Lake Erie. Through a commitment to good citizenship and friendliness, Ottawa County reaches its 150th year as one of the finest locations in Ohio.

Ottawa County celebrates its sesquicentennial not by chance or merely the simple passage of time. It celebrates its 150th birthday because its people live by the values that enable the county to endure—family, hard work, community, and caring. Mr. Speaker, it is because of these enduring values that I am proud to call Ottawa County my home.

AN AMERICAN SUCCESS STORY

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend one of the finest small businessmen I know. Marty Higgenbotham is a good friend, and an outstanding example of the hard work and creative drive that has made this country great. On the occasion of his 30th anniversary in business as president of Higgenbotham Realty, Inc./Auctioneers, I want to share with my colleagues the excellent record he has set for himself and countless numbers of small business men and women like him across this country.

Marty Higgenbotham obtained his broker's license the day he turned 21 at which time he had already completed auction college and had been conducting auctions for nearly a year. He has continued in the real estate brok-erage and auctioneering field for the past 30 years. He has conducted real estate and personal property auctions in 30 States over the years. Today, Higgenbotham Realty is one of the largest real estate auction companies in America, ranking in the top five nationwide.

Marty Higgenbotham has achieved his business success while never failing to give back to his profession and his community some of the great gifts given him. He has travelled extensively conducting seminars, advising, and acting as an expert witness for attorneys, banks, and the like. At home, he is known for a generous heart as he has given countless hours and dollars to charities and worthwhile causes in his own backyard.

It gives me great pleasure today to join with Marty's many friends in tipping my hat to someone who has become a true American success story.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION COMMEMORATING THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF CHAPTER 1

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere pleasure that I am introducing today along with my distinguished colleague, Chairman AUGUSTUS HAWKINS, a resolution to commemorate 25 years of Federal support for programs in elementary and secondary education. This April will mark the 25th anniversary of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

The chapter 1 program, the largest Federal elementary and secondary education program, has enjoyed a long history of success in providing educational services to our Nation's children. This program has undergone a number of amendments over the years to reflect the changing educational needs of our Nation.

Given the demographic changes of our Nation, the seemingly insurmountable educational needs of our people, our desire to remain a world economic leader, and the correlation between economic prosperity and educational attainment, I believe we should express a renewed commitment to continue our efforts to support education for our country in the years to come. I hope you will join me in supporting this resolution to do just that.

ELIMINATE THE RTC OVERSIGHT BOARD

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to abolish the Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC] Oversight Board.

Created, at the request of the administration, under the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act [FIRREA], the oversight board was to be a check, insuring that regulators charged with cleaning up the S&L mess carried out the law at the least possible cost to the American taxpayer.

At that time, the establishment of an independent oversight board seemed to be a reasonable safeguard. There was broad consensus that a major factor at the core of the S&L crisis was the lack of adequate oversight by the S&L regulators. Caught up in the rhetoric of the Reagan administration's deregulation mania, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board completely lost sight of one of its principal responsibilities, to make sure that the individual savings and loans operated in a safe and sound manner. By the time that the Reagan/Bush administration regulators faced up to what had occurred, not only had the horses left the barn, but they had taken all of the hay—the hundreds of billions of dollars of deposits-with them.

With that track record in mine, Congress cooperated with the Bush administration's request for an independent five member oversight board. The oversight board is composed of the Secretary of Treasury, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, and two, thus far unappointed, representatives from the private sector to represent the public.

It has been nearly 7 months since the President has signed FIRREA into law. During that time, there has been continuing debate and discussion of the new law and its implementation. As Chairman of the Financial Institutions Task Force on the RTC, I have held hearings on many of the issues that have been raised about the law and have also met with individuals from the private and public sector to discuss the implementation of the law.

Frankly, there is a growing and deep concern about the successful implementation of this crucial S&L bailout law. Individuals and organizations have pointed out short falls concerning the tough new law. The single concern that they all identified as a pitfall is the lack of leadership and accountability.

It has become absolutely clear that this legislation and the $166 billion bailout cost is suffering from benign neglect within the Bush administration. I and other Members of this Body have continually sought in vain to shake and to shock the President into focusing attention on the deterioration and lack of focus on this important new law. Today we still have crucial posts for implementing the S&L bail-out law unfilled. No nominations for the public representatives on the oversight board have ever been submitted to the Senate for confirmation. The Senate has also been waiting these 7 months for an official nomination to head the Federal Housing Finance Board.

In addition, other crucial slots are filled on a temporary basis. We now have an acting President for the oversight board and there may soon be an acting director to replace the acting director of the Office of Thrift Supervision.

There is an administration leadership vacuum. That vacuum is being filled by Treasury timidity and naysayers. I wish that I could report to my colleagues today that the goal of Treasury is to implement the law. Unfortunately, their motives seem more designed for political damage control. Rather than working with and seeking the qualified individuals needed to address the myriad of complex issues associated with the S&L bailout, these Treasury spin control experts seem more interested in exercising their muscle through micromanagement and limiting political damage.

Thus, we have sadly seen the recent resignation of Oversight Board president Dan Kearney out of frustration because of Treasury meddling. The decision of Frederick Wolf finally declining to be further considered for the job of Director of OTS is further evidence of the neglect that this $166 billion S&L bailout law is receiving from the administration.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for the administration to face reality and stop looking for political expediency. According to FDIC Director Bill Seidman, the cost of the bailout grows by $14 million per day. I know that the administration faces many difficult decisions concerning this tough new law and that oftentimes they will be second-guessed. Now is not the time for Bush administration political timidity. The failed S&L assets are not like red wine, they will not get better with age.

The legislation that I am introducing today was not submitted lightly nor on the spur of the moment. It is the result of in depth discussions and is introduced based upon the belief that we must move to cut the red tape. Whether it is the RTC Oversight Board itself or its members, the board is a bottleneck that is slowing down and confusing the S&L resolution process.

As it is currently structured, the oversight board represents a significant barrier to the implementation of the law. While testifying before the House Banking Committee, Chairman Seidman stated that the current process is cumbersome and a hindrance to the implementation of the law. The intermediable negotiation and review process between the Board, the RTC and the staffs of the three Board members has slowed to a snail's pace the implementation of the simplest regulations. Decisions on the more complex and politically sensitive issues, such as working capital, wind up in a bureaucratic deep freeze.

In addition to the time lag, we are faced with a lack of accountability. Today, more than ever, we need to know who is in charge of the thrift resolution and where the buck stops. With the oversight board, Treasury, and the RTC, we have everyone in charge with the proverbial buck stuck in a revolving door with no exit.

Instead of acting as a safeguard, the oversight board has become a shackle around the neck of those trying to solve the S&L crisis. It is time to free the RTC so that it can do the job as the law intended. My legislation is not a panacea for all the ills that face the S&L industry nor the effective implementation of FIRREA. But it is an important step to insure that the law that we approved last year finally will go into effect and perhaps will wake the administration from its lethargic comatose state of indifference.

It is bad enough to pay for this S&L bailout once, much less paying tomorrow for today's timid, fumbling enforcement of the law.

DEMOCRACY FOR NICARAGUA

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, democracy emerged victorious in Nicaragua this week. And it won fair and square.

It was not the Contras but the people themselves who succeeded in ousting Sandinista President Daniel Ortega. The new President-elect, Violeta Chamorro, now faces the challenge of bringing unity to her war-weary nation and of forging new ties with the United States.

I would like to commend the United Nations and the Organization of American States for sending an international delegation of observers to ensure a successful and honest election. These observers, including former President Jimmy Carter, should be congratulated on a job well done.

A tarnished victory—no matter which candidate had emerged as the winner—would have only added to the strife in the already divided nation.

President Ortega also deserves to be commended for allowing international scrutiny of the elections and for conceding to the will of the people.

The United States must offer our assistance to the new President. I am also encouraged by President Bush's statements that there is no longer any reason for military action by opponents of the Sandinista government. It is my sincere hope that this will signal the end of U.S. aid to the Contra rebels.

I congratulate Ms. Chamorro on her election, but it is the people of Nicaragua who have won the biggest victory. They are now charged with the task of making their newfound democracy work.

SUPPORT VOLUNTARY FAMILY PLANNING

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the world's population is growing faster today than it ever has before. Every year, 90 million more people are added with nearly all of them born into impoverished and overcrowded villages throughout the Third World.

Rapid population growth depresses income and accelerates environmental destruction. In India, per capita income has stagnated for 50 years. In Brazil, population pressures strengthen the siege against the Amazon.

The economic, environmental and political costs of runaway growth are obvious. Future population projections show that we cannot afford a weak voluntary family planning policy.

The International Voluntary Family Planning Assistance Act of 1990 is part of the solution. The United States must rejoin the rest of our allies around the world in helping to provide families with the knowledge and the means they need to plan their families. I urge members to cosponsor this bill and become involved in offering solutions to this growing crisis.

CUMMINS ATTRACTED BY CORPORATE RAIDERS

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep concern about an assault by corporate raiders on Cummins Engine Co. This assault could threaten the future of Fleetguard, a Cummins Division which is a major employer in my district.

Cummins is one of those enviable U.S. companies which has managed to stay competitive with foreign firms by sacrificing short-term profits for long-term investments in research and development and new technology. Because it has achieved success as the largest independent diesel engine manufacturer in the world, Cummins now has attracted the interest of corporate raiders.

A Hong Kong-based firm, Industrial Equity Pacific [IEP] has bought up almost 15 percent of Cummins stock. Although claiming to be a passive investor, IEP now has demanded a seat on Cummins board of directors and reportedly is threatening the company with financial ruin. Alleging that IEP obtained its stock in an illegal and unethical manner, Cummins has filed suit against IEP for violations of securities, antitrust and antiracketerring laws.

Some corporate takeovers can be beneficial. Hostile takeovers, however, often leave companies saddled with debt and unable to meet its previous commitments to workers and communities. Pension funds become a target for cash-hungry raiders, and employees face an uncertain future where their jobs are threatened and their long-term security is in question.

I do not want the 881 employees of Fleetguard in Tennessee to face this kind of future because a corporate raider illegally won control of Cummins.

The allegations against IEP are serious and warrant a full investigation. I would like to join my colleagues, Mr. DINGELL and Mr. SHARP, in asking for such an investigation of IEP by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Federal Trade Commission. This is not a call for special treatment of a company that cannot compete; it is a call for proper enforcement of the law to allow valuable American company to protect both its integrity and its employee's jobs.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH THE WEIR FARM NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to make the J. Alden Weir Farm in Wilton and Ridgefield, CT, a national park. Not only would this be the first national park in my home State of Connecticut, but this would be the first national park unit in the United States to commemorate an American painter. I am pleased to be joined today in sponsorship of this landmark legislation by the entire Connecticut House delegation. A companion bill has already been introduced in the Senate.

As many of my colleagues know, J. Alden Weir is considered to have been the leader of the American impressionist movement. The Weir farm served as the home and studio to most of the greatest American impressionist painters of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. John Twachtman, Albert Pinkham Ryder, Childe Hassam, and numerous others all came to the Weir Farm to perfect their craft and interpret the beautiful New England landscapes for the world to enjoy. These great artists not only captured the beauty of the land, they provided us with an opportunity to understand the relationship with the land that was so important and they help us to realize a greater appreciation for the beauty of the environment around us.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation was not conceived in a vacuum. Six years ago, the concerns of Sperry and Doris Andrews, the current artists-in-residence of the Weir Farm and the descendants of Mr. Weir, prompted a local campaign to save Weir Farm from development. Subsequently, the Trust for Public Lands, a nonprofit conservancy organization, worked with the families and the local community to purchase as much of the original Weir Farm as they could. At the same time, the Weir Farm Heritage Trust was formed by local residents, local town officials, State legislators, conservationists, and appreciators of art, to raise money for the protection of the farm and to manage it until the National Park Service, with its technical expertise and experience, could become involved. In 1984, the Weir Farm was listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

In addition, under its own initiative, the U.S. Park Service recently conducted a study on the feasibility of making the Weir Farm into a national park, which is expected to be finalized very shortly. And on the State level, the legislature of the State of Connecticut recently voted to bond approximately $4.25 million to purchase the 60 acres available of the original Weir Farm. With the adjacent Weir Preserve owned by the Nature Conservancy, and a protected tract of open space owned by the town of Ridgefield, the protected site now covers close to 175 contiguous acres.

This legislation does not call for the Federal acquisition of the entire farm, but will authorize the appropriation of "not more than $1 million" for the National Park Service to acquire the 2-acre core parcel of Weir Farm land which includes the houses, barns, and studios with their original furnishings.

To our western colleagues, with 1,000 acre national park units in their State, the Weir Farm does not seem like much, but in a small urban State, like Connecticut, this legislation will assist the State of Connecticut, the local community, and others in protecting, managing, and interpreting a unique piece of our Nation's cultural history.

Protection of the Weir Farm, however, is not just the whim of a few art lovers in Connecticut. This project has gained the support of a coalition of more than 20 national conservation and environmental groups, including the National Wildlife Federation, the Sierra Club, the National Audubon Society, the National Association of Parks and Conservation, and many others. In fact, this coalition recently issued a report calling on Congress to fund the acquisition of available land at the Weir Farm.

Mr. Speaker, this action is supported and welcomed by all those involved in the Weir Farm. The State of Connecticut welcomes the expertise and the leadership of the National Park Service and will relinquish its lands to Park Service management. The Nature Conservancy has indicated its willingness to work with the Park Service on a variety of projects and the Weir Farm Heritage Trust has pledged to continue to raise money for the improvement of the farm and will advise the Park Service on interpretation of the site.

Mr. Speaker, with this legislation, we have the opportunity to join in a Federal, State, local, and private partnership with each making a significant contribution toward protecting this important natural and cultural resource. I urge my colleagues to join me and the entire Connecticut congressional delegation in support of this important legislation that has attracted so much local, State, and National support. Acquisition of this small parcel of land will provide an opportunity to protect and preserve an important part of our Nation's cultural heritage.

THE NEED FOR CHILD SAFETY RESTRAINTS ABOARD AIRCRAFT

HON. JIM LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, Senator KIT BOND, of Missouri, and I recently introduced legislation, H.R. 4025, to require the Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] to implement regulations mandating the use of approved child safety restraints for infants and toddlers aboard airline flights.

I would like to take this opportunity to discuss my reasons for introducing this legislation. Following the crash of United Airlines flight 232 in Sioux City, IA, last summer, increased attention was given to the safety of infants and toddlers under age 2 traveling on airline flights. Additionally, the recent crash of Avianca flight No. 52, with a number of injuries among unrestrained children, makes this issue even more important. As you know, children under age 2 can fly free if they ride in a parent's lap.

As a flight instructor and volunteer FAA safety counselor, I am well aware of the dangers involved in air travel. Not only does the potential of a crash pose a danger, but the much more frequent occurrence of in-flight turbulence is a threat as well. When the captain of an airline flight requires his passengers to fasten their seatbelts, why should children under age 2 be unprotected?

In my view, the potential for injury in an aircraft flying at 550 miles per hour is much greater than the potential for injury in an automobile traveling at 50 miles per hour. Since World War II, it has been recognized that passengers and crews of aircraft should be restrained. Even corpses are required to be restrained aboard aircraft. The FAA and most aircraft safety experts recognize the need to provide better protection for traveling infants and toddlers.

On October 30, 1989, 55 Members of Congress joined me in writing to FAA Administrator James Busey requesting the FAA to implement regulations requiring the use of adequate child safety restraints aboard airline flights. While the FAA has recognized the need to revise its policy, I do not believe the steps FAA is taking will be adequate. Therefore, I have introduced legislation, H.R. 4025, requiring the FAA to issue such regulations.

My proposal simply states that an adequate child restraint be required at those times that the captain deems seatbelts to be necessary for adult passengers. Virtually every child safety restraint manufactured for automobile use since 1985—now required in all 50 States—is also approved for aircraft use. Therefore, parents will not have to purchase a new restraint; if they drive to the airport in a car, they can simply bring aboard the plane with them the same child restraint they used to get to the airport. Child safety restraints used in automobiles are currently the best available technology determined by the FAA to protect infants adequately during airline flights. However, my legislation contains enough flexibility for FAA to approve other types of restraints as they become available.

In some circumstances, parents may have to purchase an additional seat when an airline flight is full. However, my proposal does not require parents to purchase an additional seat, nor does it require parents to purchase a new child safety restraint.

Virtually every major U.S. airline now permits the use of vacant seats free of charge for infants under age 2 traveling in child safety restraints. Parents may wish to travel during off-peak hours in order to be assured they can take advantage of the current policy. I also do not believe most families will quit traveling by air once their children reach 2 years of age; most continue to fly and pay for the child's seat as current airline policy requires.

I was pleased to note the Air Transport Association [ATA], representing the major U.S. airlines, has reversed its earlier position, and has now endorsed the idea of mandating child safety restraints for children under age 2 aboard airline flights. I believe this is the appropriate direction to go, and I am pleased to have their support on this issue.

To date, 26 Members of the House of Representatives have joined me in cosponsoring H.R. 4025, and I have requested that the House Public Works and Transportation Subcommittee on Aviation hold hearings on this measure. I welcome the support of my colleagues on this important matter.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH THE WEIR FARM NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE IN THE STATE OF CONNECTICUT

HON. CHRISTOPHER SHAYS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SHAYS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my strong support for legislation introduced today by my colleague from Connecticut, SAM GEJDENSON, to establish the first national park in Connecticut. The park will be dedicated to J. Alden Weir, one of the leading painters in the American impressionist movement.

With their dashes of paint and loose brushwork, Weir and other American impressionist painters beautifully captured the New England landscape. He and his contemporaries recorded Weir Farm through the various seasons. They painted their surroundings—rocks, trees, streams, Weir's house and barn during winter, spring, summer, and fall—with intimacy that showed an almost transcendental appreciation for the landscape and wilderness.

This legislation will provide a $1 million appropriation to purchase a 2-acre parcel of land where Weir lived and painted. The acquisition will include his house, barn and studios, with Weir's original furnishings intact. The State of Connecticut has already voted to provide $4.25 million to purchase 60 acres of the original farm, which will provide Connecticut with some lovely open space.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation which is a wonderful tribute to American impressionism. It also will preserve for our children and our children's children a lovely New England landscape to be enjoyed both for its natural beauty and its artistic heritage.

A TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL CUDDY

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed the closing of a decade in which millions of people who had long suffered from repressive regimes have toppled those regimes in their quest for freedom and democracy. We, who have benefited from the longest lasting constitutional democracy in history, should rejoice in the overthrow of those tyrannical governments and in the recognition by their citizens of the importance of the principles and values of free government we have cherished for so long.

We must wish the people of these nations well in the difficult tasks that lie ahead. And, we must do everything we can to ensure the success of their endeavors to establish governments based upon the principles of constitutional democracy.

At the same time, we must not neglect to pass on to our own youth the understanding of the fundamental principles and values of our democratic institutions that leads to a reasoned commitment to their preservation and improvement. In this regard, I am pleased to commend the efforts of Michael Cuddy, an educational leader in my congressional district, whose dedication to the improvement of the civic education of our students has been exemplary. Michael Cuddy coordinates the We the People—Bicentennial Programs on the Constitution and Bill of Rights, which includes the National Bicentennial Competition, its noncompetitive companion program, Congress and the Constitution, and the National Historical Pictorial Map Contest in my congressional district, the 29th District of New York.

Through the dedicated and voluntary efforts of Michael Cuddy, thousands of upper elementary, middle, and high school students have studied the program's curriculum. This curriculum, incorporated in the We the People text, introduces students to the philosophical ideas of our founders, the historical background of the Philadelphia Convention, and the issues and debates that shaped the writing of our Constitution. Students learn how our Government is organized and how it protects the rights and liberties of all citizens. Finally, and most important, students learn of the responsibilities which accompany the rights of citizenship in a democracy.

It is ironic that while those who have experienced repressive regimes throughout the world are clamoring for the right to vote in free elections, in the United States, only one out of five eligible voters under the age of 30 takes advantage of that very right. With so few young people understanding the purpose and importance of our Constitution, it is clear that we must do all we can to turn the tide of political apathy into a wave of active and informed participation. I am pleased to express my admiration and appreciation to Michael Cuddy for his impressive contributions to the development of competent and responsible citizenship.

Last month, I had the opportunity to address some of the students with whom Michael Cuddy has been working when I was holding office hours in Oswego County. I was impressed with the genuine interest in government which these students at Oswego High School displayed. I attributed their interest to his efforts and to those of their teachers. I was similarly impressed last December when I met with students from Auburn High School, the school where Michael Cuddy teaches, which is in Auburn, NY.

I have worked with Michael Cuddy for several years. He has always been extraordinarily helpful. I know that the programs have benefited from his efforts, as have his students.

THE FISCAL YEAR 1991 EDUCATION BUDGET

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to say that when George Bush said he wanted to be the education President, I believed him.

Since his inauguration, however, I have become bitterly disappointed in his actions, for they fall far short of matching his words.

President Bush reminds me of the man who, when he saw a great crowd of people rushing by, united strongly in the pursuit of some mutual goal, said: "I must hurry and get in front of that crowd so that I might lead them!"

I say to President Bush, if you are not the person who organized the crowd in the first place, and haven't bothered to find out what they are for, its a little late to assume a leadership role.

President Bush has had two chances now to become the education President, by sending two budgets to the Congress since he took office. He has failed the test of leadership for education both times.

Its too late to get in front of the crowd that is clamoring for education funding in order to become their leader. The best thing the President can do now is to at least join the followers.

The leader, indisputably, is the distinguished chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, Mr. HAWKINS, who has proposed a budget that would double education funding in the coming year to $42.4 billion, an increase of $24 billion.

If I had the time, I would give you an item by item explanation of what the $42.4 billion is for—but it is sufficient to say that the new money would go to fund proven successful education programs such as Head Start, Chapter 1, Dropouts and Drugs, enhancing Competitiveness, strengthening higher education, and new initiatives such as the critically needed child care bill, literacy training, and the equalization of per pupil expenditures within states.

When it comes to rhetoric and sloganeering about education funding, we've heard it all.

But if we must have a slogan, our chairman has provided it: "Double or nothing!" Translated, that means if we don't double the education budget, we cease to be a superpower—for a Nation that does not educate its people first cannot hope to remain secure from forces without.

What's at stake here? Everything we are or ever have been; all that we hold sacred and dear. If a Nation is truly judged by other nations on how it treats its children, we are about to fail the test.

Mr. President, if you are not going to lead us out of our educational quagmire, get out of the way so that someone most eminently qualified, the education chairman, can do it for you.

RECOGNITION OF BRAD BEAN, OUT-STANDING YOUNG FARMER OF THE YEAR (1989)

HON. MIKE PARKER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, today I stand in the Halls of Congress, in the people's Chamber, to speak in honor of a great citizen of my district, Brad Bean.

Brad Bean, a native of Amite County, MS, was born on May 27, 1960. He is married to Amy Jones Bean and they have two children, Austin, who is 4 years old, and Tyler, who is 18 months old.

Brad and Amy's farming operation includes a herd of 180 dairy cattle, plus timber and hay sales. The Beans operate their farm on 700 acres. They have one part-time employee and two full-time employees. Brad has been in farming and/or ranching for the past 8 years.

In 1984 Brad became an operating partner with his mother and took over the management and labor of the operation. After visiting dairies in Georgia and Florida, they built a three-bay commodity shed which enables them to buy certain feedstuffs in bulk. In 1986 they installed a computerized feeding system which feeds the cows in stalls in 12-hour periods by computer. The parlor was also expanded to 12 milking units.

In addition to those changes, the Beans completed a commodity shed and purchased a weigher mixer wagon which they use to blend feedstuffs into a total ration to feed their cows. Brad recently designed a commodity shed which will hold bulk loads of commodities. Also, he devised his own wet grain holding facility. These additions have proven to give good results to his operation.

Brad holds a bachelor of science degree in dairy science from Mississippi State University. Brad has been honored with placement in several positions: He is on the young farmer and rancher State committee of Mississippi Farm Bureau Federation; president of Amite County D.H.I.A.; vice president of Dairymen, Inc., Young Dairymen Chapter; and on the board of directors of Amite County Farm Bureau.

Brad has been given several special awards, including Master Dairyman—herd achieved 115 percent of State average for fat per cow; Purina Distinguished Dairyman-Purina Mills; Amite County Top Herd—last 3 years; Amite County Top Cow—last 2 years; and Farm Bureau District 5 discussion meet winner.

To win the Outstanding Young Farmer of the Year Award, Brad had to compete with young farmers from all across Mississippi. He was the winner of district 5. There are seven districts in the Mississippi Farm Bureau Federation. The State winner was decided by an on-farm visit by judges from Mississippi State University and other organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mr. Bean on his noteworthy accomplishments to the farming industry and to the State of Mississippi.

CELEBRATING 25 YEARS OF HEAD START

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, along with several of my colleagues on the Education and Labor Committee, to commemorate the 25th anniversary of Project Head Start.

Project Head Start was launched in 1965 as part of the war on poverty to help ensure that economically disadvantaged 3- to 5-year-olds began school on an equal basis with their more advantaged peers. At the time, Head Start was a pioneer in a unique approach to helping children, emphasizing strong parent involvement and comprehensive service delivery. This approach is reflected in the program's broad set of objectives. These include working to improve children's health; aiding their emotional, social, and motivational development; improving and expanding their ability to think, reason, and speak clearly; and helping both children and their families to gain greater confidence, self-repect, and dignity.

Head Start began in 1965 as a 6- to 8-week summer program serving 561,000 children. Since then, it has grown in size and scope, serving nearly 11 million children. Currently, 451,000 children are enrolled in mostly part-day, part-year programs. It is located in more than 1,200 communities across the country. The program has a committed staff of over 78,000 as well as nearly eight times that number in volunteers.

Today I am inviting you to join me in celebrating 25 years of success. May 18, 1990, marks the 25th anniversary of President Lyndon B. Johnson's signing of the Executive order which began Project Head Start. Our resolution commemorates this day. I invite my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution and help celebrate the 25th anniversary of Project Head Start.

COMMENDATION OF INTERNATIONAL PROFESSIONAL EXCHANGE

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay a special tribute to an outstanding organization located in my district. The International Professional Exchange [IPX] has served the world community for the past 25 years. The exchange has welcomed over 600 human service professionals, from over 100 countries, to the Philadelphia area since 1963.

I take great pleasure in recognizing IPX. This fine organization fosters better global understanding through cross-cultural linkages. IPX has brought over 30 teachers, doctors, lawyers, social workers, and health administrators to the Delaware Valley each year to work with corresponding businesses. The exchange has proven beneficial for both the business and the participant. The business gains a highly qualified and skilled associate, who brings a unique perspective and experience, for a year and enables the participant to gain invaluable experience and knowledge which he or she can bring back to their home country.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite fitting that the International Professional Exchange is celebrating its silver anniversary in a period of great global and cultural change. It is programs such as this which will bring greater global understanding and harmony to the world community.

PARTICIPATORY DEMOCRACY IMPORTANT HERE, TOO

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed the closing of a decade in which millions of people who had long suffered from repressive regimes have toppled those regimes in their quest for freedom and democracy. We should rejoice with the people of these nations and wish them well in the difficult tasks that lie ahead. We must do everything we can to ensure the success of their endeavors to establish governments based upon the principles of constitutional democracy.

At the same time, we must not neglect to pass on to our own youth an understanding of the principles and values on which our constitutional democracy, the longest lasting in history, is based. It is important to inculcate in our youth a reasoned commitment to the preservation and improvement of our democratic institutions. In this regard, I am most pleased to commend the efforts of Ms. Barbara Graves, Ms. Diana Scott, and educational leaders in Maryland's First District, whose dedication to the improvement of the civic education of our students has been exemplary. Barbara coordinated the We the People . . . bicentennial programs on the Constitution and Bill of Rights, which include the National Bicentennial Competition, its noncompetitive companion program, Congress and the Constitution, and the National Historical Pictorial Map Contest. Diana has taken over from Barbara as district coordinator.

A life-long resident of Charles County, Barbara has been active in social studies education on both the State and national level. She was instrumental in obtaining a bicentennial grant for the Prince Georges County school system. Diana teaches social studies to middle school students at Benjamin Stoddert Middle School in Charles County, and she is an up-and-coming leader in the field of social studies education.

Through the dedicated and voluntary efforts of Barbara and Diana, many upper elementary, middle, and high school students have studied the program's curriculum. This curriculum, incorporated in the We the People . . . text, introduces students to the Philadelphia Convention, and the issues and debates that shaped the writing of our Constitution. Students learn how our Government is organized and how it protects the rights and liberties of all citizens. Finally, and most importantly, students learn of the responsibilities which accompany the rights of citizenship in a democracy.

It is ironic that while millions of people living under the yoke of repressive regimes have risked their lives to obtain the right to vote in free elections, in the United States only one of five eligible voters under the age of 30 takes advantage of this privilege. With so few young people understanding the purpose and importance of our Constitution, it is clear that we must do all we can to turn the tide of political apathy into a wave of active and informed participation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my admiration and appreciation to Barbara and Diana for their impressive contributions to the development of competent and responsible citizenship.

THE RELEASE OF NELSON MANDELA

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take the opportunity to express my thrill over the release of black activist Nelson Mandela. Mr. Mandela, after 27 years of imprisonment, was released from prison by the South African white minority government on Sunday, February 11, 1990. As the symbol of the most vocal and prominent black organization in South Africa, Mr. Mandela spent almost three decades of a life sentence leading the fight against South Africa's oppressive apartheid. He has been the beacon of light that has guided the black movement. This movement has been working assiduously to achieve equality with the white minority. Mr. Mandela has finally been released and the black majority is finally gaining the momentum to truly move toward the democracy and equality it so desires and deserves.

President de Klerk has taken extraordinary steps toward this racial equality, yet unfortunately, the apartheid system remains fundamentally intact. The Population Registration Act, classifying South Africans by race, and the Group Areas Act, enforcing the segregation of neighborhoods, are still in place. Also remaining unaltered are the national state of emergency laws. At this critical juncture, where tremendous changes are taking place, further reforms must continue. Apartheid seems to be stumbling, but it is certainly far from dead. Not only is it time to take this movement further by repealing those acts and completely lifting the state of emergency laws, but it is also time to institute the critical reforms which will allow the blacks to participate politically in a truly democratic manner.

Had we lessened sanctions over the course of the past several years, the fight to end apartheid would not have reached this advanced stage. Now is the moment we must seize to bring apartheid to its knees. The black majority must truly begin the final steps toward political equality and toward economic desegregation. This does not mean that the sanctions should be lifted. The international community must continue to pressure the minority government. It is time for the blacks in South Africa to share the same freedoms and opportunities presented in a democratic system.

Mr. Mandela's daughter, Zindzi, in 1985, stated on behalf of her father, "* * * only free men can negotiate." Now, after years of delay, Mr. Mandela may truly act as negotiator. As a free man and as the symbol of the black movement, he will be an integral force in the negotiation process to achieve true democracy, where the majority is fully represented in the government. Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the day when the ultimate goal has been achieved; when we see the last days of apartheid and racial segregation in South Africa is simply a part of the past.

FIRE SALE DISCLOSURE BILL

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, today, I have filed a bill, with Representative LEON PANETTA, which could be titled the Federal Investment Recovery, Economic Security and Liquidation Examination Disclosure Act or for short, the Fire Sale Disclosure Act.

This bill, while very short in length and minimal in its requirements, will shed light on practices of the administration that eliminate from Federal revenues amounts estimated conservatively from $5 to $10 billion and possibly up to $15 billion. The bill requires that the annual budget submitted by the President include a separate section with a statement of revenues projected to be obtained from the sale, lease, and transfer of Government assets and an accompanying statement which details the fair market value of these assets.

We are struggling with budget deficits, budget cuts and gimmicks to enhance Federal revenues without raising taxes. The burden for supporting Government expenditures has shifted to lower and middle income Americans. All the while, we have allowed the administration to sell and lease our natural resources for prices that would put any private company into a chapter 11 bankruptcy. While the Government advocates a business attitude to be employed for some governmental operations, the same rationale does not seem to apply to the sale and lease of Federal assets.

To give a few examples: First, in enhancing uranium for use in commercial ventures, the Federal Government has failed not only to collect backcharges and undercharges of approximately $7 billion but its usual and customary charge does not even cover the full cost of operation; second, below cost timber sales, which permits some commercial, private ventures to compete unfairly with other commercial ventures, loses approximately $400 million per year; third, grazing fees in certain States are set at ridiculously low rates, lower than the actual cost determined by the BLM, while ranchers in nongrazing States cannot take advantage of such low overhead costs and are forced to compete on an unfair basis with federally subsidized commercial ranchers. These operations lose over $150 million per year.

One of the more egregious examples involves the lease of two golf courses by the Bureau of Reclamation in Arizona. These two courses are leased to the city of Scottsdale for 50 years with a 20-year extension option. The leases agreed to by the BLM are for no fees. There are 400 acres which cover the golf courses and an additional 350 acres on which a 20,000 seat amphitheater and a "Horse World" exist. The golf courses have been subcontracted to the Professional Golf Association [PGA] and other subcontractors. These subcontractors pay the city of Scottsdale 10 percent of all green fees, 10 percent of event fees and 2 percent of all other revenues. Nationally televised major golf tournaments are run by the PGA on these golf courses for which significant cash prizes are provided and television revenues are paid. The Federal Government obtains no financial benefit.

Despite the fact that these courses were developed on land meant for water project recreation areas and were to benefit the general public, luxury hotels built on the fringes of these courses are able to control much of the green time available to the general public. Neither the PGA nor the city of Scottsdale has had to invest any money in land costs for the acquisition of these lucrative projects. Lost revenue from this project means that the fund used to purchase additional park lands in the U.S. suffers.

The resources involved in these examples and others include minerals, timber, water, the use of Federal lands and facilities for commercial ventures and the processing of certain minerals by Federal facilities. While there may be justifiable and sound reasons for Federal subsidies, many of the pricing decisions have been made outside these parameters. Application of fair market value, even with allowing justified subsidies, could increase revenues anywhere from $5 to $10 billion. This amount of revenue can be collected while maintaining our natural resources for the benefit and enjoyment of future generations.

I am tired of having to explain to my constituents why programs vital to their health, education, and economic security are attacked in every Federal budget while practices such as those described are allowed to continue unquestioned. We are requiring the administration to provide the basic information in the annual budget so that decisions on the sale and lease of our natural resources can be made in an informed manner. The American public deserves to know how and why it is being shortchanged by the administration.

ADVANCED RURAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1990

HON. ROBERT E. WISE, JR.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to invite my colleagues to join me in the introduction of H.R. 4068, the Advanced Rural Telecommunications and Economic Development Act of 1990. My legislation should be of particular interest to those Members from lesser developed or rural areas in our country. Recent years have been a time of rapid technological development in the telecommunications industry. Urban businesses and consumers have come to take for granted such minor miracles as fax machines, personal computers, and computerized databases.

But for some rural Americans, even single-line telephone service is still not yet a reality. Because of the comparative expense of bringing new telecommunications services to sparsely populated areas, there is a danger that it will be many years before the entire country will fully enjoy the technological advances of recent times.

As a nation, we can't afford to let the information age pass rural America by. Small-town America is striving to recover from a period of economic decline. The rural economy has shifted away from its traditional mainstays—agriculture, mining, and manufacturing—and turned instead to service industries. Deregulation of the transportation industry has made travel and transport less available and more costly. As a result, residents are leaving the less populous regions of America to make their fortunes in our increasingly congested and polluted metropolitan areas.

Information age technology is a major key to reversing this trend. Modern telecommunications can help replace the buses, trucks, and trains that pass the small towns by. It can allow businesses such as mail order companies and airline reservation services to locate in rural areas. And it can make sophisticated educational and medical services available throughout the countryside.

My bill would assist rural America in tapping the potential of telecommunications to help revitalize our Nation's countryside. The legislation would make grants available to rural school systems to establish distance learning programs. Under these programs students and instructors can see and hear other program participants in one or more distant locations and be seen and heard by the participants as well. With distance learning capabilities, rural school systems can get far more benefit out of their limited educational dollars.

The bill would make loan guarantees available to rural hospitals and other rural health care providers to enable them to take advantage of telecommunications technologies, computer networks and related advanced technologies to improve medical diagnosis and treatment. The bill would also expand the provisions of section 310B of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act to permit businesses and entrepreneurs in rural areas to obtain Federal loans to fund facilities for shared telecommunications equipment and computer hardware and software.

Under the legislation, States would be able to establish rural telecommunications zones—rural areas with advanced telecommunications capabilities. Federal agencies would be required to consider moving to a rural telecommunications zone whenever they contemplated relocating their data processing or other telecommunications-intensive activities. Finally, the bill would make funds available for the creation of street addresses in rural areas that are unable to have emergency 911 service because of the lack of such addresses.

The Advanced Rural Telecommunications and Economic Development Act of 1990 would help the rural areas of country overcome the economic obstacles they face. And that is good not just for rural America but for the entire Nation.

THE LEADERSHIP OF ROSS W. KIRBY

HON. ED JENKINS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, when some people die, we cannot let their passing go unnoticed because of their distinguished qualities and contributions. Ross William Kirby of Snellville, GA, was one of those special people.

Ross Kirby was a doer and a giver of his time and his money, right down to the last. A couple of months before his death, he was inducted into the Endowed Century Club of Young Harris College, recognition for the money and time he had contributed to his alma mater where he had financed his own education during the Depression by working at a local store.

Born in the northeast Georgia mountains in Hiawassee and growing up in Young Harris, he carried the code of the mountains with him, always finding time to help others. His community service ranged from serving 4 years on the Snellville City Council, on the Unemployment and Training Board of Gwinnett County, on the Gwinnett Senior Citizens Board, and the Georgia Council on Aging to contributing his own time to represent people before administrative law judges after their Social Security disability claims had been denied. Of the 52 he represented, only 2 lost their cases. When he died, he was on the Downtown Development Authority of Snellville. Last February, he was recognized for his community service with the "Oustanding Citizen of Snellville" award from the local newspaper.

Ross Kirby also was a worker for his church. He was director of the Senior Adult Sunday School at Snellville First Baptist Church for 15 years, chairman of the Board of Deacons twice, chairman of the Building Committee, chairman of the Benevolence Committee for many years, and at the time of his death, he still served on the Board of Deacons and the Church Growth Council.

His desire for his own education fostered a lifetime interest in education for others first as a teacher for 4 years and through the PTA on the local and State levels. He was awarded a lifetime membership in Georgia's PTA for his contributions to that organization. And he never forgot to promote the school which gave him a chance, Young Harris College, serving on the Alumni Association Board of Directors and through other contributions of his time and money.

Following his retirement in 1972 as a supervisor after more than 30 years in the U.S. Postal Service, he had served as president of Retired Federal Employees.

Ross Kirby was a good example. He gave back to society where he felt he owed for his own success, and he gave to society enriching his own community and State with selfless service far beyond what he had taken. Although he died October 24 at the age of 74, his deeds and influence will live long after him. He was a good citizen and a good person.

I was proud to be his friend in life and proud to have known him and benefited from his wise counsel.

SUPPORT RECONCILIATION IN NICARAGUA

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, the February 25 election in Nicaragua—pronounced as free and fair by the more than 3,000 international observers—has validated the position that an internal political solution, rather than war, was the answer in Nicaragua. It was the influence of Costa Rican President Oscar Arias and the other Central American Presidents who brought the appropriate mix of diplomatic pressure and regional cooperation to bear on the Nicaraguan Government. It was that pressure, not the Contras, that made this election possible.

We commend the winner, Violeta Chamorro, for her impressive victory and wish her good luck as she grapples with the enormous task of rebuilding Nicaragua's economy. But we also commend President Daniel Ortega, and the Supreme Electoral Commission, for conducting a truly democratic election under the specter of war. President Ortega accepted the results of the election in a statement reflective of the hopes of Nicaraguans—and Latin and Northern Americans alike—for peace and reconciliation in Nicaragua.

We hope that the example that Nicaraguans on both sides of this campaign have set for settling their differences peacefully and democratically will bode well for El Salvador. The United States has premised our massive military aid to El Salvador on the claim that Nicaragua was arming the FMLN. It is safe to say that Mrs. Chamorro's government will not be aiding the Salvadoran guerrillas, and we would hope therefore that we can take steps to redirect our aid, as we did in Nicaragua, away from war, and toward supporting a peaceful settlement. If ever there was a time ripe for agreement in that tragic country, it is now. Let Nicaragua serve as a model.

The process of reconciliation in Nicaragua will be a slow one, and one fraught with confrontation. The size and makeup of the Nicaraguan military will certainly be prominent among those problems. But these are problems for Nicaraguans to solve. Hopefully, the administration and this Congress will choose to play the role of facilitator, and will recognize the important role that the Sandinistas will continue to play in Nicaraguan society.

EDUCATION IN THIS NATION HAS TAKEN A DISMAL PATH

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, just 2 days ago I read that Jaime Escalante, the Los Angeles teacher who gained national attention for his success in teaching college-level calculus to urban high school students is threatening to quit his job. He blames parents who "don't see education as the way to succeed in this country". He says he has received letters from parents whose children wanted to drop out of advanced math classes in favor of sports.

This story of a dedicated teacher who becomes disillusioned and decides to quit is heard all to often. Unlike Mr. Escalante, I do not blame parents for the education problems this Nation is experiencing. It is a combination of many factors. Many parents do not have the involvement in their child's education that they would like to have due to the demands of their jobs. The computer age has overtaken us and many are not ready. Today America is outranked in math and science education. Illiteracy is on the rise. What can we say about an educational system that produces graduates that can't read or fill out a basic job application? Drugs and crime have taken over our schools. Some of our young people ask why they should waste time in class when they can make more money in 1 week dealing in drugs than their parents do in a month. The teaching profession is still one of the lowest paid. How do we expect to get and keep good teachers when they can make more money elsewhere? Textbooks and technology are frequently outdated. Are we trying to teach in a starship age with dinosaur methods?

President Bush says he wants to be the education President. I am waiting to see if this is true. If he is serious, let us see the Federal funding for programs to educate those who have been left to fend for themselves for the last decade by Mr. Bush's former boss. We must also give the teaching profession the recognition it deserves. Let us see, Mr. President, if together we can bring our educational system back to where we can be proud of our schools again.

Education in this Nation has taken a dismal path. Let us point it in the right direction once again and lead our scholars down the path for success.

TRIBUTE TO NEW MEXICO CONGRESS OF PARENTS AND TEACHERS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this spring, the New Mexico Congress of Parents and Teachers will celebrate its 75th anniversary. The PTA in New Mexico was organized in May of 1915, just a few years after New Mexico was granted statehood.

For 75 years, this outstanding group, made up of caring parents and teachers, has provided a much needed helping hand in improving the health, education and welfare of our children. The children raised in New Mexico are smarter, kinder, and healthier today because of the exceptional service and leadership provided by the thousands of men and women who have served and who are serving in the New Mexico Congress of Parents and Teachers.

During this, the group's 75th year, I ask that my colleagues in the Congress recognize the New Mexico Congress of Parents and Teachers and take note of the group's achievements. I am enclosing for my colleagues' review a list of milestones reached by the New Mexico Congress of Parents and Teachers during the past 75 years.

MILESTONES IN THE NMCPT 1915-90

1915-1917—May 7, 1915—Organization meeting. Firm foundation established. Dues 10 cents state and national. "Need for more enlightened treatment of the problem of child delinquency and of raising children to make better citizens" was stressed.

1917-1923—Furnished warm lunches for school children, weighing children and assisting with physical examinations, visiting homes and adding to libraries.

1925—National president presented first leadership training workshop at state convention. First County Council organized in Dona Ana County. Rosewell had the only City Council in the state.

1926—Published first state bulletin. Established state office in Chavez County courthouse.

1927—State convention in Raton with theme "In essentials, unity; in nonessentials, liberty; in all things, charity."

1930—Goals were to have an informed membership, have an informed leadership, encourage interesting educators and increase student loan fund.

1932—State divided into 7 districts.

1933—Convention resolution denounced reduction in school budgets and urged US Congress to make an emergency appropriation of monies available. Governor Hockenhull proclaimed the first PTA week in the state's history.

1934—Resolution endorsing enactment of Federal Food and Drug bill.

1935—Worked successfully to pass legislation requiring a driver's license and legislation for a sales tax to support the schools.

1937—Resolution recommending adequate monies for inoculations against diptheria and other health needs.

1938—New Mexico Congress served as cohost at the 42nd National Convention in Salt Lake City.

1939—Recommended materials be published in Spanish as well as English.

1940—Asked cooperation with the State Dept. of Public Health in registering all births and issuing birth certificates.

1941—Many hot lunch projects sponsored by local units.

1944—Resolution urging annual health examinations for students in public schools.

1946—Resolution urging legislation to provide additional teachers for handicapped children.

1947—Sponsored enabling legislation for the school lunch program which passed both state houses.

1949—Resolution supporting adequate teachers' salaries.

1952—Sponsored dental clinics.

1953—Resolution reaffirming belief in the ideals of the United Nations. Safety Program of traffic lights or speed control regulations around schools put into effect.

1955—Resolution urging public school authorities to integrate Indian children into New Mexico schools and urging eating establishments, hotels, motels and theaters in implementing principles of desegregation.

1957—Intensive campaign to inform the public on legislation that would allow for an elected State Board of Education which passed in 1958 after many years of hard work by NMCPT.

1959—Bernalillo County Council receives national acclaim on their Clothing Bank project.

1961—Resolution supporting legislation to arrive at a permanent solution to the financial problems of the schools.

1963—Resolutions urging traffic safety enforcement in school zones and requesting funds for guidance and counseling in the schools.

1964—Resolution encouraging the establishment of kindergartens in New Mexico public schools.

1965 & 1983—National PTA Convention held in Albuquerque.

1967-69—Elizabeth Hendryson (former State President 1952) of Albuquerque serves as National PTA president.

1970—Resolutions encouraging enforcement of air pollution standards and supporting a funding program for equal education opportunities.

1972-1978—Resolutions passed concerning violence on TV and supporting the teaching of music and art in schools.

1984—Resolutions passed in support of a Safety Public Awareness Week.

1985—Supported Adopt-A-School concept.

1987—Resolutions on safety for school age child care and requesting help on personal liability for volunteers.

1988—Resolutions on background checks for school and day care personnel, supporting the Volunteer Protection Act, and legislative funding for education.

1989—Resolution on testing and removal of lead in school water and testing for radon gas levels.

TRIUMPH OF DEMOCRACY

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the manner in which the election process took place on Sunday in Nicaragua, and with the results of that election.

This election was one of the most closely monitored in history. Clearly, the Nicaraguan people have spoken, free of fear from intimidation, and confident that Nicaragua's future—like that of so many other nations around the world—will now be marked by freedom and democracy.

President-elect Chamorro has a difficult task ahead. Nicaragua has paid a heavy price on its march to freedom. I know the United States will stand with the Nicaraguan people as they begin to rebuild their country in the months ahead.

It is vitally important that President Ortega do all that he can to ensure a peaceful transfer of power in April. His remarks yesterday make for a good beginning. But he must do more. He must use his influence within his party to ensure that President-elect Chamorro receives the cooperation and support she needs to effectively govern.

I think a healthy measure of credit should be given to President Reagan and President Bush for staying the course, often in the face of much criticism. There is no doubt in my mind that without the United States strong support for freedom in Nicaragua, we would not now be hailing the triumph of democracy there.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1990

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, today, my colleague Mr. GOODLING and I are introducing a joint resolution commemorating 25 years of Federal aid to elementary and secondary schools.

On April 11, 1965, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act [ESEA] was signed into law. This landmark legislation provided the authority for Federal assistance to educate disadvantaged, handicapped, and other special populations children and illiterate adults, to improve libraries, to strengthen State educational agencies, and to expand educational research. Twenty-five years later, these programs continue to be the foundation of Federal elementary and secondary education programs.

Since ESEA was enacted, we have seen that Federal aid has had an impact on the education of our children. The chapter 1 program has assisted in improving the reading scores of low achieving children, as measured by the National Assessment of Educational Progress. Today, handicapped children are guaranteed access to a free and appropriate public education. Our libraries are strong, our educational research is more extensive, and the State educational agencies have matured. While we should celebrate such achievements, there is still much work to be done.

The resolution we are introducing today, calls for a renewed, sustained commitment to Federal aid for elementary and secondary education, including annual funding increases of $500 million above inflation for the chapter 1 compensatory education program. With this sort of a commitment from the Congress and the President, the Federal role in education will continue to be a positive force in the schools across America.

Finally, the resolution calls on the Nation to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. While Mr. GOODLING and I are working with the Senate to plan events in Washington to celebrate this very important anniversary, we are also working with the education community to ensure that the majority of the commemoration activities take place in schools and local communities across the United States.

We urge our colleagues to cosponsor this resolution, thereby joining us in commemorating this anniversary and recommitting the national government to making education the number one priority.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, February 28, 1990

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

As our minds are filled in these days with thoughts of freedom and new liberties from many people, our prayers, O God, are with those who do not share in these same blessings. We recall the hostages and all those held alone who are denied the basic freedoms that are our heritage. May Your good spirit, gracious God, that transcends every human separation, touch the lives of every hostage with the hope and comfort that You alone can give. May the faith and strength that You freely give to all be with them and their families and may Your benediction remain with them always. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COMBEST] please come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. COMBEST led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 3729, NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION MULTIYEAR AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3729) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, and research and program management, and for other purposes; with a Senate amendment, thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees, and without objection, the Chair reserves the right to appoint additional conferees: Messrs. ROE, NELSON of Florida, VALENTINE, and BROWN of California, Mrs. LLOYD, and Messrs. GLICKMAN, VOLKMER, MINETA, TORRICELLI, NAGLE, WALKER, SENSENBRENNER, LEWIS of Florida, BUECHNER, PACKARD, SLAUGHTER of Virginia, and ROHRABACHER.

There was no objection.

ZEBRA MUSSELS

(Ms. KAPTUR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, the colorful, striped European zebra mussel now proliferating in the Great Lakes poses very serious consequences for northwest Ohio, the Great Lakes, and our entire inland waterway system. The mussel was first discovered in 1988 in Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair, and was apparently introduced into Lake St. Clair in 1985 through the dumping of ballast water into the lake from international cargo ships.

Since 1985, this mussel has spread rapidly. Some areas of western Lake Erie now contain over 30,000 mussels per square meter. In September of last year, 3 cubic yards of mussels, for example, were removed daily from the water intake of one of our major powerplants. Mussel shells now literally litter the shores of Maumee Bay. The mussels are expected to spread to every lake and stream in the United States in the next 5 years, and in fact, will endanger our entire fish population base, and the small plankton that the fish feed on. However, the administration and the EPA have told Members there is no money for research in this real threat to our Great Lakes and freshwater systems.

The rapid growth and expansion of the zebra mussel population in my region has a potential for creating environmental and ecological problems of proportions equivalent to those experienced in the Great Lakes with the introduction of the sea lamprey and alewife.

I urge colleagues to support zebra mussel research, and the Bush administration to come on board and put more than rhetoric behind its words on the environment.

COMMEND BUSH ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. PAXON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Bush administration for agreeing to my request to save the MBA Program taught by the University of Buffalo in China. The education of 83 young Chinese men and women has now been ensured. In addition, future classes will be educated as a result of the administration's decision to seek out other funding avenues in the years to come.

For 2 weeks now, western New Yorkers have spoken out strongly for this important education program, and for good reason. These Chinese students literally risk their lives to attend the classes at the University of Buffalo, held in China. This program is helping to build the future free market leaders of this nation. I am proud that they will be standing and continue to stand with these courageous men and women.

ENVIRONMENT ACTION NEEDED FROM PRESIDENT

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, the President's environmental policies, like many of his other policies, are put forth with strong words but terribly weak actions. We have a President that speaks about elevating the Environmental Protection Agency to a Cabinet-level position. While the President speaks, Mr. Sununu and others work to undermine our environmental policies.

In the clean air bill, working at times even to make the law weaker than it is today.

Mr. President, you desire to be the education President, you desire to be the child care President, you desire to be the environment President. Well, like the emperor without clothes, this President needs to put actions behind his words. We truly do need to address the environment of our country. In my State we already have seven lakes affected by acid rain. We need a leader in the White House on the environment. The President has tried to fight to get one more tax cut for the richest Americans. Spend a little bit of your time trying to save the environment instead of trying to save all that money for the wealthiest people in this country.

MANDATED PARENTAL LEAVE OPPOSED

(Mr. HANCOCK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the small business community is overwhelmingly opposed to mandated parental leave. The 1986 White House Conference on Small Business voted in opposition to Government-mandated benefits, such as parental leave, their No. 2 priority. It was parental leave that brought the issue of mandated benefits into focus for the 1,175 small business owner delegates who attended the conference. Likewise, the results of the National Foundation of Independent Businesses April 1989 poll of 550,000 small businessowners nationwide showed that 84 percent opposed Government-mandated parental and medical leaves.

Small businessowners fear that this minimum labor standard would open the floodgates to an increasing number of attempts to force business to pay for every benefit arbitrarily deemed desirable by various elements in the national workforce. I urge my colleagues to oppose mandated parental leave.

DO NOT WEAKEN CLEAN AIR BILL

(Mr. SKAGGS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SKAGGS. Mr. Speaker, when the President announced his clean air plan last year, I was encouraged that he had taken an important first step. But ever since taking that momentous step, the President has been inching backward. And now that we are down to the wire, the President is scrambling away from his promises and his responsibility to clean up the air that all Americans must breath to survive.

In an unfortunate turn of events, the administration is now working behind closed doors to strangle some of the most important provisions in the Senate's clean air bill. If the administration succeeds in this effort, we all lose in the long run.

It remains a great puzzle and perplexity that we hear so much from the administration about the cost of compliance and so little about the cost of disease.

The hand that chokes this bill also strangles tomorrow's children. Our children. Our future. I urge the President to stop trying to weaken the clean air bill. I ask him to work with us to pass a tough clean air bill this year.

REINTRODUCING H.R. 3723

(Mr. BARTON of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to alert my colleagues who have rural electric cooperatives in their districts of an ongoing problem. The REA and the Federal financing bank have once again failed to sign their annual loan commitment agreement. The absence of such an agreement has had a severe effect on generation and transmission cooperatives across the country. The agreement details the fiduciary responsibilities the REA has with the FFB, which is an arm of the U.S. Treasury.

In July of 1987, I worked diligently with rural cooperatives in my district to get this agreement signed. After 2 months, and a personal meeting with the Secretary of Agriculture, the agreement was signed, 11 months late.

This year the FFB has again demonstrated its lack of cooperation. This year's agreement, now 5 months overdue, is setting the stage for serious repercussions for cooperatives in Texas, Alabama, Nebraska, Ohio, and Florida.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in cosponsoring legislation to solve this ongoing problem. I plan to reintroduce H.R. 3723, a measure I introduced in the 100th Congress. This commonsense piece of legislation simply keeps the previous year's agreement in force until a new one is signed. I ask the Members to please help me solve this ongoing problem by joining as a cosponsor.

A FIRSTHAND REPORT ON THE EMERGENCE OF DEMOCRACY IN EUROPE

(Mr. SARPALIUS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, at the turn of the century my ancestors left the country of Lithuania and came to this country seeking freedom—freedom and new opportunities. I was very fortunate these past few days to have the opportunity to go back to the country of Lithuania.

After spending 5 days in a hotel in Berlin, along with three of my colleagues, waiting for a chance to go there and watch the results of the first elections ever held with the Communist Party, elections by two parties—one the Communist Party and the other one, the Sajudis Party—seeking democracy and freedom, I felt such a thrill to stand there in Berlin and watch them slowly chip the wall down, the Berlin Wall which has been such a symbol.

I brought with me a piece of that wall which for many years symbolized what the Communist Party stood for. We were able to see in Lithuania its first fall and the first free elections of that party.

We also saw a church that was once a Catholic Church and then slowly turned into a church for atheism. That church has now come back to be a church for God.

Mr. Speaker, this was certainly a privilege and an opportunity for me, and I encourage my colleagues to do whatever they can to support democracy.

RECOGNIZING THE TEXAS TECH CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF ADDICTION

(Mr. COMBEST asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COMBEST. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues and to the Nation, an innovative one-of-a-kind Center for the Study of Addiction at Texas Tech University located in my congressional district.

This unique state of the art learning facility has undertaken one of the most serious problems facing our society, the war on drugs.

The center, which began informally in 1986, is headed by Dr. Carl Anderson whose keen leadership abilities and tremendous understanding of substance abuse has been indispensible. Working with Dr. Anderson is a host of devoted volunteers, whose selfless dedication helps promote the addiction center and assist students in recovering from substance abuse.

The center offers a powerful program for recovering abusers through a rigid academic curriculum and counseling initiatives. The center also recognizes that many substance abusers have burned their financial bridges, so it offers a limited number of scholarships to encourage recovering addicts to return to college. Another interesting concept is that recovering members are encouraged to give something back to the cause, by qualifying for certification as alcohol and drug abuse counselors. These ideas are all translating into a tremendous success. I am very proud to recognize the center and their great work.

A BUSH LEAGUE PERFORMANCE BY THE WHITE HOUSE ON THE ENVIRONMENT

(Mr. OWENS of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to suggest that President Bush recall his reputation as a former college baseball player. Since we put him on the mound, his delivery and followthrough on promises to protect our environment have left the bases loaded and he is hoping for an acid rainout.

When the President pitched for clean air we got a knuckleball.

Then his manager, Mr. Sununu, told the President to balk on his own call for no net loss of wetlands.

The President then threw a curve on global warming which was far wide of the plate.

That is three balls, no strikes for the President, and we are still in the early innings. Maybe he should put some Valdez crude on the ball.

Mr. Speaker, somewhere in this favored land,
The sun is shining bright,
The band is playing somewhere,
Somewhere hearts are light,
But there is no joy in Washington,
Because our President prefers to play on artificial turf.

THE RECORD OF THE WHITE HOUSE ON THE ENVIRONMENT

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it is important to talk about the environment. In any bureaucracy there are always disputes. We hear about the disputes between the White House Chief of Staff, Mr. Sununu, and Mr. Bill Reilly. Always it seems there is conflict.

President Bush has stated that he is the environmental President. On the wetlands issue the White House Chief of Staff has weakened the President's position. On the alternative fuels issue and on clean air the White House Chief of Staff has weakened the President's position. On many other environmental issues, global warming and the entire acid rain matter, we have seen a weakening by the White House Chief of Staff.

The question is: Who is the President? Who is the environmental leader in this administration? Is it William Reilly, is it John Sununu, or is it President George Bush?

Mr. Speaker, President Bush has good instincts on the environment. The rhetoric is good, and in some cases he has a fine record, but this record is being decimated by bureaucratic wrangling, and it is time that he stepped in and stood up for the environment.

Mr. Speaker, in recent days, John Sununu, the White House Chief of Staff, has been in the news on a daily basis. The media has not been extolling his virtuous environmental record. On the contrary, it is blasting his meddling in, and some would say derailment of the President's environmental program.

In fact, Mr. Sununu is getting so much media attention that I am beginning to wonder just who's running the show? The President or Mr. Sununu?

For instance, the press reported on a battle between Mr. Sununu and Mr. William Reilly, EPA Administrator, on global warming in which Mr. Sununu moderated the President's speech by urging "continued research" rather than "using the White House effect to deal with the greenhouse effect."

Since we know where Mr. Sununu stands on global warming and we know where Mr. Reilly stands on global warming, the question has to be asked, to borrow a phrase from my good friend, Senator KENNEDY, where was George?

Mr. Sununu has also made the news by weakening a wetlands agreement on behalf of the oil industry, despite the President's pledge to allow "no net wetlands loss."

Again, we have to ask, where was George?

In announcing his Clean Air Act, the President stated, "We propose bold new initiatives to reconcile the automobile to the environment. * * * We'll accomplish this through alternative fuels and clean-fueled vehicles."

Yet, when the Health and Environment Subcommittee acted on the President's Clean Air Act, Mr. Sununu is quoted as saying the President did not object to an amendment weakening the Clean Fuel Program. At the same time, Mr. Reilly was quoted as saying the President opposed the same amendment.

The American people want to know, "Where was George?"

OPPOSE FEDERAL MANDATES

(Mr. BALLENGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, it is an election year and some in Congress are searching for yet another special mandated benefit to give to the American workers. This time, its the Family and Medical Leave Act.

Few will argue with the legislation's intent. If a business can afford to offer flexible benefits to its employees, it should. But, as a former small businessman, I can tell you that any type of leave policy must be tailored to the individual company involved—not mandated by Congress.

I am particularly concerned about provisions in the bill that require an employer to hold open a job for the employee on leave and restore the employee to the same position upon completion of leave. This creates special problems for many small businesses because the employee is not required to notify the employer of his or her intentions to return to work.

Most employers want to do what they can to help their employees. Periodically reporting back to the employer is only fair and this can be accomplished with a simple phone call or letter during the time of leave. Yet the bill fails to address this very real problem.

Employee needs differ from one business to another. Mandating one particular benefit limits the ability of employers to offer benefits that appeal to their workers. Mandating family and medical leave forces employers to offer one benefit at the expense of another.

The issue is not the leave which is a good policy to pursue, the issue remains the appropriate role for government.

The Family and Medical Leave Act will hamper the growth and productivity of the very businesses that we rely upon to create the jobs that make this country tick. Think twice before agreeing to mandate legislation that will destroy job creation.

THE NEED FOR LEGISLATION TO ELIMINATE TOXIC POLLUTANTS

(Mr. LAUGHLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, like most Americans, I am deeply concerned about the effect toxic pollutants have on our air and water supplies. Being environmentally health conscious is not enough. We have a great responsibility to the American people to take appropriate steps to address their concerns about the environment.

It is obvious that our well-being and that of future generations is inseparable from the quality of our environment. That is why it is imperative that Congress enact legislation that will prudently eliminate toxic waste pollutants from the air and water. I believe that we can accomplish this by working with industry to achieve our goals for a healthier environment.

As Congress moves forward on the issue of the environment, let us seek to establish a policy that is responsive to our health concerns and is economically feasible.

MARIA DUDEK SAYS IVAN MARCZENKO IS REALLY IVAN THE TERRIBLE

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, CBS's crew of "Sixty Minutes" flew to Poland. They heard of a woman who said she had known of Ivan the Terrible. Maria Dudek, 70 years old, told Ed Bradley off camera that she knew Ivan well. He would take gold from the Jewish prisoners and come to town. He would buy vodka from her husband and pay for the right and privilege to sleep with her.

Also, Mr. Speaker, Maria Dudek said she knew this man by his real family's name, Ivan Marczenko.

Ivan Marczenko's name is listed under the Polish War Crimes Committee as being a known Ukrainian guard at Treblinka. John Demjanjuk, convicted of this crime; his name appears on no list anywhere in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Justice Department should come clean on this case. We must track down Nazi war criminals and put them to death, but we do not blindfold the Statue of Liberty and shred the Constitution to do it.

I want to know who Ivan the Terrible really is, and Congress should want to know beyond a reasonable doubt, and in this case there is not even any reason now. Look at the RECORD tomorrow.

PROVIDING ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS OF RAPE, INCEST, AND SPOUSE ABUSE

(Mr. LIGHTFOOT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which I believe will enhance our abilities to perform our jobs as public servants. Currently, under House rules, a Member of Congress cannot include in a franked, mass mailing the phone numbers of organizations that provide assistance to rape, incest, and spouse abuse victims unless the phone number belongs to a Federal agency. Apparently, the reasoning behind this rule is that State and local officials should be the ones to provide information on State and local agencies that provide such assistance. In my opinion, this ruling is misguided and unnecessary. In sending out mass mailings, we have a perfect opportunity to provide the unfortunate victims of sexual and spousal abuse with the information they need to begin to heal the wounds of their trauma. Whether they get this information from a Federal, State, or local official is immaterial. All that really matters is that they do get it. For this institution to put up an obstacle to the flow of this information is ludicrous at best and at worst, could prolong the suffering and misery of an innocent victim. My legislation states simply that a Member of Congress may include in franked, mass mailings the phone numbers of State, local and nonprofit private agencies that provide information and assistance to the victims of rape, incest, and spouse abuse. I urge all of my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation which has the potential to make a real difference in the lives of our constituents.

CELEBRATING NELSON MANDELA'S RELEASE

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to celebrate the release of South African civil rights leader Nelson Mandela from his 27 years of imprisonment.

Mr. Speaker, the winds of democracy and social change are sweeping across Eastern Europe, across Central America, across South Africa, and, Mr. Speaker, across the entire globe. These are indeed remarkable times in which to live and legislate.

I hope Mr. Mandela's release, and the courage of President F.W. de Klerk of South Africa in ordering that release, will provide both the impetus and the framework for ending apartheid, that shameful and most grievous and malevolent system of government which sanctions discrimination based on a person's skin color.

While Mr. Mandela's release from prison, the reinstatement of the African National Congress as a legitimate and recognized political institution, and the upcoming discussions between Pretoria and the ANC represent a sea change for South Africa, the sanctions currently applied to that nation should remain largely in place until all its citizens have freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I hope Mr. Mandela and Mr. de Klerk will be invited to separate sessions of this Congress to explain to us and to the world these remarkable and welcome events of recent days.

THE CONTRAS MUST REMAIN A FORCE TO ENSURE TRANSITION OF POWER IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced with my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON], a resolution which congratulates both Mrs. Chamorro and Daniel Ortega for the way in which they have handled the election which took place on Sunday.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am very concerned about some of the developments which have taken place in the last 24 hours. Both Mrs. Chamorro and Daniel Ortega have called for the Contras to turn in their arms and immediately assimilate back into Nicaraguan society. That clearly is a goal which I have. In fact, it is mentioned in the resolution which we introduced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very important for us to remember that in July of 1979 Daniel Ortega promised free and fair elections, an end to human rights violations, a nonaligned foreign policy and political pluralism. On December 13, 1987, Daniel Ortega said,

> If we hold an election in Nicaragua, and by chance the Sandinistas lose, we will give up the government, but we will never give up power.

Mr. Speaker, we know that in the Sapoa agreement, Esquipulas II and Tela agreement, Ortega said that he was not providing an influx of Soviet bloc weapons into El Salvador, and then we of course saw that plane crash with 24 SAM-7's on board.

Last night Mr. Ortega told colleagues in the Sandinista Party that he planned to "continue to govern the country from below" and implied that he might not turn over power of the military to the newly elected government.

I support the demobilization of the Contras; as long as the Nicaraguan military is turned over to new government. We all know how important control of the military is in Latin America. Should Mr. Ortega seek to ignore the will of the Nicaraguan people, the Contras will serve to keep the pressure on his regime. I do, however, certainly hope that this is unnecessary and that Ortega will support the decision that 54.2 percent of the Nicaraguan people made this past weekend.

In the meantime, let's make sure that Mrs. Chamorro becomes not only President, but Commander in Chief of the Nicaraguan Army.

NATIONAL SHERIFF'S WEEK

(Mr. ORTIZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ORTZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a House Joint Resolution declaring June 24 through June 30, 1990, as "National Sheriffs' Week."

During this week, the National Sheriffs' Association will commemorate 50 years of service at their national conference in Denver, CO.

Sheriffs represent the chief law enforcement officer in the county.

As a former sheriff, I remember the difficulties that are faced on the front line.

This legislation will honor the efforts of current sheriffs as well as those who have proudly pinned on the star in the past.

It will honor all of the sheriffs and deputies who have died in the service of others.

The National Sheriffs' Association has continued to perpetuate the ideals of an efficient organization of the Sheriffs of the United States, striving to raise the level of professionalism for the office of sheriff and their deputies.

The National Sheriffs' Association also continues to bring about and preserve legislative harmony on the Federal and State level by being cognizant of the needs of the enforcement officials and the safety of the public.

I hope my colleagues will join me in honoring our Nation's sheriffs for their outstanding efforts to preserve peace and insure domestic tranquility.

A GREAT VOTE FOR FREEDOM IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. LEHMAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, last night I returned from Nicaragua. I was in the northern mountain municipality of Telepenaca near the Honduran border. All day long I saw people walk miles to vote. Some were barefoot, some were crippled, some were pregnant. They stood in long lines, often for an hour or more. They were desperately poor. To vote, they knelt down on the bare cement behind a cardboard facade and marked their secret ballots one at a time. They folded them and walked over to the ballot box where they purposely inserted them. It was so still, you were conscious of the sound your feet made.

The next person in line looked on intently to see how his predecessor did it. I have never experienced a scene so moving.

The children watched outside and were well behaved. Voting was a strange new curiosity. Children watched their parents render their opinions, which would count just as much as the opinions of anyone else in the country, rich or poor.

Who won was minuscule compared with that.

THE EUROPEANIZATION ISSUE

(Mr. KYL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, the proponents of H.R. 770, the so-called mandated parental leave legislation, tell us that we must enact this legislation because every other industrialized nation in the world has done so.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is precisely a reason not to. Our Nation is the most compassionate on Earth, but we oppose rigid mandates because we value free enterprise—among other things, because it creates jobs.

In fact, while Western European countries have gone far down the road of mandating benefits, those countries have not created any new jobs since 1975, and are facing very high unemployment levels. America's small businesses, less hampered by the costly nonwage benefits, created 1,000,000 new jobs this decade even including the recession years 1980–83. Clearly, if we "Europeanize" employee benefits in the United States, we will also Europeanize away job growth. The first and foremost need of the American labor force is jobs.

Mr. Speaker. I ask my colleagues to vote for jobs by opposing H.R. 770, the mandated parental leave bill.

LEADERS OF PUERTO RICO'S POLITICAL PARTIES INVITED TO HEARINGS

(Mr. DE LUGO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, the leaders of Puerto Rico's three political parties have asked Congress to authorize a referendum between improving the current commonwealth and granting statehood or independence and commit to implementing the results.

President Bush, who supports statehood, endorsed their request before a joint session last year.

A Senate committee has reported a bill supported by the President which would automatically lead to statehood, independence, or commonwealth improvements, depending on a referendum next year.

The stakes include: the rights of 3.4 million of our fellow Americans; billions of dollars in taxes, program costs, and investments; national security; and political power.

The Insular and International Affairs Subcommittee, which has primary jurisdiction and which I chair, will hold an initial hearing with the leaders of Puerto Rico's parties this Friday at 9:45 a.m in room 2167, Rayburn Building.

We will hold further hearings in Puerto Rico March 9, 10, and 12.

I invite any Member interested to sit with us for these hearings.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO BLOCK PARTISAN VOTER REGISTRATION ACTIVITIES BY TAX EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS

(Mr. THOMAS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, after much reflection and examination of the subject area, I am today introducing legislation to block partisan voter registration activities by tax-exempt organizations. My bill permits tax-exempt organizations to conduct voter registration activities, but under defined standards of nonpartisanship. It also clearly limits exempt organization activities that could lead to tax-subsidized political activity.

Recently there have been a number of stories and allegations about hundreds of thousands of dollars in so-called charitable contributions that have been given to voter registration drives that have been designed to benefit one candidate, or perhaps one party. This has been a particularly prominent issue in my home State of California.

In a year in which we are considering campaign finance reform concepts, it is clear that we should not leave open an opening for disguised campaign exemptions, particularly one permitting tax deductible contributions or tax-exempt organizations to conduct partisan activities.

Mr. Speaker, I would invite attention to my legislation.

TERRY ANDERSON, 5 YEARS OF CAPTIVITY

(Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, almost 5 years have passed since American journalist Terry Anderson was dragged into a car in West Beirut and taken hostage by Shiite Muslim militants loyal to Iran.

Perhaps the greatest atrocity Terry has suffered during his captivity is being robbed of precious time with his family. He has never even held his daughter, who was born 3 months after he was snatched from the streets of Beirut.

We cannot replace those lost years, but we owe it to Terry, to his little girl, and to the seven other American hostages to secure their release.

My sorrow for these captives is profound, but my spirits are lifted by recent developments. Last week, the spiritual leader of Hezbollah declared that the 18 Western captives in Lebanon should be freed.

And now Syria has pledged renewed efforts to help secure the release of the hostages. Terry Anderson's sister, Peggy Say, has reason to feel heartened by this promising news.

These recent developments keep alive our hope that Terry will soon be free.

Now is an opportune time for the United States to appeal to the kidnapers for release of our hostages. Senator MOYNIHAN and I will reintroduce a resolution urging the President to appoint a special envoy to negotiate for the release of the hostages.

We must let these Americans know we have not forgotten them. We cannot forget, and we will not rest until they are safely back on American soil.

SANDINISTAS SHOULD NOW TURN OVER ALL FORMS OF POWER TO NEW GOVERNMENT

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, many of us believe that the Nicaraguan people chose wisely and well when they chose Mrs. Chamarro to head the Government of Nicaragua for the next several years, and we have been pleased that the initial reports were that the Sandinistas were going to go about turning over power to Mrs. Chamarro. Then in the last few hours some elements within the Sandinista movement have begun to indicate otherwise. They have begun to indicate that what they would like to hold on to is the military and the security apparatus within the country. That is interesting, because some of the left wing church-related groups, like Witness For Peace, have told us for years that the Sandinistas were simply a benign Government wanting social reform.

Now it is very clear that when the Sandinistas have to choose what it is they really want to hang on to, given their defeat, what is it that they want to hang on to? They want to hang on to the military and hang on to the secret police.

Well, what we need to send is a message to the Sandinistas that the election means more than simply that you got defeated in an election. It means that you have to turn over the power and the trappings of power to the newly elected Government. That includes the military and it includes the secret police apparatus, which hopefully Mrs. Chamarro will eliminate altogether.

So our message now needs to be to the people of Nicaragua that all elements of the Government need to be turned over to the new people who were elected.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION OF SUPPORT FOR REESTABLISHMENT OF POLISH-GERMAN BORDER

(Mrs. KENNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, German unification is not an exclusive German issue. It is a matter in which all the signatories of the Helsinki Accord have a serious interest. This is of great and grave concern for Poles in Poland, and by extension, the Polish-American community.

It is important that our President of the United States and this Congress take a clear position, and express unequivocal support for the present Polish-German border.

History is clear in its recognition of this border. East Germany and Poland entered into the Zgorzelec Agreement on July 6, 1950, recognizing the Oder-Neisse as the inviable border between the two nations.

The United States, East and West Germany, and Poland all signed the 1975 Helsinki Final Act confirming this border.

Today I will introduce a resolution to express that:

The United States should reaffirm its unequivocal support for the Polish-German border as set after World War II;

Chancellor Helmut Kohl should state, without reservation, that Germany respects and will preserve this border; and

Poland should be included in the German unification discussions, known as two plus four, in matters involving the borders of a unified Germany and the security of countries sharing borders with Germany.

With democratic elections, the People of Poland took their first breath of freedom after 40 years of repressive Communist rule. But, as the unification of Germany draws near, Poles should not have to fear for the sanctity of their borders.

I urge my colleagues to join me in helping to alleviate their fear.

CAN WORKERS OF AMERICA AFFORD 10 WEEKS WITHOUT PAY?

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, in these modern times it has been exciting to watch the innovations in labor-management relationships that have been brought about by voluntary bargaining between labor and management. There have been such incredible innovations that have now become commonplace such as flextime, shared time, cafeteria plans, where the workers can choose the benefits package that they want, paid maternity leave, and the wonderful thing, if we look at this, not one of these innovations in labor-management relationships that today are commonplace were mandated by the Federal Government. They exist because they benefit the workers, and because they can be accommodated to within the requirements of profitability and remaining in business by the firm.

What do we now see? The Government has come on the scene with the Family and Medical Leave Act and said:

We would choose to impose on these workers and these businesses a mandate that you take in this benefits package despite the objectives of either the workers or the management, something that is of value to scarcely any workers in America, 10 weeks without pay.

I would ask all of the workers in America who can afford to have 10 weeks without pay to write their Congressman and ask him to vote yes. If they cannot afford 10 weeks without pay mandated on them by the Federal Government, write and ask for a "no" vote.

LET US MAKE CABLE TV AFFORDABLE

(Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, last week I met with cable television advisory board members from seven communities in my district. The meeting was one of a series that I have had with cable TV officials in central and western Massachusetts. At every meeting I get the same message: Cable television subscription costs are rising to unreasonable levels. Cable television rates have doubled in many areas in just a few years. For example in Southbridge, MA, the basic rate as of March 1 will be $18.95. In 1984 the basic rate was $8.95. Many elderly and low- and moderate-income people simply can no longer afford cable TV. It is my feeling that cable television operators, as beneficiaries of virtual local monopolies on access to their subscribers, must be subject to regulation and local oversight.

Tomorrow the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance will begin consumer-oriented hearing on the cable television situation. The Senate is also moving forward with the process of reregulating cable TV. I urge my colleagues to join in the effort to make cable TV affordable to all consumers.

LEGISLATION TO TERMINATE EXPENDITURES FOR GWEN TOWERS

(Mr. MACHTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a bill to terminate new expenditures for GWEN towers.

During the 1980's, the Air Force designed a program of ground wave emergency networks [GWEN] which was designed to be able to survive a nuclear attack and to preserve our capacity to communicate to our bombers and ICBM's for retaliation.

GWEN requires the construction of 299-foot towers throughout the continental United States. Each tower costs more than $1 million. Of the 96 planned, 42 of these towers have yet to be constructed.

Terminating the GWEN tower plan now makes sense and will save $60 million.

At this time of serious financial constraints, we should be looking for defense programs to cut which will respond to the lessening tensions around the world and will have limited economic impact upon businesses and jobs. This is such a program.

If what I have said does not make sense, consider this: These towers have already been targeted for replacement by a series of satellites. Let us not build a monolithic network of future dinosaurs which will waste away our tax dollars with the passing of the cold war.

If we cannot cut this program, what can we cut? I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S ENVIRONMENTAL POLICIES

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, in the headlines today, we see that Exxon is being sued by the administration for the Alaska oilspill. Sadly, this looming legal logjam will do nothing to help the wildlife in Prince William Sound.

Wildlife, in Prince William Sound and everywhere, does not need endless court battles. It needs policies that prevent appalling oilspills like the Exxon disaster from ever happening again.

Wildlife needs clean water to swim in, clean air to fly in, and our fishing fleets need uncontaminated fish to catch.

Protecting our environment demands policies that the current administration has failed to provide.

We have heard many promises of clean air initiatives and clean water initiatives from the administration, but there has been no delivery. We have even heard that the greenhouse effect would be combated by the White House effect.

Unfortunately, failed promises are simply having no effect.

OPPOSE MANDATED PARENTAL AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT

(Mr. DELAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, we are currently experiencing one of the longest peacetime expansions in our history, an unprecedented 8 years of economic growth. Since 1982, more than 18.8 million jobs have been created and disposable income has increased significantly. This first rate progress will be threatened if we pursue a dangerous path of Government mandated benefits.

Proponents of H.R. 770, the Mandated Parental and Medical Leave Act, argue that Europe has successfully provided these benefits to its employees. The truth is some people have been given a few more benefits at the expense of creating millions of jobs for Europe's massive number of unemployed. Europe's economy is stagnate, experiencing no net growth and creating no new jobs. Burdensome and unfair mandates have created an inflexible business community that cannot easily adapt to new competitive forces. Mandated parental and medical leave threatens to europeanize our country's job creation and economic growth records.

I urge my colleagues to consider the more than 18 million new jobs, consider the unprecedented peacetime economic growth, consider the almost 30-percent increase in disposable income in the United States over the past 8 years. These are real benefits to people.

Keep our economy competitive. Do not put the brakes on jobs and growth. Oppose the Mandated Parental and Medical Leave Act.

DOWN-TO-EARTH ANALYSIS FROM A NORTH DAKOTA FARMER

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot of highbrow theory and interesting thoughts here in the well of the House of Representatives.

I received a letter this morning that I thought I would read to my colleagues. It comes from a North Dakota dairy farmer who gives us some down-to-earth analysis.

Here is what he says:

> There is a lot of complaint about the price of milk lately. After doing a little research, I find out that milk costs about $2.80 a gallon; soda pop, soft drinks, $.50 a can, costs $5.70 a gallon; beer is only $4 a gallon if you buy it by the keg, but if you buy it by the can at the bar, it comes to about $11.40 a gallon.

To repeat, soda pop, $5.70 a gallon; beer, $11.40 a gallon; milk, $2.80 a gallon. He says:

> In 1988, the average American drank 21 gallons of milk, 24 gallons of beer, 46 gallons of soft drinks.

He said:

> The way I figure it, maybe if milk was not so cheap, people would buy more.

MULTIPLE-USE, SUSTAINED-YIELD ACT WEEK

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, the Earth is encountering many problems today due to the demands being placed upon it be competing economic and environmental interests. Regretfully, many countries utilize their resources for short-term gains rather than for the long-term benefit of their nation and the world. Ignored in the rush to develop are scientific, aesthetic, and other values important to the public.

Thirty years ago Congress and President Eisenhower recognized the need to manage our national resources on national forest lands in a manner that would preserve these values. As a result the Muiltiple-Use, Sustained-Yield Act was enacted June 12, 1960. This act requires forest service manager to consider outdoor recreation, range, timber, watershed, wildlife, fish, and wilderness values when making land-use decisions. The act also prescribes the founding principle of sustained yield; that no renewable resource should be exploited be consuming it faster than nature can replenish it.

In short it meant our forest lands would be forever, for everyone.

In order to commemorate, the 30th anniversary of this landmark legislation, I, in behalf of Representatives CAMPBELL, CHANDLER, CRAIG, HANSEN, OBERSTAR, OWENS, SMITH of Oregon, STALLINGS, VUCANOVICH, and STUMP, am introducing a resolution to designate the week of June 10–16, 1990, as "Multiple-Use, Sustained-Yield Act Week."

I urge each of my colleagues to cosponsor and support this opportunity to recognize such a landmark piece of legislation.

FUNDAMENTAL FLAW IN BUSH BUDGET WITH REGARD TO ENVIRONMENT

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the House's attention to what I think is a fundamental flaw in the Bush budget with regard to the environment.

Mr. Speaker, I think most of us in this Chamber, are now aware of the problems of the global environment, and the fact is the President alluded to it in, I think, a commendable effort to plant a large number of trees in the next fiscal year.

Unfortunately, the fact is if we want to maintain forests in our Nation, then on a global basis we have to address taking care of those forests that are now in place. In one breath the President provides additional funding for planting of hundreds of millions or 1 billion new trees. But, in fact, President Bush proposed budget cuts out almost all the money that is necessary to keep the trees that we have, the current forests that we have, healthy. The Bush recommendation for the budget eliminates funds for fire suppression for disease and insect infestation.

In addition to that, the President has cut, eliminated, the very program that the United States provides for tropical forestry research, study, and technical assistance and global forestry, where, in fact, our Nation reaches out and tries to help areas in the world like in Puerto Rico and Brazil and many other nations trying to promote intelligent tropical forestry management for our global environment.

If we are serious about it, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Congress would restore those funds and deal with a complete global environmental package by saving the existing forests around the world, and not a fragmented policy which tends to plant seedlings, but that promotes policy which is indifferent or antagonistic to the preservation of both American, and the global forests. Mr. Speaker, we need to make certain that "America the Beautiful" the theme for the President's tree planting initiative is more than a one note tune as we address the budget and our responsibilities.

DEMOCRATS SHOULD LET THE PENTAGON MANAGE ITS SPENDING

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, every American should be offended by the Democratic leadership's decision to block the Secretary of Defense from shifting $770 million to protect military personnel. It is routine, and has been for years, to allow the Pentagon to manage its spending. It is absurd for the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Armed Services to deliberately be putting a block to what is a practical management decision.

The American people expect us to use some common sense in managing the Federal Government. The fact is that the Democrats in Congress impose more and more and more micro management. It becomes harder and harder to run the Federal Government intelligently, and this latest act is not only dumb, but will have a very direct effect on the men and women in our armed services.

I think it is ridiculous that we would make the men and women in the armed services pay because the Democratic leadership in Congress is frustrated.

A GREAT DAY FOR THOSE WHO LOVE DEMOCRACY

(Mr. McEWEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, this is an exciting time for those that believe in democracy and freedom. As we know, during the 1984 elections the Sandinistas stole the election. Due to the efforts of the Freedom Fighters, they forced Mr. Ortega to sit down with the other Presidents of Central America and before the klieg lights of international observation to agree to an election.

That is all we wanted. We wanted a fair chance at the ballot box.

Yesterday the foreign minister of the Soviet Union said:

> Regardless of who won, the Nicaraguans made their choice. They voted for peace, for freedom, for democracy, for national reconciliation, and consent for the country's economic revival and for social progress.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Soviet Union said in the headlines in the Washington Post this morning, "Soviets say Nicaragua voted for freedom." To those Freedom Fighters that forced the Sandinistas to agree to an internationally observed election so that their sisters, their grandmothers, their wives, and their aunts could go to the ballot box and vote, as the Soviets said, for freedom, it is a great day for those who love democracy.

ORTEGA SHOULD PARTICIPATE IN A DEMOCRATIC POLITICAL PROCESS

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very worried about Central America, as I think every person of conscience in this body is. I think we have to have as many congressional delegations go down to Nicaragua between now and the inaguration of President Violeta Barrios de Chamorro on the 25th of April as we have had go down there in these past months.

There were eight Members that were blocked from entering Nicaragua to observe the recent elections. Our passports have been sitting over at the Nicaraguan Embassy for the past 3 weeks. They are still there. I am hoping that the new interim government team that is at the Nicaraguan Embassy will be gracious and get us visas so those of us who want to can go down and make sure that there is a smooth transition.

Not every Member in this House has lost an election or had their political dreams abruptly halted. My dream was derailed through gerrymandering in 1982, and I spent 2 years outside of Government, all the time wishing that I could still pursue a full political career. I dusted myself off, moved to a different county, and got reelected for a second 6-year go-around in three 2-years bursts. And I am still going.

Now I am going to go down to Nicaragua and tell President Ortega to dust himself off, participate in the government and political process. Maybe he can make a comeback in 6 years. But I will also tell him that if he ever expects to get back on top, he had better reject his Communist philosophy and convert to a free market message.

Now the reason they do not have a 4- or 5-year Presidency is Ortega's fault. It is the only one of all the eight nations down there, except for Mexico, that has a 6-year Presidency. Obviously Ortega didn't plan on losing.

One last thing, Danny Ortega is going to have to ask his brother Humberto to take off his military uniform and both are going to have to give up their little mini-Pentagon power down there.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 28, 1990.

Hon. THOMAS S. FOLEY,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the permission granted in Clause 5 of Rule III of the Rules of the U.S. House of Representatives, I have the honor to transmit a sealed envelope received from the White House at 6:09 p.m. on Tuesday, February 27, 1990 said to contain a message from the President on the 1990 Trade Policy Agenda and the 1989 Annual Report on the Trade Agreements Program.

With great respect, I am,
Sincerely yours,
DONNALD K. ANDERSON,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

THE 1990 TRADE POLICY AGENDA AND 1989 ANNUAL REPORT ON TRADE AGREEMENTS PROGRAM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, February 27, 1990, at page S1732.)

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEHMAN of California). Pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 344, the Chair desires to inform Members that the official picture of the House while in session will be taken immediately after the approval of the Journal when the House convenes on Wednesday, March 14, 1990.

RE-REFERRAL OF H.R. 2894, REMOVAL OF LIMITATION ON AMOUNT OF WATER ANNUALLY SUPPLIED TO CITY OF DENISON, TX

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2894, and that it be re-referred to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 1096, PROVIDING FOR USE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS AWARDED TO SEMINOLE INDIAN TRIBE

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 1096), to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Seminole Indian in dockets 73, 151, and 73-A of the Indian Claims Commission, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker will appoint the conferees upon his return to the Chair.

ARIZONA DESERT WILDERNESS ACT OF 1990

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 338 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 2570.

□ 1257

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2570) to provide for the designation of certain public lands as wilderness in the State of Arizona, with Mr. MAZZOLI in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read the first time.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that this bill is here. I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], the esteemed chairman of the committee and the driving force behind this legislation.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, it is a great pleasure today to rise in support of H.R. 2570, the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act. This measure is half of a package of bills aimed at substantially completing the wilderness review process in my State of Arizona. The other half of this package, H.R. 2571, addresses four wildlife refuges in Arizona and is currently before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Today's measure addresses public lands under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Land Management. For many years, the BLM lands were considered the leftovers, the lands not good enough for the parks, refuges, or forests. But anyone who has experienced these lands knows what a terribly mistaken notion this is. The lands proposed for designation as wilderness include richly varied desert mountains steep canyons, and meandering desert rivers that are literally streams of life. They include lands with a fascinating array of plant life and wildlife habitat, all of which have adapted to the harsh conditions of the desert. Many areas have rich cultural resources that need protection. These, truly, are lands of undisputable national significance.

BLM inventoried more than 2 million acres of its lands for its wilderness review and recommended a little over half for designation as wilderness. As introduced, this legislation proposed about 1.4 million acres of wilderness. Over the course of a year of intensive discussions and negotiations with innumerable individuals and interests in Arizona, a process that involved everyone in the Arizona congressional delegation, we arrived at the compromise that is before the House today.

This bill proposes about 1.1 million acres, just about the figure BLM arrived at. Frankly, we could have had more acreage in this bill, but in the tough bargaining that produced the final compromise, I felt that it was more important to have quality than quantity. All but one of the study areas with major riparian resources are protected by this bill. The largest and most diverse areas are retained and even expanded, such as the Arrastra Mountains. And many of the smaller and more delicate areas are protected as well.

Mr. Chairman, we have made innumerable adjustments to accommodate mining and other commercial interests. We have incorporated language specifying that grazing, where established prior to wilderness designation, may continue in a manner compatible with wilderness, including, where necessary, the use of motorized equipment. We have incorporated language outlining appropriate terms and conditions for the continuation of wildlife management activities in wilderness areas. And perhaps most importantly, we release from wilderness study management about 950,000 acres of BLM lands.

We have extended the creative model of the San Pedro Riparian National Conservation Area to the controversial Gila Box in southeastern Arizona. Probably the single most controversial study area in the BLM inventory, Gila Box was not recommended by BLM but was proposed for wilderness in my bill. The conservation area is not just a compromise providing some less than wilderness level of protection, however. It is a different notion, really. We have established an area for specific purposes, with all uses and activities within the area to be managed in a way that is compatible with and promotes those purposes. Moreover, we have not just replaced a study area with a conservation area, we have expanded it to include other related riparian areas, including Bonita Creek and additional portions of the Gila River. This is a very strong conservation tool. I want to thank Congressman KOLBE for his hard and diligent work on this very important product.

Mr. Chairman, over the long and arduous road that brought us here, we have labored endlessly over mining claims and hunting permits, management plans and cherrystems, water rights, boundaries, and interests of great complexity. We strive to meet the tests that all our acts here strive to meet—of fairness and balance, of reasonableness and common sense, of vision and practicality. I think we have done a good job on those important counts.

But for just a moment today I would like to also lift our thoughts above these matters and touch on what we are really doing here. Mr. Chairman, each generation has its important tasks to complete. The generations of Udalls before me met their challenge to tame the wilderness, to settle it and make it a home for succeeding generations.

But the challenge of our generation is different. We must show ourselves capable not only of conquering nature but also of caring for it and aware that we are not only masters of our world but also its dependents. It is important that those who come after us know that we cherished these living deserts, their waters and all the life that regenerates itself there season after season, generation after generation. In wilderness, we value that which man did not create and by restraining man's altering hand, we hope to honor this powerful work.

Long after our own footsteps have been forgotten, these places will remain. Their eloquent stillness will bear testimony that we as a people are grateful for our chance to walk upon this Earth and that we have the strength, the courage and the wisdom to leave at least these places as we found them.

□ 1300

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, it has been a long road to get H.R. 2570 on the floor. Before I begin my remarks, I would like to say one thing. It is customary when we reach a point such as this where a delegation is united on legislation that directly impacts the entire State for us to stand here and congratulate each other on the tremendous work we have done, and certainly I would do so and will. But I think it is very appropriate that we take a moment to recognize the fact that without our staffs, both the committee staff, minority and majority, and the personal staff of every Member of the Arizona delegation, both House and Senate, this never would have been accomplished. They have put in literally thousands of hours working on very contentious issues, and I know I speak for all of my colleagues in the delegation in thanking them and also in thanking the staff of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] and the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] for their invaluable assistance in getting us to this point as well.

Mr. Chairman, on balance this is a good bill. It has evolved from a very lengthy, open public process. Virtually every interest group involved has been heard and fully considered by the delegation and by the committee.

H.R. 2570 releases from wilderness study roughly as many acres, almost a million, back to multiple use management as it designates as wilderness, which is about 1.1 million, and that is a pretty good balance. Personally I am an active supporter and will continue to be an active supporter of multiple use management, and the concepts of multiple use management which is why having nearly 1 million acres released from restrictive wilderness study management is important to me, to my constituents, to hunters, to miners, outdoor enthusiasts, ranchers, and thousands of others who enjoy the public use of our lands in the West.

I also recognize that some of the very special and sensitive desert lands and the relatively few desert riparian areas deserve special protection, and that special protection is provided by this bill.

Because this is a consensus bill, there are geographical areas in the bill that many think should have been left out. There are geographical areas not in the bill that I know many think should have been included. I have a special concern about three specific areas that I think I should mention. They include the Gila Box, the Needles Eye, and Upper Burro Creek, and Lower Burro Creek.

First of all as to the Gila Box, difficulties abounded with this particular area, but they were resolved and reconciled by the development of a new riparian national conservation area. I especially want to congratulate my colleague, JIM KOLBE, for the enormous amount of time and effort that he put in, not only in devising this management device, but also in getting consensus agreement as to how to handle this particular area.

This bill designates Upper Burro Creek as a wilderness area, and releases from wilderness management Lower Burro Creek.

My preference would have been to release them both. My basic concern has been with the potential impact the wilderness designation may have on continued operation and expansion and jobs recommended to the nearby Cyprus Bagdad Copper Mine. I want to make it abundantly clear that the language of the committee report and my supplemental views include the proposed expansion of the Cyprus Mine, include and recognize, the proposed expansion of the Cyprus Mine. Our clear intent is that this wilderness designation for Upper Burro Creek will have no adverse impact on the present operation of the mine, nor the proposed expansion of the mine and its related tailing ponds and tailing ties. The continued operation and expansion of the mine is crucial to the town of Bagdad, and to hundreds of Cyprus employees and their families.

Likewise, the report language recognizes and protects the existing water system for the town of Bagdad, and recognizes that it is available for maintenance, for repair, and for expansion when necessary.

I am also concerned about over 6,000 acres private subsurface mineral rights in the Upper Burro area. In my view this amounts to taking of private property rights and should have been excluded, or the area should not have been designated. As for Needle's Eye, this area has a high voltage power line running through it. The power line will be upgraded and replaced in the future, and although statutory language is included to include the existing right-of-way, it should not have been designated.

I am pleased with other important parts of this bill. We have included statutory and report language to protect continued grazing where established prior to the designation, and we have included statutory and report language to allow wildlife and wildlife habitat activities, facilitating and management to be maintained and improved.

The most important issue, and the most difficult issue in coming to this point in this bill has been the issue of water rights. This issue is not over, and I want to emphasize this point. This issue is not over, whether or not there should be a Federal reserve water right for wilderness purposes in Arizona. There should be, and it is recognized in this bill. On that, my colleague from Arizona and I depart from many of our colleagues in this body, and some in the other body, on both sides of the aisle. Nonetheless, I recognize and respect their viewpoints and convictions on this vital issue, and will continue to respect them.

My concern is not with the reserving of the right, but where and in what form these reserve water rights are quantified and adjudicated. It should be done in Arizona, in our courts, and under our system. That has been the focus of our debate.

I am pleased to advise my colleagues that virtually at the very last moment we have been able to reach agreement on this issue. At the appropriate time I will be offering on behalf of all my colleagues in the Arizona delegation, with the exception of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP], an amendment which makes a specific reference to our intent that these reserve water rights should be quantified and adjudicated in the courts of the State. This amendment would resolve the existing conflict between bill language and report language regarding the nature of the wilderness water right, and it further asserts that this water language applies to this bill, not to any past or future bills in other States. It is not to be determined or cited as precedent in future legislative consideration. We believe this compromise addresses our concerns in Arizona. We do not expect or intend that this language will address concerns in other western States. That is a matter that will be decided in the future, on a case-by-case and State-by-State basis.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] has consumed 8 minutes.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I rise first to recognize the outstanding job done under the leadership of Chairman UDALL with regard to the Arizona wilderness bill—H.R. 2570. This measure is the first BLM wilderness bill that we have brought before the House. I think the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], is blazing a new path in terms of setting policy with regard to these important BLM wilderness measures that will be coming before the Congress for the next decade, dealing with our important public BLM lands. As the chairman said, that too often the BLM areas have been looked upon as lands of little value. The truth is, as we look at these lands now, we recognize the tremendous natural resources, the Sonoran Desert, the Mohave Desert, in the Southwest for example, qualities that persist in many of them, the very unique ecosystem, and the biological diversity that persists, the silent desert, are indeed very special almost magical resources, clearly we have all learned a great deal under the leadership of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], in terms of the value of Arizona. As Members look at the map of reapportionment, we notice that Arizona now has a lot of folks moving to Arizona from other parts of the country. Therefore, I think Chairman UDALL's sales pitch with regard to Arizona as being a very special place is appropriate, and obviously will be recognized by the 1990 Census numbers that will surely emphasize the importance of this special State. These BLM wilderness areas are very special areas, these public lands.

The Chairman mentioned to me that 10 million acres of BLM lands exist in Arizona. This bill, the Arizona desert wilderness bill, seeks to put about 1.1 million of those 10 million into wilderness categories, which means that once designated as wilderness the qualities that make them very special today will be preserved. The bill has introduced, of course, designating 53 separate wilderness areas, 1.4 million acres but through the committee process and the achievement of consensus, that has been reduced to about 39 areas. Actually about 300,000 acres less than the 1.4 million in the initial measure. However, one of these areas that have been so special like the Gila Box have been conserved, through the hard work of the Arizona delegation this will be designated a national conservation area under BLM land management scheme in this subsitute before the House.

Two additional areas that are very important—I was amazed to learn about the quality of these areas in committee—are outlined in the committee report will remain wilderness study areas, which I think will someday be addressed in substantive way for wilderness classification. We are putting off making a decision until a later date for the Baker Canyon area and cactus plain wilderness study areas.

The bill, of course, embodies changes worked out by the subcommittee and the full committee, agreed to by the Arizona delegation. I want to thank the entire Arizona delegation. We, in some cases, agreed to disagree on issues, but I think there has been a good professional working relation with the staff and with the members, especially the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES], who serves well on our committee and subcommittees of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill.

The Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands, which I chair, held all-day hearings on the bill last summer in Phoenix and Lake Havasu City, AZ, and another hearing here in Washington, DC, in September.

The reported bill embodies changes worked out in the subcommittee and full committee and agreed to by the Arizona delegation. The wilderness designations would be reduced to a total of 39 areas, amounting to almost 1.1 million acres in all, while two areas would remain in their present status as wilderness study areas. The reported bill would also designate a new national conservation area, the Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area, amounting to about 21,000 acres to be managed by BLM in a manner essentially identical to the way the existing San Pedro National Conservation Area, also in Arizona, is managed now.

The rest of the BLM wilderness study areas in Arizona, amounting to some 947,200 acres, would be released from study status and returned to multiple-use management.

The reported bill would more precisely and clearly address the management of wildlife in BLM wilderness, esssentially by affirming BLM's present guidelines; similarly, it affirms existing guidelines for grazing of livestock in those newly-designated areas where that use has been established.

In summary, the reported bill represents a very high degree of balance. It is a good bill, a wilderness bill that protects outstanding resources that rival any elsewhere in the Nation, and does so in a way that recognizes the need for a balanced approach and the importance of continued development of resources on some of the public lands. I am proud to have worked with the chairman to develop it. I think he sets a high mark for others that will propose BLM wilderness bills to this House.

There is one area in which there was not complete agreement among the Arizona delegation and members of the committee when the bill was ordered reported. I refer to the language regarding the process which would be followed for quantification of water and water rights reserved by the bill.

The present language in the bill is quite appropriate in my judgment and all that is needed. But I have been striving to understand my Arizona colleagues' concerns and remain flexible today concerning possible revision, so long as the national interest and essential legal principles of water rights are properly protected—a subject and topic of great concern with regards to public land policy.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join in congratulating the Arizona delegation and especially our esteemed chairman, Mr. UDALL, for their hard work on this bill. I urge its approval by the House.

□ 1320

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time,

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, I support this bill to designate 39 areas as wilderness to be managed by the Bureau of Land Management. I do so because I believe that the wilderness areas we preserve today will be the areas we most cherish tomorrow.

This bill designates seven wilderness areas totaling 74,000 acres in my district, and releases seven areas from study status, for a total of 70,000 released acres. In addition, and perhaps most important, it designates the 20,000-acre Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area. This designation is the most appropriate for an area which contains some wilderness qualities, but requires more restorative management to enhance the resource to its potential.

Conservation Area status will provide for preservation of this remarkable approach is the San Pedro Riparian National Conservation Area which was designated by Congress near the end of the 100th Congress. That designation has been a remarkable success. The Bureau of Land Management has made the San Pedro a showcase of intelligence management emphasizing its most outstanding values.

In my statement, I would like to discuss each of the areas being designated for wilderness or conservation, and some of the issues thereto.

GILA BOX

This section represents the most significant compromise achieved in this bill. When this process began, the local communities, ranchers, and the managers of one of the world's largest copper mines stood opposed to designation of the Gila Box as wilderness.

On the other side were hikers, rafters, hunters and a variety of environmentalists who felt that protection was absolutely vital for the area. Some even suggested making the area a national park. It was a situation made to order for protracted conflict and disagreement.

After considering all the issues, I concluded that this most definitely deserved protection, but that wilderness was not the most appropriate management strategy to pursue. I think all of Arizona is united in its appreciation for riparian areas, and the unique vegetation and wildlife that makes its home streamside. Protection of our riparian areas is and should be a statewide priority.

But the kind of intense use this area has seen, its extreme proximity to a huge open copper mine and associated tailings—less than a mile away in some areas—and the type of management the area requires calls for a unique, flexible and restorative kind of management. It is tailor made for conservation area designation, one that requires the area be preserved, protected and enhanced.

There are three issues of particular concern to some of the citizens and businesses in the vicinity of the Gila Box. One is the question of grazing within the conservation area. Report language from the committee identifies the fact that grazing is a long standing historical use within the conservation area. It also notes that allotment management plans currently in place are designed to remove cattle from the streamside habitat along the Gila River and Bonita Creek. These efforts should continue in the name of riparian habitat enhancement. I consider this kind of management, through the use of pumps, watering facilities and fences to be consistent with the bill's requirement for enhancement of the riparian area.

Under these circumstances, with appropriate steps being taken to eliminate grazing in the river bottom, I believe grazing is acceptable and appropriate within the conservation area and for public lands adjacent to the conservation area.

Within the conservation area, the Corps of Engineers has a withdrawal for an authorized flood control dam, called the Camelsback Dam. This dam has a poor cost/benefit ratio, and its certificate of withdrawal is scheduled to expire in 1992. The NCA designation is not intended to deauthorize the dam. If flood control strategies can be found outside of the conservation area to benefit residents in the Gila Valley, then the Camelsback Dam authorization should be considered sufficient authority to provide that flood control.

Finally, the Phelps Dodge Corp. has agreed not to oppose designation of the Gila Box National Conservation Area because of language included in the bill and committee report assuring that their activities outside of the Area would not be restricted or regulated more strictly because of the designation of the NCA. What is in the conservation area is in; and what is out, is out.

Therefore, conservation area regulations should not apply outside of the conservation area. There is no "buffer zone" created by designation of this area. If clean air or clean water laws, on their own, require more strict enforcement of mining activities, so be it. But that regulation should not hinge on the designation or existence of this conservation area.

The Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area will be a valuable asset to the communities in Graham and Greenlee County. This unique and special designation will provide appropriate protection, but will permit a variety of recreational activities that will be extremely attractive to tourists from the crowded cities, as well as to the residents of more rural parts of Arizona.

WHITE CANYON

The White Canyon Wilderness Area is another site of significant compromise between environmentalists and mining interests. In this case, significant mineral claims lie just adjacent to the wilderness area. Asarco, Inc., negotiated with members of the Arizona Wilderness Coalition and agreed to boundary modifications to give them a greater degree of comfort about the proximity of their mining operation to the wilderness area. Mining just outside the area should not detract from the wilderness qualities within because of the topographical features of the wilderness area.

Committee report language discusses the possibility that the Forest Service should study the wilderness qualities of land immediately to the north of the BLM wilderness area. This area was somehow excluded from study leading up to the RARE II bill of 1984. While we do not require its study in this legislation, we do recommend that a study be undertaken at an appropriate time within the framework of the Forest Service planning schedule.

BLACK ROCK

At the appropriate time in this debate, I will offer an amendment to clarify the rights of private land owners, the land management agencies and the public relative to the Black Rock Wash Road in the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation. I will reserve my discussion of this designated area until then.

NEEDLE'S EYE

Although the Needle's Eye wilderness lies immediately outside my district, I want to express my concern about how the BLM will manage the area. Bisecting almost the entire area is an old power line serving the town of San Carlos in the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation. That right of way is owned by the Bureau of Indian Affairs and is permanent. Yesterday, I introduced legislation to divest the Federal Government of the San Carlos Indian Irrigation project, which operates and maintains this power line. Upon enactment, the Arizona Public Service Co. will take title to the line.

An upgrade of this line is of extreme importance. Most of the area where the power line crosses is inaccessible by motorized vehicle anyway. When the upgrade takes place, helicopters will be used, consistent with the Wilderness Act's minimum tool requirement.

It should be made clear that transfer of title of this line to APS should not effect the right of way. There really is no effective way to move or relocate the line. The Bureau of Land Management declared this area as suitable for wilderness despite the power line, because of its antique condition. Therefore, this act should not be construed as preventing this right-of-way from being renewed.

WATER RIGHTS

For the last several years, Congress—and more importantly, the courts—have been wrestling with the issue of Federal water rights in wilderness areas. Language to be offered today by Mr. KYL, Mr. RHODES, and Chairman UDALL will successfully identify the rights of the States to adjudicate Federal water rights under State law and State procedures.

The doctrine of "first in time, first in right" is important to protect. It offers certainty to water users throughout the State, and preempts severe conflicts that would take place if newer rights were to impinge on historical uses.

The Rhodes-Kyl amendment ensures that State procedures will apply to Federal reserved rights within wilderness areas. The wilderness areas we designate will not suffer as a result. The Federal Government has shown that it can and will aggressively pursue wilderness water rights within State court.

For the sake of the rule of law, the prevention of chaos and the orderly disposition of water priority, the Rhodes-Kyl amendment deserves the support of the House.

Representative RHODES, KYL, and Chairman UDALL deserve a great deal of credit for finding a satisfactory resolution to this extremely complicated and technical question.

CONCLUSION

This wilderness bill was built upon the efforts of many—not just seven members of the House and Senate and their staffs. Ranchers, conservationists, miners, local elected officials, hunters—to name only a few—were involved at every step and at every turn in this process. The final product represents to the extent possible a consensus. A perfect consensus was, regrettably, not achieved in the final analysis. While I regret this failure, I believe all points of view were fairly considered in this legislation.

Wilderness debates are difficult, because they focus on values as much as they focus on facts. That's why it's easy for reasonable people to disagree about the appropriateness of wilderness designation in specific areas.

It's up to elected representatives to make such difficult judgments based on the information available. Some difficult decisions have been made here—some unpopular decisions as well, I imagine. But all in all, this bill is positive for the State and the Nation.

It's not just a matter of local pride when I say that Arizona has some of the most beautiful areas in the country. We have more national parks and monuments than any other State in the Nation. We also have more Riparian National Conservation Areas than any other State in the Nation. And, by the time the 101st Congress comes to an end, we will have the first statewide BLM wilderness bill enacted into law.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER], who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water, Power and Offshore Energy Resources of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Let me say here that I want to thank the gentleman from California for his assistance in working on this bill, especially with reference to the water language.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to extend my compliments to Chairman UDALL and the members of the Arizona delegation in putting together the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act. I can appreciate the long hours and hard work that went into this bill.

In particular, I would like to say that I appreciate the hard work and difficult decisions that Chairman UDALL, Mr. RHODES, and Mr. KYL had to make to reach an agreement on the water rights language that is being offered here today.

My understanding of the language in the amendments is that: There is an express reservation of water to the Federal Government sufficient to fulfill the purposes of the wilderness areas set aside by this bill; the Secretary of the Interior is directed to take all those steps necessary to protect the reserved water rights; and one of the steps the Secretary would take would be to file a claim in an appropriate stream adjudication in the Arizona State courts to quantify those claims.

This language does not amend the McCarren Act. This language does not prevent the Secretary from going to the Federal courts to protect the Federal reserved water rights, as the Secretary may do today, should that action be necessary.

The language of the amendments reflects our expectation that the Secretary will seek to quantify the reserved water for the areas protected by this bill in an appropriate stream adjudication in the Arizona State courts. I understand that there are several major stream adjudications, covering about 90 percent of the streams in Arizona, already underway. The Federal Government has been joined in these adjudications and that is the forum where the reserved water rights for much of the area covered by this bill is likely to be quantified. There appears to be only two major areas, included in wilderness in this bill, which is not part of a stream adjudication already. It is my expectation that this area will be part of a stream adjudication at a later date and that the Secretary will participate in that adjudication.

Again, I would like to compliment Chairman UDALL and his colleagues from Arizona for their hard work and their willingness to make the compromises necessary to develop this water rights language.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. CRAIG].

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the creation by Congress of a Federal reserved water right for wilderness. H.R. 2570 does just that.

Water is the lifeblood of the West, vital to our economy and way of life. We have fought hard over the years to maintain State preeminence, and it's good to see our efforts have met with at least some success.

In Idaho and the West, be believe water belongs to the States and that water issues should be resolved in State jurisdictions.

In an ideal world, States and their representatives in Congress could remain silent, knowing that States rights would remain States rights, and that outside forces would not intrude. Unfortunately, those days have passed.

Today we must fight for States' water rights at every level. We must not only confront an intrusive Federal Government, but also overactive courts and the legal system.

The Colorado decision of 1985, Sierra versus Block, asserted Federal water claims. And that decision was augmented by still other decisions diluting our States' positions and assuming greater Federal control.

To confuse things further, a court in New Mexico has concluded the opposite of the Colorado decision.

The courts have placed a huge cloud over water rights, creating an atmosphere of uncertainty. As a result, to remain silent is to risk the complete loss of State control.

Legislation that creates Federal wilderness must expressly state that such a designation does not establish a Federal water right. This is a matter Idaho's two Senators and I have brought to Congress time and time again.

A failure to explicitly state the intent of legislation on water rights can lead to the courts deciding what water rights are created—it can lead to the creation of an implied water right for wilderness.

As a Representative from Idaho, I cannot let that happen.

It is my duty to take out an insurance policy against the intrusion of the courts and the Federal Government into a States rights issue. And, together with Senator JIM MCCLURE, I'll continue to do so.

In Idaho, water is a matter of States rights. It has always been and always will be. We must not allow the Federal Government or courts to decide how a State manages its waters.

In addition, we should not be creating wilderness areas before the BLM makes its final recommendations concerning wilderness study areas. To do so would be to deny Congress the benefit of that organization's information and guidance.

Because the legislation before us today creates a Federal water right and for the aforementioned reason, I must oppose H.R. 2570.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Utah [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I rise with genuine pleasure to support this important legislation and to commend the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] and the Arizona delegation for bringing it forward. It is significant legislation, and it has been artfully crafted. It is a tribute to Chairman UDALL that this legislation is in its current condition. This is the man who is, perhaps, respected as much or more than anyone in the Congress on environmental and wilderness issues, and I commend him especially for the attainment of this important legislation today.

Mr. Chairman, I have in a small way been involved in the process which gave rise to the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act. Last year I traveled to Arizona to assist the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] at his request to help chair hearings in which the merits of protecting this land was debated. We had more than 150 witnesses on one day. The result of this equitable process is a fair bill which would designate 1.1 million acres of Bureau of Land Management land as wilderness. It will allow 60 million acres to remain as wilderness study areas and to establish a national conservation area as well.

Mr. Chairman, wilderness is precious and limited. Man cannot create it. He can only protect it or destroy it. Wilderness cannot defend itself; only wise laws and wise government can. What we fail to protect now will ultimately lose its true character forever.

Mr. Chairman, we have protected some of our national forests as wilderness, but little of our desert lands. This act will serve to set aside a portion of our arid lands to preserve their beautiful and irreplaceable scenic treasures. It will also stop the destructure of wildlife habitat, rare plants, and archeological resources caused by marginal economic exploitation and offroad vehicles.

Mr. Chairman, I have spent a great deal of time studying the issues of protecting wild desert lands as a result of my own efforts to save 5.1 million acres of BLM lands in my own State. As we must protect the portion of the high desert ecosystem of the Colorado Plateau in Utah, we should also protect some of the Sonoran Desert of Arizona. This act will serve that latter goal very well.

Twenty-five years ago, Mr. Chairman, people such as the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] had the foresight to create the wilderness preservation system. It is time now to implement that act to protect the totally natural character of some of our remaining desert lands, and that is what this bill today will accomplish.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL].

Mr. KYL. Mr. Chairman, I, too, rise in support of the addition of this important wilderness to the State of Arizona or in the State of Arizona. This is a bill about the future, and I think it is important that we lay these lands aside for future generations to enjoy, much as we have enjoyed the wonderful wilderness and lands in the State of Arizona in the past.

With respect to the water rights which are a very important part of this bill, we are doing two very critical things. One, we are designating reserved water rights to accompany this wilderness, which I think is critical to the preservation of the wilderness as we know it. Second, because we have very good proceedings for adjudicating water rights in the State of Arizona pursuant to State law, we are saying that the quantification of these wilderness water rights, these reserved water rights, should be in the State courts of Arizona, and we will be requesting approval of an amendment which specifically provides for the quantification of such rights in any present or future appropriate stream adjudication in the courts of the State of Arizona in which the United States is or may be joined and which is conducted in accordance with the McCarren amendment.

The point of this, Mr. Chairman, is to ensure that the State court proceedings in which most of the water rights are currently being adjudicated in the State of Arizona will be the forum in which these water rights will be adjudicated as well. Under the McCarran amendment generally there is an option for the Federal Government to litigate reserved rights either in Federal or State courts. We are not upsetting that option in any other cases. We are saying in this case that we, the Congress, being the people who create this water right, are exercising the option of going into the State courts if there are proceedings there in which the Federal Government is or may be joined as a party and which are conducted in accordance with the principles of the McCarran amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we believe this is the best way to ensure that all of the rights are adjudicated vis-a-vis each other, that there will not be duplicative proceedings. We anticipate that there could be a situation in which the Federal Government needed to go into Federal court for the protection of water rights and for some other reason in some other way not to quantify the water rights, and that right would certainly continue to exist for the Federal Government, but for the quantification of the rights, that would be done in the State court proceedings under our proposed amendment.

With all of those thoughts in mind, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which we are all proud to support, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise briefly to express my concern about the principle of the expressed reservation of water rights as set forth in this particular piece of legislation. I certainly recognize the hard work that has gone into it, the recognition of the problem; but the concept of State appropriation of water is vital to our arid Western States, and I must rise in opposition to the notion of an expressed reservation. Even though it does refer to the State appropriation process for the development of the volume question, I am afraid that over the years we will simply go to court and say that water rights have been expressly reserved and that in fact the courts will then set that volume amount.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate my colleague yielding me this time.

I rise to speak regarding H.R. 2570, not because I pretend to be an expert in the problems of Arizona, but because of the precedents in this bill that relate to developing and establishing wilderness in other Western States. My district involves territory that will be subject to the California Wilderness bill. You could easily place five Eastern States in my congressional district and yet a relatively small group of people are trying to decide how much wilderness should be accommodated there.

In our case, the Congress felt the issue was so important that we established a process whereby a public commission met for several years to hear all the parties involved. We spent $8 million over 4 years doing that. At the end of it, a very few people decided to walk away from the public process and develop their own desert wilderness bill behind closed doors.

In this case, at least the delegation has been negotiating in a prolonged and bipartisan way.

I must say, I do have serious reservations about the water language that is a part of this bill.

On the other hand, I am rather pleased that this bill does set three positive precedents which should be followed as we fashion a California bill. First, it returns 950,000 acres to multiple use.

Second, it allows for the upgrade and expansion of utility corridors. Third, it recognizes the 1964 Wilderness Act's preservation of grazing rights where they do exist. These precedents should be maintained and held over, if you will, as preconditions for passage of the California bill.

Having said that, my greatest concern now about this bill is that an accommodation has not been made that is acceptable to the Arizona Member that has 75 percent of the land, and that individual, of course, is my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Indeed, items that affect Members' individual districts dramatically and directly should be settled to that Member's satisfaction before we move such bills out to the House floor.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding this time to me.

I would like to express special thanks to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES], a member of the committee. I would also like to tell Chairman UDALL how much I appreciate his having hearings in Arizona last year to accommodate us, and I appreciate the efforts of my colleagues in the Arizona delegation to try to resolve the question of wilderness designations.

However, Mr. Chairman, I must rise in strong opposition to H.R. 2570, the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act. Almost 75 percent of the 1.1 million acres of public lands being designated to the wilderness system by this bill are located in my district. This bill does not represent a reasonable balance between the multiple use of our public resources and environmental concerns.

It is no secret that I am a strong multiple use advocate. Yet I recognize that there are unique lands in our State which could be added to the wilderness system. However, wilderness advocates would have you believe that the designation of 1.1 million acres of BLM lands as wilderness represents the only opportunity to save these lands, and that the lands are incapable of being managed otherwise in a responsible manner. Wilderness designations may, in fact, remove the flexibility necessary to manage public resources in a way which preserves and enhances the land for the future.

When we designate wilderness areas, we are not just preserving those lands for future generations, but we are in fact telling future generations that we do not trust them to make the right decisions on how to best use and manage public resources.

We also cannot ignore our responsibility to the present. At a time when Arizona's economy is in need of new stimulation, it makes no sense to me to impose additional constraints on new and needed economic development.

Specifically, the inclusion of two areas in this bill illustrate my point, and generally, the inclusion of lands which have been determined to hold moderate to high mineral potential cannot be ignored for Arizona's future or the future of this country. With regard to mineral potentials, not all of the lands which have been considered or will be designated by this bill have been inventoried for mineral potential. In addition, it should be noted today in Arizona, there already exists more than 2 million acres in wilderness, there are 2.5 million acres of National Park lands, and another 2.5 million acres of wildlife refuges, effectively precluding mineral entry in 7 million acres, not to mention the multitude of lands included in the half-dozen or so military installations in Arizona.

An area upon which no conclusion could be reached is the 57,800 acres of the Cactus Plain Wilderness Study Area. One of the factors why its status could not be resolved, and it will remain classified as a wilderness study area, is the proximity of the new townsite for the town of Parker. The town is located in La Paz County, a county of 4,400 square miles, in which only 141,000 acres is privately owned—the remainder being public lands, wildlife refuges, a military installation, State lands, and Indian reservation.

Immediately adjacent to Cactus Plains, and a separate unit only by virtue of a concrete-lined portion of the Central Arizona Project water canal, is an area called East Cactus Plains which is being designated wilderness. The quality of the lands in East Cactus Plains have far more value as wilderness than those in Cactus Plains.

But aside from the questionable wilderness values of Cactus Plains, it is inevitable that the area will see a tremendous growth of residential and commercial development, including an airport facility. There is no doubt but that the encroachment of development will be an adverse pressure on managing Cactus Plain as a wilderness area. The town is currently surrounded on all sides by an Indian reservation, and the new townside offers the opportunity for growth and economic development. The potential of the new townsite being bounded by the reservation on the west and a wilderness area on the east leaves little optimism for growth. The ability of the BLM to manage the area as wilderness under such encroachment must be considered, as should the opportunities for those who will be in the immediate vicinity to use the area for a variety of recreation purposes.

The inclusion of the Upper Burro Creek Wilderness Area also troubles me. Included in the 27,390 acre area are 6,400 acres of private, subsurface mineral rights owned by Santa Fe Minerals. While Santa Fe has over the last few years negotiated the exchange of more than 140,000 acres of subsurface mineral rights to clear the way for the designation of 8 wilderness areas included in this bill, and the Havasu National Wildlife Refuge included in H.R. 2571, the inclusion of Upper Burro Creek will force the company to look toward yet another exchange rather than be encumbered with the difficulties of developing their holdings in a wilderness area.

Further, Upper Burro Creek is within a mile or so of an existing copper mine, owned by Cyprus Minerals. That mine contributes more than 620 jobs and in 1989, generated about $2 million in tax revenue to the economy of the area and the State. The designation of Upper Burro Creek will undoubtedly have an adverse impact on the operation of the mine, and can only throw the future expansion of the mining operation into serious doubt.

In an overzealous effort to protect public lands from human intrusion, we are too often sacrificing the historical use of lands by a public which deserves consideration in their use and access to public resources. Mr. Chairman, Arizona is the sixth largest State in the Union—with more than 113,000 square miles and over 72 million acres. Yet, only 18 percent of the State is privately owned. Consequently, every decision we make regarding public resources is extremely critical.

While we heard and responded to some of the concerns which have been expressed by those Arizonans who are directly affected by the decisions in this bill, I do not believe that this bill is in the best interest of Arizona's future.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to take a hard look at the contents and the consequences of this bill, and to vote no.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I simply would like to say in closing that I and all my colleagues do appreciate the efforts of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP]. We recognize his concerns. He and his staff worked just as hard as anybody else on this issue.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired

Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each section shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The text of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

H.R. 2570

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Arizona Desert Wilderness Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. WILDERNESS DESIGNATION AND MANAGEMENT.

(a) DESIGNATION.—In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act, the following public lands are hereby designated as wilderness and therefore, as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System:

(1) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 23,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mount Wilson Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Mount Wilson Wilderness.

(2) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 31,070 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mount Tipton Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Mount Tipton Wilderness.

(3) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 27,530 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mount Nutt Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Mount Nutt Wilderness.

(4) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 76,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Warm Springs Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Warm Springs Wilderness.

(5) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 15,900 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Aubrey Peak Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Aubrey Peak Wilderness.

(6) Certain lands in La Paz County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 14,630 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "East Cactus Plain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the East Cactus Plain Wilderness.

(7) Certain lands in Mohave and Yavapai Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 41,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Rawhide Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Rawhide Mountains Wilderness.

(8) Certain lands in Mohave, Yavapai, and La Paz Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 129,525 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Arrastra Mountain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Arrastra Mountain Wilderness.

(9) Certain lands in La Paz County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 25,287 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Harcuvar Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Harcuvar Mountains Wilderness.

(10) Certain lands in La Paz and Maricopa Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 22,865 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Harquahala Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Harquahala Mountains Wilderness.

(11) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 20,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Big Horn Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Big Horn Mountains Wilderness.

(12) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 30,170 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Hummingbird Springs Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Hummingbird Springs Wilderness.

(13) Certain lands in La Paz, Yuma, and Maricopa Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 94,100 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Eagletail Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Eagletail Mountains Wilderness.

(14) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 15,250 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Signal Mountain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Signal Mountains Wilderness.

(15) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 61,000 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Woolsey Peak Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Woolsey Peak Wilderness.

(16) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 14,500 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Sierra Estrella Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Sierra Estrella Wilderness.

(17) Certain lands in Maricopa and Pinal Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 34,400 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Table Top Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Table Top Wilderness.

(18) Certain lands in Pima County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 5,080 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Coyote Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Coyote Mountains Wilderness.

(19) Certain lands in Pima County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 2,065 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Baboquivari Peak Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Baboquivari Peak Wilderness.

(20) Certain lands in Gila County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 9,201 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Needle's Eye Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Needle's Eye Wilderness. The right-of-way reserved by right-of-way reservation A-16043 dated October 20, 1986, together with the right of ingress and egress thereto, shall not be affected by this Act, and the existing powerline utilizing such right-of-way may be operated, maintained, and upgraded, subject to reasonable requirements to protect wilderness values.

(21) Certain lands in Graham County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 6,590 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "North Santa Teresa Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the North Santa Teresa Wilderness.

(22) Certain lands in Graham County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 10,883 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Fishhooks Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Fishhooks Wilderness.

(23) Certain lands in Cochise County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 11,998 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Dos Cabezas Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Dos Cabezas Mountains Wilderness.

(24) Certain lands in Graham County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 6,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Redfield Canyon Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Redfield Canyon Wilderness.

(25) Certain lands in La Paz County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 18,805 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Gibraltar Mountain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Gibraltar Mountain Wilderness.

(26) Certain lands in La Paz County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 15,755 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Swansea Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Swansea Wilderness.

(27) Certain lands in La Paz County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 29,095 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Trigo Mountain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Trigo Mountain Wilderness.

(28) Certain lands in Yuma County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 8,855 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Muggins Mountain Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Muggins Mountain Wilderness.

(29) Certain lands in Yavapai and Maricopa Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 9,200 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Hells Canyon Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Hells Canyon Wilderness.

(30) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 63,600 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "North Maricopa Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the North Maricopa Mountains Wilderness.

(31) Certain lands in Maricopa County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 72,004 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "South Maricopa Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the South Maricopa Mountains Wilderness.

(32) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 38,400 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Wabayuma Peak Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Wabayuma Peak Wilderness.

(33) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 27,390 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Upper Burro Creek Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Upper Burro Creek Wilderness.

(34) Certain lands in Yavapai County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 11,840 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Hassayampa River Canyon Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Hassayampa River Canyon Wilderness.

(35) Certain lands in Pinal County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 5,800 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "White Canyon Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the White Canyon Wilderness.

(36) Certain lands in Mohave County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 8,700 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Tres Alamos Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Tres Alamos Wilderness.

(37) Certain lands in Cochise County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 19,650 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Peloncillo Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the Peloncillo Mountains Wilderness.

(38) Certain lands in Yuma County, Arizona, which comprise approximately 21,860 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "New Water Mountains Wilderness" and dated February 1990, and which shall be known as the New Water Mountains Wilderness.

(39) Certain lands in Gila and Graham Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately 12,711 acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Aravaipa Wilderness Additions" and dated February 1990, and which shall be added to and managed as part of Aravaipa Wilderness.

(b) MANAGEMENT.—Subject to valid existing rights, the wilderness area designated by this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary") in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act (or any similar reference) shall be deemed to be a reference to the date of enactment of this Act.

(c) MAP AND LEGAL DESCRIPTION.—As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall file a map and a legal description of each wilderness area designated under this section with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate. Such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act, except that correction of clerical and typographical errors in such legal description and map may be made. Such map and legal description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Director, Bureau of Land Management, United States Department of the Interior.

(d) NO BUFFER ZONES.—The Congress does not intend for designation of wilderness area in the State of Arizona to lead to the creation of protective perimeters or buffer zones around any such wilderness area. The fact that nonwilderness activities or uses can be seen or heard from areas within a wilderness shall not, of itself, preclude such activities or uses up to the boundary of the wilderness area.

(e) FISH AND WILDLIFE.—As provided in paragraph (7) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act, nothing in this Act or in the Wilderness Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the State of Arizona with respect to wildlife and fish on the public lands located in that State.

(f) LIVESTOCK.—(1) Grazing of livestock in wilderness areas designated by this Act, where established prior to the date of the enactment of this Act, shall be administered in accordance with section 4(d)(4) of the Wilderness Act and the guidelines set forth in Appendix A of the Report of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to accompany H.R. 2570 of the One Hundred First Congress (H. Rept. 101-405).

(2) The Secretary is directed to review all policies, practices, and regulations of the Bureau of Land Management regarding livestock grazing in Bureau of Land Management Wilderness areas in Arizona in order to insure that such policies, practices, and regulations fully conform with and implement the intent of Congress regarding grazing in such areas, as such intent is expressed in this Act.

(g) WATER.—With respect to each wilderness area designated by this Act, Congress hereby reserves a quantity of water sufficient to fulfill the purposes of this Act. The priority date of such reserved rights shall be the date of enactment of this Act. The Secretary of the Interior shall file a claim for the quantification of such rights in an appropriate stream adjudication, and shall take all steps necessary to protect such rights in such an adjudication. The Federal water rights reserved by this Act shall be in addition to any water rights which may have been previously reserved or obtained by the United States for other than wilderness purposes.

(h) WILDLIFE MANAGEMENT.—In furtherance of the purposes and principles of the Wilderness Act, management activities to maintain or restore fish and wildlife populations and the habitats to support such populations may be carried out within wilderness areas, where consistent with relevant wilderness management plans, in accordance with appropriate policies and guidelines such as those set forth in appendix B of the Report of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to accompany H.R. 2570 of the One Hundred First Congress (H. Rept. 101-).

SEC. 3. CONGRESSIONAL FINDING.

Excepting for the Baker Canyon area (AZ-040-070), and the approximately 57,800 acres of public land as generally depicted on a map entitled "Cactus Plain Wilderness Study Area" dated February, 1990, the Congress hereby finds and directs that all public lands in Arizona, administered by the Bureau of Land Management pursuant to the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 not designated as wilderness by this Act, or previous Acts of Congress, have been adequately studied for wilderness designation pursuant to section 603 of such Act and are no longer subject to the requirement of section 603(c) of such Act pertaining to the management of wilderness study areas in a manner that does not impair the suitability of such areas for preservation as wilderness.

SEC. 4. GILA BOX RIPARIAN NATIONAL CONSERVATION AREA.

(a) PURPOSES.—In order to conserve, protect, and enhance the riparian and associated areas described in subsection (b) and the aquatic, wildlife, archeological, paleontological, scientific, cultural, recreational, educational, scenic, and other resources and values of such areas, there is hereby established the Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area (hereafter in this section referred to as the "conservation area").

(b) AREAS INCLUDED.—The conservation area shall consist of the public lands generally depicted on a map entitled "Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area" dated February 1990, and comprising approximately 20,900 acres.

(c) MAP.—As soon as practicable after the date of enactment of this Act, a map and legal description of the conservation area shall be filed by the Secretary with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate. Such map shall have the same force and effect as if included in this section. Copies of such map shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Director of the Bureau of Land Management, Department of the Interior, and in appropriate office of the Bureau of Land Management in Arizona.

(d) MANAGEMENT OF CONSERVATION AREA.—(1) The Secretary shall manage the conservation area in a manner that conserves, protects, and enhances its resources and values (including the resources and values specified in subsection (a)), pursuant to the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 and other applicable law, including this section.

(2) The Secretary shall allow only such uses of the conservation area as the Secretary finds will further the purposes for which the conservation area is established. Except where needed for administrative purposes or to respond to an emergency, use of motorized vehicles in the conservation area shall be permitted only on roads specifically designated for such use as part of the management plan prepared pursuant to this section.

(e) WITHDRAWAL AND WATER.—(1) Subject to valid existing rights, all Federal lands within the conservation area are hereby withdrawn from all forms of entry, appropriation, or disposal under the public land laws; from location, entry, and patent under the United States mining laws; and from disposition under all laws pertaining to mineral and geothermal leasing, and all amendments thereto.

(2) Congress hereby reserves a quantity of water sufficient to fulfill the purposes (as specified in subsection (a)) for which the conservation area is established. The priority date of this reserved right shall be the date of enactment of this Act. The Secretary shall file a claim for the quantification of this right in an appropriate stream adjudication, and shall take all steps necessary to protect such right in such adjudication. The Federal water right reserved by this paragraph shall be in addition to any other water rights reserved or obtained by the United States.

(f) MANAGEMENT PLAN.—(1) No later than two years after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall develop a comprehensive plan for the long-term management of the conservation area in order to fulfill the purposes for which the conservation area is established. The management plan shall be developed with full public participation and shall include provisions designed to assure protection of the resources and values (including the resources and values specified in subsection (a)) of the conservation area. For the purposes of this section, the term "management plan" means the plan developed under this subsection.

(2) The management plan shall include a discussion of the desirability of the inclusion in the conservation area of additional lands, including the lands not in Federal ownership that are contiguous to the boundary of the conservation area (as depicted on the map referenced in subsection (b) or as hereafter adjusted pursuant to subsection (g)) and within the area extending two miles on either side of the centerline of Eagle Creek from the point where Eagle Creek crosses the southern boundary of the Apache National Forest to the confluence of Eagle Creek with the Gila River (this area is hereafter referred to in this section as the "Eagle Creek riparian area").

(3) In order to better implement the management plan, the Secretary may enter into cooperative agreements with appropriate State and local agencies pursuant to section 307(b) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976.

(4) In order to assist in the development and implementation of the management plan, the Secretary may authorize appropriate research, including research concerning the environmental, biological, hydrological, cultural, and other characteristics, resources, and values of the conservation area, pursuant to section 307(a) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976.

(g) ACQUISITION AND BOUNDARY ADJUSTMENTS.—(1) The Secretary is authorized to acquire non-Federal lands or interests therein within the boundaries of the conservation system unit or within the Eagle Creek riparian area.

(2) The Secretary is authorized to adjust the boundaries of the conservation area so as to incorporate within the conservation area any lands or interests within the Eagle

Creek riparian area that may be acquired after the date of enactment of this Act as well as public lands within that portion of the Eagle Creek riparian area west of the centerline of Eagle Creek that the Secretary finds appropriate in order to properly manage such acquired lands as part of the conservation area. Any lands or interests so incorporated shall be managed as part of the conservation area.

(3) No lands or interests therein owned by the State of Arizona or any political subdivision of such State shall be acquired pursuant to this subsection except through donation or exchange, and no lands or interests within the conservation area or the Eagle Creek riparian area shall be acquired from any other party or entity except by donation, exchange, or purchase with the consent of the owner of such lands or interests.

(h) NO BUFFER ZONES, AND SO FORTH.—The Congress does not intend for the establishment of the conservation area to lead to the creation of protective perimeters or buffer zones around the conservation area. The fact that there may be activities or uses on lands outside the conservation area not permitted in the conservation area shall not preclude such activities or uses up to the boundary of the conservation area to the extent consistent with other applicable law.

(i) ADVISORY COMMITTEE.—The Secretary shall establish an advisory committee to advise the Secretary with respect to the preparation and implementation of the management plan. Such advisory committee shall consist of seven members appointed by the Secretary. One member shall be appointed from nominations supplied by the Governor of Arizona and one member each shall be appointed from nominations supplied by the supervisors of Graham and Greenlee Counties, respectively. The remaining members shall be persons with recognized backgrounds in wildlife conservation, riparian ecology, archeology, paleontology, or other disciplines directly related to the purposes for which the conservation area is established.

(j) REPORT.—No later than five years after the date of enactment of this Act, and at least each ten years thereafter, the Secretary shall report to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate on the implementation of this section, the condition of the resources and values of the conservation area, and the progress of the Secretary in achieving the purposes for which the conservation area is established.

(k) ENFORCEMENT.—Any person who violates any regulation promulgated by the Secretary to implement this section shall be subject to a fine in accordance with applicable provisions of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 (18 U.S.C. 3572) or to imprisonment for at least six months but no more than one year, or both such fine and imprisonment.

(l) AUTHORIZATION.—There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to implement the provisions of this section.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. VENTO

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a series of technical amendments, which have been cleared with the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. VENTO:

Page 3, line 11, change "Yavapai" to "La Paz".

Page 3, line 19, change "129,525" to "126,760".

Page 4, line 24, change "94,100" to "89,000".

Page 9, line 2, change "72,004" to "60,800".

Page 9, line 12, change "Mohave" to "Yavapai".

Page 16, line 18, change "reserved" to "which may have been previously reserved".

Page 19, line 1, strike ", AND SO FORTH".

Page 19, line 5, change "not" to "that would not be".

Page 19, line 7, after "activities or uses" insert "on such lands".

Mr. VENTO (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc, considered as read, and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, these are simply technical amendments in nature. As I said, they have already been cleared with the minority. They correct some typographical errors in the committee substitute, revise some section headings, revise acreages to reflect the recalculations made by the Bureau of Land Management and make similar technical changes. I know of no objection to them and I urge their adoption.

I would be happy to yield to the manager on the part of the minority, if he wishes, for concurrence in my technical amendments.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RHODES. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, we have reviewed the technical amendments. We agree with them, and we have no objection to them.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's comments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

The amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. KOLBE

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. KOLBE: Page 6, after line 24, insert the following: "The Secretary of the Interior, acting through the Bureau of Indian Affairs, shall administer that portion of the Black Rock Wash Road located within the boundaries of the San Carlos Apache Reservation so as to allow reasonable use of the road for private and administrative purposes and may permit limited public use of such road for the purpose of access to the public lands outside the reservation boundary.".

Page 13, after line 21, insert the following:

(i) AMENDMENT.—Section 101(a)(23) of the Arizona Wilderness Act of 1984 (98 Stat. 1487) is amended by striking "the governmental agency having jurisdictional authority may authorize limited access to the area, for private and administrative purposes, from U.S. Route 70 along Black Rock Wash to the vicinity of Black Rock;".

Mr. KOLBE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, the intent of this amendment is to clarify rights and uses along a road which passes through the San Carlos Indian Reservation on its way from U.S. Route 70 to several ranches and the North Santa Theresa Wilderness Area. This amendment should resolve longstanding questions which have put the private landowners, the tribe and the land management agencies in a perpetual state of potential conflict.

This amendment clarifies that the administration of the road is the responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior, working through the Bureau of Indian Affairs. This ensures that decisions will be made with utmost sensitivity to the needs of the San Carlos Apache Tribe, as well as the ranchers who live between the reservation and the wilderness, and the land management agencies and public visitors.

There is some question extant about whether the Black Rock Wash Road, where it passes through the reservation, is a tribal road or a public road. This amendment does not attempt to answer that question. Emotions run too high, and the stakes are too great for that kind of confrontation to be joined here. Rather, within that uncertainty, this amendment endeavors to establish a structure and a process which will meet the needs of all concerned parties.

The San Carlos Apaches have legitimate concerns about the possibility that increased public access along the Black Rock Wash Road could lead to increased vandalization, looting of cultural resources, or other criminal activities. They assert that their law enforcement capabilities in this remote area require the implementation of a permit system so that they can keep tabs on those who enter their reservation.

This system is not to be applied to the private landowners whose only access to their land is through the reservation. At this time, these families are not required to obtain permits. Based on recognition, the tribal authorities allow these non-Indian families to proceed to their homes and to their grazing allotments. Those that are not recognized are stopped.

However, this is a haphazard system which creates tensions and uncertainties. I intend to convene a meeting with the tribal chairman of the San Carlos Apaches, and to include the Bureau of Land Management, the Forest Service, and the private landowners, to see if this system can be refined and coordinated.

Many members of the public will no doubt want to visit the new North Santa Theresa Wilderness, and the adjacent Santa Theresa Wilderness designated in the 1984 Arizona RARE II Act. Such visits should not be denied, but they can be managed through a permit system that is flexible and accessible. Such a permit system will serve to protect both the San Carlos Apache's and the ranchers in the area.

This permit system should not be extended to the ranchers themselves. They have the right to all reasonable access they may desire so they can carry out their daily activities. Working together with the tribe, they can ensure that problems along the road are reported and repaired. The potential for mutual cooperation and assistance between the tribe and the ranchers is great.

If the designation of wilderness is responsible for increased traffic along Black Rock Wash Road, I am prepared to advocate increased appropriations for the San Carlos Apaches for both law enforcement and maintenance. Funds for these activities are authorized under the Snyder Act, and not by the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act of 1990.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in an attempt to make the designation of the North Santa Theresa Wilderness a constructive vehicle for resolving longstanding frictions. I ask for the support of the House membership in this effort so that the rights of the tribe, the private inholders, the land management agencies and the public will be clear.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendments en bloc.

Mr. Chairman, just briefly, I want to rise in support.

I have consulted with the chairman, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], on this amendment. Obviously the amendments en bloc repeal a section of the law that was written in the Wilderness Act of 1984, and it further goes on to direct the Secretary of the Interior to provide, and to try to resolve these access problem for private inholders, for public land management purposes, and for some public use with regard to access to the wilderness.

This amendment, we think, is necessary and feel that it is appropriate to place in the bill so that we can resolve this particular issue in Arizona.

We look forward to working with the gentleman as the administrative procedure emanates from this legislative direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

The amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. RHODES

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. RHODES: Page 13, strike lines 1 through 11 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(g) WATER.—(1) With respect to each wilderness area designated by this Act, Congress hereby reserves a quantity of water sufficient to fulfill the purposes of this Act. The priority date of such reserved rights shall be the date of enactment of this Act.

"(2) The Secretary of the Interior and all other officers of the United States shall take all steps necessary to protect the rights reserved by paragraph (1), including the filing by the Secretary of a claim for the quantification of such rights in any present or future appropriate stream adjudication in the courts of the State of Arizona in which the United States is or may be joined and which is conducted in accordance with the McCarran Amendment, 43 U.S.C. 666."

"(3) Nothing in this Act shall be construed as a relinquishment or reduction of any water rights reserved or appropriated by the United States in the State of Arizona on or before the date of enactment of this Act."

"(4) The federal water rights reserved by this Act are specific to the wilderness areas and national conservation area located in the State of Arizona designated by this Act. Nothing in this Act related to reserved federal water rights shall be construed as establishing a precedent with regard to any future designations, nor shall it constitute an interpretation of any other Act or any designation made pursuant thereto." Page 16, strike lines 10 through 19 in their entirety and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"(2)(A) Congress hereby reserves a quantity of water sufficient to fulfill the purposes (as specified in subsection (a)) for which the conservation area is established. The priority date of this reserved right shall be the date of enactment of this Act.

"(B) The Secretary of the Interior and all other officers of the United States shall take all steps necessary to protect the right reserved by this paragraph, including the filing by the Secretary of a claim for the quantification of such right in any present or future appropriate stream adjudication in the courts of the State of Arizona in which the United States is or may be joined and which is conducted in accordance with the McCarran Amendment, 43 U.S.C. 666."

Mr. RHODES (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, let me say for the record that this amendment is cosponsored by myself, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL], the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE], the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

As I mentioned in my remarks during general debate, this issue concerning water rights and the adjudication of water rights has been the most difficult for us to resolve during our negotiations on the bill. There has been honest disagreement on both sides as to just exactly how this issue should be addressed. Again, let me reiterate that the question is not the existence of a Federal reserve water right. That has always been in the bill. It has always been agreed to by all parties to this debate. That is not the issue.

The issue is how, where, and when should that right be quantified and adjudicated. Our concern has been the forum in which those rights should be determined. It has been our concern that they be done in Arizona, that they be adjudicated in the Arizona courts under the Arizona system.

This amendment, which is now agreed to by all those who have been engaged in this debate, speaks to those concerns raised by those of us from Arizona worried about this particular issue, and I particularly want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL], for the work he put in on helping us to be able to come to closure on this issue.

The amendment makes specific reference to our intention that these reserve water rights should be quantified and adjudicated in the courts of the State. The amendment resolves the conflict between existing bill language and existing report language regarding the nature of the wilderness water right.

I need to elaborate on that briefly. These wilderness water rights will not necessarily be greater than any existing Federal water rights which the United States may have acquired for any other purposes. That will be determined in the State quantification process, and in any case, no existing Federal water rights are intended to be relinquished or diminished in any way under this amendment.

This language was supported by the State of Arizona, specifically by the Arizona Department of Water Resources.

Finally, the amendment asserts that the water language applies to this bill, the Arizona Bureau of Land Management Wilderness bill, and not to any past or future wilderness bills in any other State. It is our firm belief that these issues related to water should be resolved on a State-by-State basis as each State's BLM and Forest Service wilderness bills are brought to the floor of this House for consideration. We have no intention, no intention, that the solution to this problem that we have found for our State should be imposed upon any other State. We believe the compromise addresses our concerns for Arizona.

As I have just said, we do not expect that they will address or resolve concerns in other States.

Mr. Chairman, at this point, I would like to engage the chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO], in a colloquy with respect to these amendments and certain portions of them.

Mr. Chairman, is it your understanding that in order to quantify the Federal reserved water rights being created, the Secretary of the Interior would file a claim in an appropriate stream adjudication in the courts of the State of Arizona?

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. The McCarran amendment allows the United States to be joined as a defendant in a general stream adjudication in State courts. It is my expectation that when the United States is so joined, that the Secretary will participate under the McCarran amendment to adjudicate the Federal reserve water rights created by H.R. 2570 in the Arizona State court system.

Mr. RHODES. Although the Secretary retains the right to file in the Federal district court in cases in which the United States is not joined, would the amended bill require that he file there?

Mr. VENTO. No. The amendments do not amend the McCarran amendment, so neither the State court option nor the Federal court option would be mandated. However, with regard to the Federal reserve rights being created for wilderness areas in Arizona, we expect that the Secretary act to quantify such rights through the State system, when afforded an appropriate opportunity to do so consistent with the McCarran amendment.

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman anticipate a filing by the Secretary in Federal district court with respect to the Gila or Little Colorado River systems?

Mr. VENTO. We have been informed that the pending State adjudications of the Gila and Little Colorado River systems presumably may serve as the appropriate forum for quantification of the rights reserved by the bill related to those systems. Further, it is my understanding that if the Secretary were to file for claims on those systems in the Federal district court, the proceedings would probably be removed to State court.

Mr. RHODES. Does the gentleman or the committee anticipate a filing by the Secretary in Federal district court with respect to the Federal reserved rights being created on the Bill Williams River?

Mr. VENTO. No State adjudication is currently pending for the Bill Williams. The committee does not intend to prompt a premature adjudication on the Bill Williams, as was noted in the committee's report. Based on what we know now, we do expect that the Secretary would more than likely file for quantification of rights in a future Bill Williams adjudication in the courts of the State of Arizona at the appropriate time.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his participation. I would remind the Committee of the Whole and the House that this has been a hard fought amendment. We are pleased to be joined in it by our colleagues. I would urge its adoption.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. Before we wind up tonight, I want to respond to the compliments that have been showered upon me. I want to return the compliments, especially to my colleague, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES]. The gentleman has been almost an instant leader since he came to the committee. He is responsible, long suffering, innovative, and just a genuine good legislator.

The gentleman could have ducked the issue. He could have sabotaged what was going on here at several points. But, working with the gentlemen from Arizona, Mr. STUMP, Mr. KOLBE, and Mr. KYL, they have a lot to be proud of. I think Arizona in looking back will have to say this is one of the finest hours of our congressional delegation.

Mr. Chairman, I support this amendment. I join in the colloquy, which has accurately stated my position.

Mr. Chairman, I am extremely pleased that we have been able to arrive at an understanding on this very important matter. The issue of Federal reserved water rights for wilderness areas created by this act is without doubt among the most hotly contested and complex of the many issues we have faced in this legislation.

Over the past several months, there have been very detailed discussions between myself, my colleagues in the Arizona delegation and the relevant subcommittee chairmen. We have learned a great deal in the course of those discussions, which led directly to the agreement now before us. I believe this amendment is an important and appropriate clarification of the language previously agreed to by the Interior Committee.

Those concerned that the water rights reserved by H.R. 2570 be adjudicated and quantified in Arizona State courts under Arizona water law can expect that they will be. At the same time, we have left the McCarran amendment fully intact and protected the ability of the United States to defend its rights in appropriate court proceedings.

I want to associate myself entirely with the colloquy that has just been entered into regarding the meaning and intent of the amendment and say that I share their interpretation.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend Mr. RHODES, Mr. KYL, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. VENTO for the diligent and patient work on this amendment. It is important work and I am pleased to support it.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendments en bloc and have joined as an author of it myself with Chairman UDALL. These amendments would revise the language in the bill dealing with the reservation of water rights. The first amendment would apply to the water rights reserved with respect to the 39 wilderness areas designated by the bill, and also would state that nothing in the bill should be construed as a relinquishment of any other Federal water rights in Arizona.

The second amendment is similar, but relates specifically to the reservation of a water right related to the Gila Box Riparian National Conservation Area that would be established by section 4 of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, these amendments would require the Secretary of the Interior and all other officials of the National Government to take whatever steps may be necessary to protect the water rights that would be reserved by the bill. One of those steps would be the filing of claims for the quantification of the amounts of water reserved by the bill, in any present or future appropriate stream adjudication in the Arizona courts in which the United States is joined under the McCarran amendment, and which is conducted in accordance with that provision of existing law.

As a practical matter, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what we would expect would happen in any event, whether or not this language is included in the bill. In fact, the committee has been told that about 90 percent of the streams in Arizona are already the subject of State adjudications, and after enactment of this bill the water rights reserved by the bill will be added to the matters dealt with in those proceedings. And, for the major river system not now in adjudication, the Bill Williams River, the major concern of the State, as explained to us, is that adjudication not occur too soon. Neither the bill as reported nor these amendments would require that. This is explained in detail in the committee's report, and that discussion will remain applicable after adoption of the amendments.

Still, Mr. Chairman, I support the amendments because it seems appropriate to include their explicit reference to State stream adjudications.

At the same time, the amendments would leave intact the existing law and practice in this area, specifically the McCarran amendment, which provides the basis for concurrent Federal and State court jurisdiction over adjudication of Federal water rights. This is a most important point, because I am convinced that this existing law is sound and works well, not only in Arizona but in other States as well.

The existing law is not "broken," Mr. Chairman, and so Congress should not be "fixing" it in the context of this bill.

As to the part of the amendments that disclaim any intent to relinquish any existing Federal water rights, that is really only a rewording of what is now in the bill. I believe that the bill as it stands means and accomplishes the same thing, but the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES], and others have raised questions about it, and prefer the rewording included in the amendments. I believe that the effect is exactly the same, and so I support the rewordings.

So, Mr. Chairman, to summarize, these amendments would leave existing law, including the McCarran amendment intact. They would not change the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. They would not reduce the procedural options now available to officials of the national government to protect the rights of the United States or to enforce or implement such Federal laws as the Endangered Species Act. They would not require quantification in State courts. However, they would accurately reflect a congressional expectation that these the Federal reserved water rights will presumably be quantified in the State courts of Arizona in adjudications in which the United States has been joined under the provisions of the McCarran amendment.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, these amendments en bloc maintain the same careful, sound balance between Federal and State judicial jursidiction and procedures as reflected in the McCarran amendment and other existing law and practice.

The amendments deserve the strong approval of the House and I urge their adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES].

The amendments were agreed to.

Are there any further amendments to the bill?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. FLIPPO) having assumed the chair, Mr. MAZZOLI, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2570), to provide for the designation of certain public lands as wilderness in the State of Arizona, pursuant to House Resolution 338, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device and there were—yeas 356, nays 45, not voting 30, as follows:

Messrs. STANGELAND, GALLEGLY, MORRISON of Washington, YOUNG of Alaska, and WAXMAN, changed their vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 2570, ARIZONA DESERT WILDERNESS ACT OF 1990

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to make technical, conforming and grammatical corrections in the engrossment of H.R. 2570, Arizona Desert Wilderness Act of 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks, and include therein extraneous material on H.R. 2570, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 18.

LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time for the purpose of receiving the schedule for the rest of the day and for next week.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my friend, the majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The House has finished its business for the day. There will be no legislative business on tomorrow, March 1. The House will not be in session on Friday, March 2.

On Monday, March 5, the House will meet at noon, but again, no legislative business. Tuesday, March 6, the House will meet at noon to consider six bills under suspension, first,

H.R. 4077, regarding Farmers Home Administration delinquent loans and inventory.

H.R. 4099, to suspend section 332 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 for the 1991 crop of wheat.

H.R. 1159, to amend the National Trails System Act by designating the Juan Bautista de Anza National Historic Trail.

H.R. 1109, California National Historic Trail and Pony Express National Trail.

H.R. 1243, requiring the Secretary of Energy to establish three Centers for Metal Casting Competitiveness Research.

H. Res. 17, to provide for the concurrence of the House to the amendments of the Senate to H.R. 1396, with an amendment.

On Wednesday, March 7, and Thursday, March 8, the House will meet at 10 a.m.

On March 7, the House will recess immediately and reconvene at 11 a.m. to receive His Excellency, the President of the Council of Ministers of the Italian Republic, Mr. Giulio Andreotti, in a joint meeting. Following the joint meeting, the House will reconvene for legislative business.

The House meets at 11 a.m. on Thursday, March 8, and legislative business will be H.R. 1231, to establish a Commission To Investigate and Report Respecting the Dispute Between Eastern Airlines and Its Collective Bargaining Units (veto override; 1 hour debate), and H.R. 3581, Rural Economic Development Act (subject to a rule).

On Friday, March 9, the House will not be in session.

On Tuesday, March 6, as I said, there will be six suspension bills. The votes will be held until after all of the suspensions have been considered. We will have votes on that day.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask a couple of questions: Does the gentleman know, will the majority be appointing conferees on the TV violence bill, H.R. 1391?

Mr. GEPHARDT. If the gentleman will yield, we will be, but not this week. It will be sometime soon in the future.

Mr. GINGRICH. So, sometime after the week of the 6th?

Mr. GEPHARDT. It will not be next week. It will be sometime after that.

Mr. GINGRICH. Second, when will we have an anticipated vote schedule for the rest of March for Members who are trying to figure out when they will go back and forth to their districts?

Mr. GEPHARDT. We will provide for Members a March calendar before this week is out, either tomorrow or the next day. Most likely, tomorrow.

Mr. GINGRICH. Lastly, I noticed with some concern this morning, the fall in the durable goods order for January, and that brings Members back to the question of a tax bill, and the capital gains proposal by the President, or a modified version thereof.

Do you have any notion at this time as to when Members might expect the Committee on Ways and Means to be reporting such a bill?

Mr. GEPHARDT. As the gentleman knows, there is a capital gains bill in the Senate at this time. We will be proceeding on the budget, and our reconciliation, and obviously, tax and revenue measures in that context as well. Therefore, I believe there will be ample opportunities in the near future for Members of both sides to consider questions on the Tax Code.

Mr. GINGRICH. I only raised it because I think there is some very real concern about the danger of the economy sliding into recession, and we are looking, frankly, for some legitimate ways to accelerate economic growth. I appreciate the knowledge that we will, between the budget and other things, be getting on to that.

ADJOURNMENT FROM THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1990, TO MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that then the House adjourns on Thursday, March 1, 1990, it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday, March 5, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday, March 6, 1990, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. on Wednesday, March 7, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

REPEAL THE EARNINGS TEST

(Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise once again to encourage my colleagues to join in repealing the Social Security earnings test limit by passing H.R. 2460, introduced by our colleague, Representative DENNIS HASTERT, of Illinois, and already sponsored by 174 of our Members.

In the past 6 months the world has witnessed the creation of new freedom in Eastern Europe and now Nicaragua. It's about time this body created some new freedom from oppressive tax laws. If any law which imposes a 50-percent tax on any person, but especially a senior citizen, that law is unfair, oppressive and must be discarded. Let us abolish this unfair tax.

Abolishing this tax will be good for seniors, national productivity, and our entire economy. Restoring freedom from the Social Security earnings tax will be beneficial to the American economy and will increase the productivity of our most talented and experienced labor resource—our senior citizens.

[From the Dayton Daily, Sept. 20, 1989]

SENIORS' CRY: PRODUCTIVE LIVES AFTER 65

(By Joan Beck)

CHICAGO.—Generational jealousy is growing. Complaints are multiplying that the nation's workers can no longer afford to support its elderly in the style to which they now feel entitled. The urgent needs of millions of poor children go unmet while affluent seniors clutch benefits they don't need.

Why should the able-bodied elderly idle away their energies in the sunshine when everyone else has to work so hard?

The question makes increasing sense. The 65-and-older set is healthier than ever before. Life expectancy is increasing. Demographics and economic realities will eventually force bitterly resented cutbacks in Social Security and Medicare promises.

Why not rethink the traditional life-and work stages and spread work more evenly over the adult years? Why not ease some of the frantic pressures of career and family on young adults and extend the years of productivity and earning into what can now be two decades or more of retirement?

These should be logical questions for this nation to consider in the decades ahead. And adventuresome people should be encouraged to try some life style experiments that would help find necessary answers. Instead, they are stopped cold by brutal tax policies that lock most of the elderly into idleness.

Two small cases suggest the problem; a 67-year-old man and a 65-year-old woman.

He wasn't ready to retire, he decided, after he'd tried it. He had too much energy to be satisfied with golf, yard work and television. He needed the mental stimulation of a job. He had employable skills. And a few more years of salary would ease his worries about running out of money before he ran out of life.

Forget it, his accountant told him. You can't afford to do more than a little part-time work. A retiree between ages 65 and 70 earns more than $8,880 a year—in essence a 50 percent marginal tax rate. Add on the 28 percent federal income tax, state income taxes, the new Medicare catastrophic coverage surtax and the Social Security taxes workers must pay even if they are 65. What's the point of working?

She isn't ready to retire, either. She hadn't held a job for 15 years while she put family needs first. Then, at 45, she'd caught the first surge in the changing opportunities for women and with energy and exhilaration earned success in a career she loves.

Now she is 65, making more money than she ever expected, her sense of identity and self-esteem so rooted in her job she can't bear to give it up. Her employer wants her to stay. But to keep working is a financially silly choice.

First, she is losing all the Social Security benefits she has paid for and could get at 65: $10,788 a year. Yet she still must pay Social Security, an annual $3,604. She's not getting the pension she could have from her employer if she retired: $19,800.

On top of that, she still has commuting and other job expenses. And she must pay federal income taxes in the 28 percent bracket on her salary, plus $800 for the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, although she uses her employer's health insurance plan and has not yet signed up for Medicare.

Now she's trying to calculate whether the psychological satisfactions she gets from her job are worth the money they are costing her.

Recently, the National Center for Policy Analysis released a new study showing that Congress could begin to correct this complex problem by raising the earnings limitations for seniors and still increase federal revenues by as much as $3.2 billion a year.

If the earnings limitations were completely abolished and elderly retirees didn't have to pay a penalty for working, about 700,000 more of them would take paying jobs, the report estimates. They would produce at least $15 billion in goods and services. That would boost federal tax revenues by $4.9 billion and more than make up for the $4.8 billion the government would pay in extra Social Security benefits.

Congress is already committed to taking one small step toward reducing the penalties on the working elderly. It is raising the limitations on earnings to $9,360 in 1990 and to $10,440 in 1991. It is also cutting the penalty on earnings over this ceiling to 33 percent instead of the current 50 percent. If the ceiling were $39,360, the federal government would net $3.2 billion, the new study calculates.

When Social Security was first set up during the Depression, one purpose was to push older workers out of the labor force to make room for unemployed younger people. That may not be desirable in the 1990s. And it may not be affordable after that.

A move is under way in Congress to abolish the earnings penalty completely on seniors who are 65 or older. At least 138 members of the House have signed on as cosponsors of the proposed legislation, pushed by the House Republican Research Committee.

A single bill won't solve the complex problems of Social Security or create a happy balance among generational interests. But it will begin to free up people financially to experiment with new solutions and to lead more productive lives after 65.

"HEAL"—HEALTHCARE EMPOWERMENT AND ACCESS LEGISLATION

(Mr. GRANDY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. GRANDY. Mr. Speaker, with the 21st century fast approaching, it is clear that a workable blueprint for health-care reform is necessary if we are to lower the cost of health care for those with coverage and widen access to those less fortunate.

Numerous studies and congressional hearings document that a rising number of Americans lack basic health care coverage. It is estimated that between 31 to 37 million Americans have no health insurance coverage at all, either public or private. The price of health care is skyrocketing for those with health coverage at a rate nearly three times the rate of inflation. Meanwhile, the United States is continuing to devote nearly 12 percent of its GNP or $650 billion per year to health care costs.

Today I am hearing a consensus among all interested parties—employers, employee organizations, consumers, health care providers, and policymakers from all ranks. These individuals are saying true health-care reform must take place and deal with the problems of access, cost, and quality. The consensus is that these issues must be placed high on our national agenda. It is in this spirit that my colleagues, Congressmen WILLIAM F. GOODLING, JIM BUNNING, and I have introduced a legislative framework to help "HEAL" these pressing problems.

In shorthand, my bill (H.R. 4070) can be described as "Healthcare Empowerment and Access Legislation," the [HEAL] bill. "HEAL" provides incentives for private and public-private partnership arrangements to be established to simultaneously address the issues of access to health care coverage and the affordability of such coverage, with an emphasis on improving health care quality.

"HEAL" offers 100 percent tax deductibility of contributions for the self-employed and their employees, preemption of State health benefit mandates, and incentives for small businesses to group together and offer soundly financed multiemployer health plans. Additionally, H.R. 4070 provides for outcomes research to educate consumers who purchase health care. This information would be used to create treatment practice guidelines that would work to reduce unnecessary services and malpractice costs.

The key to this approach is flexibility. Local government is given an opportunity to build on current successes. Ideas come from the bottom up. Upfront mandates are not passed from Washington, DC, down.

While actual policy will likely not be voted on for a few years, I firmly believe we are framing the debate on this important issue in the 101st Congress. The reason for the "HEAL" bill is to assure that discussion allows for workable solutions from the private sector. H.R. 4070 provides a framework for discussion—an effort that will require input and responsibility from all sectors, expecially employers, employees, insurers, providers, patients, Federal, State, and local government.

The "HEAL" bill is tailored to provide incentives to make health care more affordable and accessible, without heavy handed Government controls. As we renew our efforts to form a national health care strategy, I ask each Member of this body to give the H.R. 4070, "HEAL" bill, their strong consideration.

HEALTHCARE EMPOWERMENT AND ACCESS LEGISLATION [HEAL] BLUEPRINT FOR HEALTHCARE COVERAGE REFORM

With the twenty-first century fast approaching, it is clear that a workable blueprint for healthcare reform is necessary, if in the near future our Nation is to adequately address the interrelated problem of healthcare access, costs, and quality.

The problems have been well-documented in numerous studies and Congressional hearings—the rising number of Americans who lack basic health care coverage, now estimated at between 31 and 37 million individuals; the escalating costs of such coverage, especially for small businesses; the increasing structural barriers to obtaining basic coverage, e.g. because of the lack of affordability, of job mobility, of uninsurability, of pre-existing conditions, of occupational denial, and otherwise; the inability to properly evaluate the relationship of health care quality and costs; and other related concerns involving "cost-shifting", etc.

It is the consensus among all interested parties—employers, employee organizations, and other consumers; providers of healthcare services and group plan coverage; policymakers from all ranks; etc.—that these are problems deserving of being afforded a place among other national priorities. It is in this spirit that my colleagues, Rep. William F. Goodling, Rep. Jim Bunning, and I have introduced a legislative framework to help "HEAL" these pressing problems.

In shorthand, my bill (H.R. 4070) can be described as Healthcare Empowerment and Access Legislation, or "HEAL". The bill provides incentives for private and/or public-private partnership arrangements to be established to simultaneously address the issues of access to health care coverage and the affordability of such coverage, with an emphasis on improving health care quality.

To avoid the initial demand-push inflation inherent under other proposals, the bill first puts into effect various affordability and health care cost control measures.

The "HEAL" blueprint utilizes a "carrot and stick" approach to induce the development and implementation of private sector mechanisms to provide for the universal availability of health care coverage (i.e., for all citizens who do not have access to basic group health coverage and who are uninsurable or uninsured). To the extent the private sector "carrot" under Section 4 of the bill is not implemented within a fixed period of elapsed-time, a state-based "fall-back" mechanism would be triggered.

The affordability of coverage will be enhanced under the bill in several ways. First, the required universal availability of group health coverage would spread risk and help lower expenses—because employees must be offered access to employer based group health coverage; because Basic Group Health coverage must be available to other uninsured and COBRA eligibles, that is state systems may provide COBRA coverage; and because barriers would be removed and 501(c)(9) tax incentives provided to encourage soundly financed multiple employer Basic Group Health Plans.

Secondly, the ERISA preemption of state health benefit mandates under the bill will encourage insurers to offer more affordable group plans to uninsured employers.

Thirdly, the ERISA preemption of state barriers to managed care options under the bill will encourage competition, innovation of cost-control approaches, and quality review.

Fourthly, the provisions under this bill for treatment practice guidelines and outcomes research will aid in reducing unnecessary services and in increasing quality while offering a possible means for reducing malpractice costs.

Fifthly, the deduction under the bill of 100 percent of contributions for the self-employed and their employees provide coverage incentives for 25 percent of workers and their families who are currently uninsured.

After a fixed period of time, HEAL requires that all mechanisms providing universal access to coverage be implemented. First, under ERISA employers would be obligated to offer employees access to basic group health coverage. Employers are encouraged but not required to contribute to such plans. A state-based non-profit corporation would serve as a "back-up" only in the event group coverage for the employer's employees is rejected by a group health coverage provider. Secondly, individuals who would be denied access to group health coverage because of uninsurability, material pre-existing conditions, or otherwise must be eligible for coverage either under an employer based plan, a state-based system or an alternative system equivalent to the fall-back system.

HEAL also provides for a transition period to universal access to basic group health coverage. Before the effective date occurs for the fall-back state system, the Secretary of HHS may make a determination that an alternative arrangement provides "substantially equivalent" elements of health care coverage, thus obviating the need for the state system. Such determination may be made separately or in combination with respect to—(a) uninsurable risk coverage, (b) coverage for substantial material pre-existing conditions, and (c) COBRA continuation coverage for individuals ineligible for other basic group health coverage. The alternative arrangements may be voluntary or adopted pursuant to state or federal law and administrated by insurers, other providers, or various other private or public partnerships.

In summary, the Healthcare Empowerment and Access Legislation provides a workable federal framework which will induce the formation of the private and public partnerships necessary to assure that all Americans have access to more affordable health care coverage. The following is a section by section analysis of the legislation.

Under Section 1, the Short Title, reads that this Act may be cited as the "Universal Health Benefits Empowerment and Partnership Act of 1990".

Under the Section 2 "Findings and Declaration of Policy", the Congress finds that—

First—the health care delivery system of the United States provides most Americans with a level of access and quality of care that is unsurpassed;

Second—for a significant minority of Americans, the system works less well because they cannot obtain or otherwise do not have basic health care coverage under either public or private programs;

Third—these individuals represent a diversity of situations for which there is no single solution;

Fourth—assuring access to basic health care coverage and quality of care for these individuals is a compelling national priority that will require commitments from both the private and public sectors;

Fifth—the most practical and effective solutions for these access problems are ones that—preserve the pluralistic base of the health care delivery system of the United States; emphasize incentives, innovations, and the removal of current barriers to access; and recognize that both the complexity of the problem and the existence of fiscal constraints means that responsibility must be shared among employers, employees, insurers, providers, and patients, as well as Federal, State, and local governments;

Sixth—Federal efforts need to be closely coordinated with others who share in the responsibility for improving access to basic health care services;

Seventh—federal efforts need to reflect not only the diversity of interested parties but also the diversity of areas where action is appropriate, including public health, basic group health coverage, State initiatives, medical malpractice laws, Medicaid, and tax incentives; and

Eighth—improving access requires dealing with many of the most difficult problems in the health system, including—

The escalating costs, State mandated health benefits, and other factors that have made health care coverage less affordable for many employers and individuals, especially the near poor who need more creative workplace and public options to be able to obtain basic health care coverage; and

The inability of many individuals to protect themselves against catastrophic health care expenses because pre-existing conditions make them "uninsurable".

Under subsection (b), "Purposes", it is stated "Therefore the Congress declares that the purposes of this Act to be to provide a sound, flexible, and workable Federal framework to simultaneously address the issues of access to basic health care coverage and the affordability of such coverage, with an emphasis on improving health care quality by—

First—empowering employers, employees, and other individuals to obtain more affordable basic health care coverage, and

Second—providing incentives for private and public-private partnership arrangements to be established for such purposes.

Under subsection (c), "Declaration of Policy", it states that "In carrying out such purposes, it is the policy of this Act to—

First—provide universal access to basic group health coverage for all Americans under plans offered by employers or, in the case in which such coverage is unavailable to employees and other individuals from private sources or existing public programs, under a State health benefits system; and

Second—make such basic health coverage more affordable—

By removing barriers and encouraging "group" plans and arrangements to spread risk and lower expenses;

By preempting State health benefits madates, thereby encouraging group health coverage providers to offer lower cost basic coverage to the uninsured;

By preempting State barriers to the providing of managed care, thereby encouraging competition, innovation of cost-control approaches, and quality review;

By encouraging the development of treatment practice guidelines and outcomes research to aid in reducing unnecessary services, increasing quality care, and reducing malpractice costs;

By eliminating tax inequities and barriers—

First—to the full deductibility of contributions to health plans covering the self-employed, and Second—to the establishment of soundly financed multiple employer basic group health plans.

Under Section 3, it reads "Universal Coverage under Group Health Plans and State Health Benefit Systems".

In general, the key concepts under this section are:

"Universal access"—the bill provides a framework for access to basic health care coverage for all Americans;

"Partnership and Empowerment"—the bill induces federal and state governments, employers, insurers and providers to participate in constructing a workable system for providing access to basic health care coverage at more affordable costs; and

"Flexibility"—the bil provides a framework which allows states and local governments to build on current successes; encourages local resolution of the best means of targeting the uninsured population, of delivering health care services and of structuring premiums and financing to maximize program participation; it avoids rigid, detailed federal requirements which would stifle innovation, competition, and efficiency in the delivery, quality, and financing of care.

This section amends ERISA Part 6 to read "Part 6—Universal Coverage Under Group Health Plans and State Health Benefits Systems."

New Subpart A provides "Definitions and Special Rules" under Section 601.

A "Basic Group Health Plan," hereinafter referred to as a BGHP, means an ERISA health plan, or any combination of two or more plans, which includes at least a "basic health benefits provision." As explained later in more detail, each covered employer must offer coverage to certain employees (and dependents) under either one or more BGHP's or "Group Health Payroll Deduction Plans" (hereinafter referred to as a GHPDP). Although the bill does not prevent an individual who is offered coverage from rejecting such coverage (i.e., plan provisions and related contracts can continue to govern rejection of coverage), coverage must be made available to any individuals that the plan may treat, but is not required to treat, as being an "uninsurable risk" (hereinafter referred to as "UR") or having a material pre-existing condition (hereinafter referred to as a "MPC") leading to a "substantial restriction" of coverage under the plan.

The bill does not change existing law with respect to any requirement that an employer contribute to a BGHP for employees or others.

Therefore, a plan meets the requirements of a BGHP by either offering coverage regardless of a UR or MPC condition (as do many larger plans), or, if the concept of UR or MPC is continued under a plan, then coverage for such UR or MPC conditions must be made available to the affected individual under a "State Health Benefits System" (hereinafter referred to as a SHBS) or a similar private or public/private "alternative arrangement" determined by the Secretary of HHS under section 4 to meet specified requirements (for example, a statewide or nationwide reinsurance mechanism established by health care providers to assure coverage availability for UR's and MPC's). Employers would contribute to such UR and MPC arrangements for affected employees (or dependents) in the same manner and extent as if such individuals were not subject to a UR or MPC condition.

This requirement that ERISA plans offer coverage, even in the case of UR and MPC, is the jurisdictional means under the bill for encouraging employers and employees to demand the establishment of SHBS's or alternative systems providing coverage for such conditions. This mechanism will assure the universal availability of basic group health coverage for all Americans under BGHP's, SHBS's, or alternative systems.

Section 3(b) of HEAL and ERISA Section 601(3) establishes a mechanism for defining "basic health benefits provision." Not later than July 1, 1991 the Secretary of HHS would publish proposed regulations taking into account the recommendations made by the Federal Advisory Council on Health Care Coverage and Cost (see section 9). Such regulations could not be finalized before July 1, 1992 and would be subject to review by the Congress in the interim. The definition of basic health benefits, consists of two parts—services consisting of basic health care services (including physician's inpatient hospital, and outpatient hospital services which are prevalent under group health plans and other services which may be necessary for basic health care; and the reimbursement formulation defining the minimum extent to which such services are to be covered at a percentage of cost determined by the Secretary under regulations (by means of deductibles, coinsurance, and other limits on covered services) to be not less than a percentage which is, taking into account the population covered and the extent of cost currently covered under group health plans, adequate to meet basic health care needs. Under this mechanism statutory rigidity would be avoided. Section 3(b)(3) provides an administrative mechanism for periodically updating the content of basic health benefits and takes into account recommendations submitted to the Secretary by the Federal Advisory Council on Health Care Coverage and Costs.

New ERISA Subpart B of Part 6 defines Required Basic Health Care Coverage Options for Employees and Their Dependents.

ERISA Section 611 provides that each covered employer shall maintain with respect to each eligible individual a basic group health plan or a group health payroll deduction plan under which coverage of such individual may be elected. Therefore, subject to certain permitted exclusions, employees (and dependents) must be offered coverage under an employer's existing BGHP or the employer must establish one or more GHPDP's for those employees not made eligible under such existing plans. A State Health Benefit System could provide coverage to an employer plan, but only if a provider of group health plan coverage with respect to the plan rejects an individual otherwise eligible for coverage under such plan because of a requirement that a certain number or percentage of individuals otherwise eligible for coverage under the plan are not covered. Of course health care coverage providers could change current underwriting practices so as to obviate the need for the back-up state system.

All private and governmental employers are obligated to make basic group health coverage available, although newly formed and very small employers are exempted. In addition, plans may exclude certain temporary employees. Any employee (or dependent) excluded under these exceptions is still eligible to obtain basic group health coverage under a state health benefits system.

New ERISA Subpart C defines the back-up role of State Health Benefits Systems (SHBS) in providing individuals with access to basic group health coverage who are not otherwise eligible for coverage under an employer BGHP or GHPDP.

Under ERISA Section 621 a SHBS would be established as a non-profit corporation under state law and would be required to meet certain reporting, participation, benefits, contribution, and UR/MPC coverage requirements.

Under the Section 623 participation requirements eligible individuals include employees (or dependents) not otherwise eligible for coverage under GHPDP's or BGHP's; individuals no longer eligible for coverage under BGHP's or GHPDP's who are eligible for so-called COBRA continuation coverage; individuals whose benefits are limited under BGHP's and GHPDP's because of UR and MPC conditions; and other individuals not otherwise eligible for coverage under a BGHP or public program.

A number of states have a head start in the offering of health care coverage to the uninsured. The state-based mechanism under HEAL is designed to accommodate such programs and improve on the progress already made. For example the Washington State Basic Health Plan and the proposed Hawaii State Health Insurance Plan (SHIP) are innovative state-based programs offering coverage to the uninsured in those states on a basis consistent with the intent of the provisions of this bill.

Under Section 624 state system would be encouraged to offer a range of health care coverage options in order to induce individuals to choose coverage at a cost which best meets their needs and ability to pay.

State system options would include at least state-employee equivalent benefits, a "basic and catastrophic" option and a catastrophic only option. A "Medicaid-benefits" package may, but is not required, to be made available. Therefore a "Medicaid-buy-in" may be administered either under this system or outside the system.

Once eligible, early retirees and other "COBRA" individuals must continue to be eligible for state system coverage (until Medicare eligibility) although state system coverage is secondary to any ERISA employee benefit plan coverage.

The Section 625 contribution provisions permits program flexibility to vary premium rate structures by income level, geography, family composition, etc., so as to be able to maximize the number of individuals covered. The state system must provide children-only coverage and is permitted, but not required, to include a "Medicaid-buy-in" type program.

Under Section 626, state systems are enabled to reciprocate with other states to achieve benefit portability to accommodate residency changes and to achieve multistate or even a national mechanism of insurance or reinsurance for uninsurables and material pre-existing conditions.

New ERISA Subpart D of Part 6 reads "State Coverage for Uninsurable Risks and Material Pre-Existing Conditions."

Under ERISA Section 631, a state "UR" and "MPC" coverage system must meet certain participation and benefit requirements and, to the extent practicable and actuarially sound, provide for separate cost and premium structures for the experience of MPC's and UR's who are employees restricted under BGHP's (i.e., non-worker UR's could be treated separately). It should be noted that the "UR" and "MPC" elements of a state system need never be established if under Section 4 another mechanism is implemented to provide UR and MPC coverage (Subpart D serves only as a fall-back mechanism).

Under ERISA Section 632, separate experience accounts may be provided for UR's and for MPC's. State system coverage under Section 624 could also provide for UR and MPC conditions so that individuals eligible for state system coverage under Subpart C could also fall into the Subpart D UR and MPC risk-spreading coverage mechanism.

Under ERISA Section 633, individuals eligible for UR coverage must be provided the range of benefit options described in section 624; therefore a person could obtain a "high cost" or "low cost" benefit option, thus making at least some coverage more affordable.

Section 4 of HEAL provides for "Alternatives to State Health Benefit Systems."

Before the effective date for the all-back state system occurs, the Secretary of HHS may make a determination that an alternative arrangement provides "substantially equivalent';' elements of health care coverage, thus obviating the need for the state system. Such determinations may be made separately or in combination with respect to uninsurable risk coverage, coverage for material pre-existing conditions, and so-called COBRA "continuation coverage."

An example of an alternative system that HEAL would encourage and which is currently being discussed among providers of group health plan coverage might have the following elements.

First, guarantee that small employers who seek to purchase group health coverage for their employees will not be denied such coverage even if one or more employees might otherwise be either uninsurable or a high health risk.

Secondly, provide that once covered, neither the group nor an individual in the group may be denied continued coverage because the group's or the individual's health deteriorates.

Thirdly, limit the rate of year-to-year premium increases relative to other groups insured by the same group coverage provider.

Fourthly, not deny coverage or apply new preexisting condition restrictions to an insured individual in a group changing either employers or coverage providers; and

Finally, establish a privately funded and administered reinsurance mechanism through which coverage providers could reinsure high risk persons.

Under Section 5 of the Act, COBRA continuation coverage requirements can be met by employer plans by facilitating coverage of COBRA eligibles under a state system (thus relieving employers of one of the biggest disincentives to set up a plan or provide liberal eligibility rules). Existing covered plans may, but are not required, to permit COBRA eligibles to elect state system COBRA coverage. As is the case for UR and MPC, an alternative private system may be established pursuant to Section 4 to extend COBRA coverage under the terms of this section.

Section 6 of HEAL relates to "ERISA Preemption of State Mandated Health Benefits and Restrictive Managed Care Laws."

To allow group health plan providers to offer more affordable coverage and better target uninsured employers with "prototype" plans, the bill restores the ERISA preemption of state insurance laws which require that one or more specific benefits must be provided or made available by a contract or policy of health insurance issued to an ERISA employee benefit plan or which require that services rendered by one or more particular classes of health care providers must be covered under such a contract or policy.

In addition, state laws restricting "managed care" (such as in negotiating rates or restricting provider options, utilization review, etc.) would be "deemed" insurance laws preempted by ERISA.

Section 7 of HEAL provides "Encouragement of Multiple Employer Arrangements Providing Basic Health Benefits."

To encourage the Cleveland-based "COSE-like" affordable insurance for small businesses a tax "carrot" is offered to multiple employer welfare arrangements providing basic health benefits coverage. The restrictions on the "business commonality" and "geographic" tests under section 501(C)(9) of the Internal Revenue Code (allowing tax-exempt VEBA trusts to be established) are removed for MEWA's if (1) they provide Group Basic Health Benefits, (2) they provide participating employers with SPD's and other information to meet ERISA reporting requirements, and (3) they are fully insured or, if not, they meet state law requirements as to funding and solvency standards. In addition, to restore accountability to all healthcare MEWA's under ERISA, such arrangements would be required to file annual reports to the Federal government and the states in which they do substantial business.

Section 8 of HEAL expands on the "Treatment Practice Guidelines and Outcomes Research" recently enacted under the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989 to make such provisions applicable for all Americans living in both rural and urban areas. The purpose of the recodified Agency for Health Care Policy and Research is to enhance the quality, appropriateness, and effectiveness of health care services for all Americans, and access to such services, through the promotion of improvements in clinical practice and in the organization, financing, and delivery of health care services.

For the purpose of promoting the quality, appropriateness, and effectiveness of health care, the Agency is to arrange for the development of clinically relevant guidelines that may be used by physicians, educators, and health care practitioners to assist in determining how diseases, disorders, and other health conditions can most effectively and appropriately be prevented, diagnosed, treated, and managed clinically; and standards of quality, performance measures, and medical review criteria through which health care providers and other appropriate entities may assess or review the provision of health care and assure the quality of such care.

The bill requires the newly established Federal Advisory Council on Health Care Coverage and Costs to undertake a study of the manner in which these practice guidelines may be used in reducing medical malpractice costs. The council is to submit the results of such study together with any recommendations to the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Section 9 of HEAL establishes a "Federal Advisory Council on Health Care Coverage and Costs" for the purpose of reviewing, overseeing, and making recommendations relating to the implementation of the provisions of this Act and studying the causes of changes in the costs of health care coverage and delivery.

Section 10 of HEAL provides for the "Deduction of 100% for Self-Employed Basic Group Health Plans." While the recently enacted budget reconciliation bill extended the 25% tax deduction for one more fiscal year, the bill would provide for a deduction of 100% and make it permanent for plans established by the self-employed for themselves and their employees.

Section 11 of HEAL provides for "Effective Dates".

The amendments made by section 3 shall take effect January 1, 1993 and those found in section 5 shall apply with respect to plan years beginning on or after such date.

The provisions of section 4 shall take effect on the date of enactment.

The amendments made by section 6(b) shall take effect January 1, 1991. The amendments made by section 6(a) shall take effect January 1, 1991, except that with respect to plans in effect on the date of the enactment of HEAL, such amendments shall take effect on the effective date of section 3.

The amendments made by section 7(a) shall apply with respect to determinations made on or after January 1, 1991. The amendment made by section 7(b) shall apply to plan years beginning on or after January 1, 1991.

The amendments made by section 8 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of HEAL.

The provisions of section 9 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of HEAL.

The amendments made by section 10 shall apply with respect to taxable years beginning on or after January 1, 1991.

HARDEN AND WEAVER CELEBRATE 30 YEARS ON WMAL

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include therein extraneous material.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, in this town where tenure is marked by 2's in the House of Representatives, 4's in the White House, and 6's in the Senate, for anyone to survive for 30 years is quite an accomplishment.

But there's one Washington institution which has been on the scene since March 7, 1960, and continues to thrive. That's the broadcast team of Frank Harden and Jackson Weaver who will mark the 30th year of their top-rated morning radio show on WMAL–AM 630 in Washington, DC, with a live broadcast celebration from the Kennedy Center next Wednesday, March 7.

Frank and Jack have been the wake-up voice to three generations of Washington area residents and to eight Presidents. They have a unique appeal that has made them legends in the radio business. On their silver anniversary in 1985, they became the longest running two-man program in the history of radio.

Harden and Weaver could very well be our "U.S. Ambassadors of Humor and Goodwill." They start our day off with all the important things we need—the news, time, weather, and traffic conditions. But in a town that tends to take itself a bit too seriously, the most important ingredient they share is humor. They help us laugh at ourselves and ease us into what can become the frenzied pace of the Washington workday.

But their quips and ad-libs are just part of what makes them special. Their community involvement is without equal. Their promotions for local and national charities—with over $6 million raised for Children's Hospital National Medical Center perhaps their greatest success—the thousands upon thousands of announcements and personal appearances they have made for community, civic and church events, and all the thoughtful personal wishes they have given to their faithful listeners have linked the Washington metropolitan area and shown us that even in a power center like Washington, neighbors can reach out to neighbors.

Thank you Frank and Jack for 30 great years. And we expect you two to be around to keep us smiling and launch our mornings for many years to come.

WMAL,
January 23, 1990.

Rep. FRANK R. WOLF,
Cannon Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WOLF: You are most cordially invited to be our guest on Wednesday, March 7th, in the Grand Foyer of the Kennedy Center from 6 to 10 a.m., to help celebrate one of the most remarkable anniversaries in broadcasting history—the 30th Anniversary of the Harden & Weaver Show on WMAL Radio.

Since March 7, 1960, Frank Harden and Jackson Weaver have been the wake-up voice to three generations of Washington area residents, and to eight Presidents! For 30 years they have brought special meaning to the words "community involvement" by making personal appearances and special announcements on behalf of literally thousands of local and national charities and service organizations. More than twenty years ago, they "adopted" Children's Hospital, and have collected over 6 million dollars in donations.

Our celebration, broadcast live from the Kennedy Center, will highlight some of their remarkable accomplishments, and we'd like very much to have you be part of it. If you can attend, please let us know what time would be most convenient, and we'll help make the necessary arrangements. If you cannot be there in person, we would appreciate a live message from you for Harden & Weaver, either by telephone during the celebration broadcast, or one that we may pre-record prior to March 7, by telephone or wherever it's most convenient for you.

Bill Madden, Harden & Weaver's producer, will be in touch with your office in the near future to answer any questions and to work out details. Or you can call him directly if you like, at 686-3181.

We look forward to seeing you, or hearing from you, for what promises to be the Anniversary Celebration of the Year!

Sincerely,

Tom Bresnahan.

ON AIR: HARDEN & WEAVER, 30 YEARS

(By Carol A. Rolle)

Good Morning! Harden & Weaver here. The time is now 6 A.M." If we counted the number of ears that hear those words everyday it would probably come to over 200,000. And we've heard those words for 30 years.

Frank & Jack will celebrate 30 years as WMAL's morning team in March of this year. Thank goodness they have no thoughts of retiring! What would we do? How would we wake up—How would we drive to work? They give us the correct time, the weather, the traffic conditions, the news and belly laughs all the things necessary to start our day off on the right foot.

The humor part just flows. We conducted our interview for this article as our photographer Larry Chapman snapped pictures. "Its hard to get a good picture of a guy with two bad sides," quipped Frank. Asked if they nap during the day since they get up at 4:00 A.M. (Jackson) and 4:30 A.M. (Frank), "No way" came the answer. "The only naps we take are at long traffic lights."

Their community involvement is legendary. It is easier to count the local charities they haven't helped than it is to identify those who have benefitted from a Harden & Weaver appearance or an on-air plug. Their most notable success is Washington's Children's Hospital National Medical Center. They have raised more than $5 million in contributions for the center.

In earlier years they made several appearances almost every day. "If there was a gathering of three or more people, we were there. PTA meetings, social clubs, etc., all we needed was an invitation and we were there." It was a killer pace and now they are more selective. However, their schedules would still exhaust most people half their age.

One highlight that stands out in their memories is the time they traveled to London via new York to do a live show broadcast back to the U.S. The president of ABC radio, then owners of WMAL, hosted a star studded party for the pair at Studio 54. ABC reached even a larger audience that morning by running a full page ad in the New York Times to congratulate Frank & Jack on their success.

Speaking of success, Frank & Jack remember with some modesty that it came relatively easy. Their show was an instant success. They climbed to the top ratings within the first year and have continued at that lofty level ever since. They attribute this consistency to their genuine respect and appreciation for one another. This true feeling comes across in person as well as on the air.

The Harden & Weaver reach is far greater than the WMAL signal strength would demonstrate. They receive hundreds of letters from military and government families from around the world. These are people who enjoyed the show during their tours of duty here and continue to send in bits of information. Of course, Frank and Jack air that information which brings these people closer to their friends and relatives who have remained here. These same people rejoice upon their return to Washington to learn that Frank & Jack are still "on-the-air". It's as if they have been re-united with old friends.

Frank & Jackson reached a broadcast milestone on their 25th anniversary in 1985 when their WMAL show became the longest-running two-man program in the history of radio. They are legends. They have hosted WMAL's morning show throughout the terms of seven U.S. presidents, beginning with Dwight D. Eisenhower. On their 25th anniversary, President Reagan and Vice President Bush both sent congratulatory messages in tribute to the team.

Do they have fun at work? You bet they do! "In fact," they said, "there is no real need for us to retire. We're not doing anything now, so why retire to do nothing?" "I retired once for six weeks," said Jack "no one noticed so I decided to come back."

Fun outside of work is "not what it used to be." "Mother Nature and Father Time have taken their respective tolls," they joked. However, they still enjoy life to the fullest. Frank spends summer weekends at Dewey Beach, Delaware and Jackson spends time on his restored tugboat on the Chesapeake Bay. The boat is scheduled for the cover of Chesapeake Magazine in an upcoming issue.

How about exercise? People who eat kosher pickles, matzo ball soup, chocolate cake and drink champagne for breakfast don't think too much about it. This concoction was brought to the studio one morning by restauranteur Mel Krupin. Many studio guests bring sweets & goodies and Frank and Jack say they enjoy every mouthful.

There was only one time that they even considered leaving WMAL. They were invited by the management of WNEW in New York for an interview. It took place on the 65th floor of the RCA building. They were offered the morning show job right then and there. Of course, they would have to move to New York. They asked for "time to think it over," rode down the elevator, got in a cab, looked at each other and in unison shook their heads "no." They never spoke about it again. That was 20 years ago.

Frank began his radio career at WSAV in Savannah, Georgia, and continued it in Atlanta and Denver before joining WMAL's staff in 1947. He and his wife Berit live in Chevy Chase, Maryland. They have five children and five grandchildren. The oldest child is 45 and the youngest granchild is nine months.

Jackson began his broadcasting career in his hometown of Buffalo, New York at WGR Radio. He also worked at radio stations in Niagara Falls, New York, Youngstown, Ohio and Erie, Pennsylvania before his long career at WMAL began in 1943. And let's not forget he is the voice of Smokey the Bear! He resides in Silver Spring, Maryland with his wife Elsie. They have three children and three grandchildren. Their son Mark is a top newsman at WMAL.

Don't ever retire Frank & Jack. We love you and we need you! Thanks for 30 great years!!——

[From the Congressional Record, Mar. 5, 1985]

HARDEN AND WEAVER'S 25TH ANNIVERSARY ON WMAL RADIO

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, in a town where administrations change, Congressmen come and go and policies vary with politics, one institution remains unchanged. The Frank Harden and Jackson Weaver program of radio station WMAL-AM has been the top-rated Washington radio show in that time slot since Arbitron began surveying the market in 1965.

On Thursday, March 7, 1985, WMAL will celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Harden and Weaver morning team that has launched our mornings since 1960. I bring this occasion to the attention of my colleagues because these two good will ambassadors have set an example of community spirit and cooperation for the entire Nation to follow.

They are especially active in fund-raising for the Children's Hospital National Medical Center, bringing in more than $4 million in donations for that facility to date, with the proceeds from their annual golf tournament and other events. They have been recognized by countless civic and professional associations for their charity and community involvement, including the Washingtonian magazine which named them "Washingtonians of the Year" in 1975.

I can speak from personal experience of their help when the Claude Moore Colonial Farm at Turkey Run in McLean was faced with closing in 1981 due to budget cuts. Harden and Weaver helped me raise funds to keep the farm operating much to the delight and benefit of northern Virginia's citizens and schoolchildren. On behalf of northern Virginia, I want to say thank you, Harden and Weaver, for making our world a better place in which to live.

Frank Harden's engaging sense of humor and Jackson Weaver's legendary ad libs combine to produce a show that's as unpredictable as Washington's weather. But the Harden and Weaver show has a serious side as well, providing listeners with the news and information they need every day, from community bulletins to school closings.

The team of Harden and Weaver comes complete with a cast of imaginary characters like the senator, the lady with the high spirited voice, Dr. Thorndike Willoughby, Dr. Lucifer Headcold, Larry, the orchestra conductor, and Bosco Osgood, the roving reporter who is always in the wrong place at the right time. These people help us laugh at ourselves which is quite an accomplishment in a town that often takes itself a bit too seriously.

Although they weren't officially a team until 1960, Harden and Weaver have each worked at WMAL for more than 30 years. Jackson Weaver began his career at WMAL in 1943 after working for stations in Erie, Youngstown, Niagara Falls, and in his hometown of Buffalo. His fame extends beyond the Washington area, however, with his voice familiar to millions of Americans as that of the National Fire Prevention symbol, Smokey the Bear. Frank Harden has been a WMAL staff member since 1947. He is a native of Macon, GA, who worked at stations in Savannah, Atlanta, and Denver before making his home in Washington, DC.

Harden and Weaver were first approached by WMAL management to work as a team in 1950. Their "Frank and Jackson Show" began as a 45-minute afternoon program with a "Bob and Ray" flavor. Soon after their debut as a team, Harden and Weaver visited New York and convinced ABC to put their show on the broadcasting company's "Blue" network. Their show aired on the ABC Blue network for 15 minutes, three times a week until 1953.

Between 1953 and 1960, Harden and Weaver did not work together regularly as a team. Both men continued to work for the WMAL Radio/TV operation, and for ABC Radio. Frank Harden was an announcer for network radio shows, including "The Lone Ranger" and "The Edward PM Morgan Show." Jackson Weaver worked primarily as an on-camera television announcer during this period, and was best known for his appearances on "The Jimmy Dean Show" and "Ruth Crane/Modern Woman." Weaver also hosted his own nightly show. "Captain Jack's Weather and Fishing Report" on WMAL-TV.

In late 1959 when rumors of an impending vacancy in WMAL AM's morning schedule surfaced, Harden and Weaver made a pitch for the job. They convinced then station manager Fred Houwink to give them an audition. Harden and Weaver were selected over all other applicants and signed to a 13-week contract. Fortunately, for the Washington metropolitan area, those 13 weeks turned into 25 years of wit, information, and good will.

VACATION OF SPECIAL ORDER ON TODAY

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the 5-minute special order today reserved for Mr. PARRIS be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

A FURTHER REVIEW OF THE NICARAGUAN ELECTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, these truly are remarkable times we are living through. All we have to do to see that this is so is turn to page 18 of today's Washington Post newspaper on this last day of the month of February. Look at this headline on an article by one of the Post's foreign service reporters, David Remnick. He is in the Soviet Union, in Moscow, and his dateline is yesterday. The headline says: "Soviets Say Nicaragua Voted for 'Freedom' and Offer Military as Well as Economic Aid."

Well, their offer of military aid is a bit peculiar because their aid has been a large part of the problem. As many Members know, I was denied the right to go down to Nicaragua as an election observer. I was appointed as 1 of the 20 by President Bush, but we were all rejected. Some of us were able to get on other delegations, be it the Organization of American States, the United Nations delegation, or Jimmy Carter's delegation. But about eight of us were singled out for special treatment by the Communist government in Managua, which was just voted down and which will leave office at noon on April 25. They singled out eight of us and said, "You can't go under any circumstances."

I have been down there seven times. I have been up to Matagalpa, Leon, and Esteli. I know the countryside. I have been down to Grenada, then to Nadaime. I have been all over Managua and marched in parades. So I know the neighborhood pretty well.

Now, get this, opposite polarity of viewpoint by some of our House observers. This is from an observer on the Republican side, a conservative. I said to him, my friend from California, "Did you see during your poll-watching all day long that amounted to a true love for Daniel Ortega and the Sandinistas?" And then I interjected, probably rudely, and said, "Tell me the truth now. Did you see concern or a warm friendship for Daniel Ortega?"

His answer was one word: "Zero." And it came quickly—"Zero."

On this side, I was told by a Member who has postured himself as a moderate and has been all over this issue for the last 6 or 7 years, one way or the other, back and forth and back and forth, causing a lot of agony in this House: "We must respect Daniel Ortega," he said to me. "As you say, DORNAN, give the devil his due. Forty-one percent of the people really voted passionately for Daniel Ortega. He is a factor to be reckoned with, and with the fact that he has had this election at all, as he promised he would 6 years ago, he deserves our respect."

Now, let me say that I must question how deep the passion for Ortega runs when you have Air Force helicopters with the party symbol replacing the national symbol inside the insignia on the helicopter, leading parades. When you have a young person dragged off the perimeter of an UNO parade 2½ weeks ago and is later found murdered and tortured, his body lying in a ditch. Consider the intimidation of Sandinistas coming to rallies on trucks, and Hollywood people like Kris Kristofferson giving rock festival advice, and with Danny Ortega riding around on a big white horse with his white cowboy hat on trying to use every visual symbol to give the impression that he is one of the good guys. And then there is the absolute government intimidation of the turbas divinas, the divine mobs who are on the payroll to beat up people, including pregnant women.

We had three Congressmen and women, BARBARA VUCANOVICH, one Democrat whose name escapes me, and TOM DELAY of Houston, who witnessed the beating of women by these turbas divinas with clubs. Then we see the bureaucracy and their neighborhoods in Managua. These people are on the dole. They are the Central American equivalent of the nomenclatura which we have seen exposed, with their special privileges, in East Germany, in Hungary, and in Czechoslovakia. And we know how the military was told to vote. And remember, the military does not vote in El Salvador.

Let me repeat. Former Salvadoran President Duarte established that as policy, and President Cristiani has continued it. The military does not vote in El Salvador. In Nicaragua, however, they are all but ordered: "You had better vote for Danny."

The truth is that the only people who voted for Ortega were those people on the payroll and those people who were intimidated, terribly intimidated. If you take away the intimidation factor, he got about 30 percent or less, which is about all on the Sandinista payroll. And remember that Adolf Hitler got 34½ percent when he came to power.

I remember riding on a train once from Florence to Rome in 1966. I was talking to a gentleman at night by the window. He had a German accent, but spoke fluent English. I said, "Where did you learn to speak English?"

He said, "In Arizona."

"Arizona? When?"

"1944."

I said, "You were a POW?"

"Yes."

"When were you captured?"

"D-Day plus 19 days."

I said, "Tell me something I have always wanted to know. During the Claus von Stauffenberg plot, when the plotters came within a microsecond of killing Adolf Hitler on July 20, 1944, what was the reaction in the country?"

He said, "Let me go to confession to you."

He was going down with a German choral group to sing for the Pope.

He said, "I thought von Stauffenberg was a traitor."

So Hitler had 35- to 40-percent support in that country as late as 1944 when the war was winding down. I say, folks, Adolf Hitler probably could have gotten 30 percent in Nicaragua—the same 30 percent who voted willingly and passionately for Danny Ortega. Members have got to go down there and monitor what the New York Times calls this treacherous transition to freedom. The Soviets say that freedom won. They had communism a few days ago, and now they have freedom. What a great day.

IF THIS IS AN EDUCATION PRESIDENT, THEN THE BUDGET SHOULD BE AN EDUCATION BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, this morning we had representatives from the administration to discuss the funding for the education budget, the funding for the education programs of the education President, and these representatives came with the argument that there is no correlation of importance between the amount of money spent on education and the results that we are able to achieve in education. They come with this argument despite the fact that the Head Start Program, longitudinal studies of the Head Start Program, have demonstrated very clearly there is a great benefit in spending money for preschool education. Great results are achieved as a result of those expenditures. They come with that argument despite the fact that chapter one demonstrates that when money is spent on remedial education we get an impressive result with poor children, but they insist that we do not need to throw any money at education. Throwing money they consider an increase. If we increase the present Federal commitment from 6 percent to 7 percent, that would be throwing money at education. Actually that 6 percent represents a decrease in the last 8 years, from 8 percent down to 6 percent.

Mr. Speaker, throwing money at problems often does help solve problems. Spending more money is the pattern that this administration has demonstrated to us, and the previous administration showed that when they consider something really important, they will spend money. We consider our space program important, so we spend large amounts of money because John Kennedy decided to spend large amounts of money to put a man on the Moon, and we achieved that. We put a man on the moon. Our current space program has difficulties, but we do not spend less money. We spend more money as a result of those difficulties. We said we wanted star wars. We wanted a B–2 bomber. We want more aircraft carriers. We spend more money. We spend more and more money because we said defense was important.

So, we have been shown by this administration and the previous ones that, when they think something is important, they spend money. If they think education is important, they know they must spend money.

Our schools in this Nation face two problems, and one extreme is we have the very best schools in this Nation that will not measure up to the other schools in the industrialized, their counterparts in the industrialized world. Other nations produce better students. There are assessment studies which show that when we place our best math and science students against the best students in Korea, Japan, Germany and other countries, we rank very low among the industrialized nations, so our very best students, very best math and science students, are still not being adequately trained to keep up with the competition in this century. At the other extreme we have the very worst, large numbers of schools that are collapsing because the money is not there to really maintain an infrastructure. Just buildings, and equipment, and supplies and decent teachers every day is a basic problem.

To correct these two extremes we need to spend more money, but States and the localities have been taxed to the point where they can do no more. At the same time the Government, the Federal Government expenditure for education has gone down, we have had to go raise expenditure at the local and at the State level. Why not have the Federal Government deal with these two extremes by becoming more involved?

The one difference between our education system and the systems of the other industrialized nations whose students are being better prepared for the 20th century than ours is that the Government, the central government, has more involvement. Central government has more involvement. We do not want the central government, the Federal Government, to take over our schools, but there is a great difference between a takeover of the schools and more involvement. If our Government were to be involved by spending 25 percent of the total education budget, contribution to 25 percent instead of 6 percent, that would not be overinvolvement. That would not wipe out local control, and maybe our Government should be involved in 25 percent of the decisionmaking about education, about how our schools are going to be run, about some kind of national standards. Twenty-five percent of the decisionmaking about education would not be a takeover by the Federal Government. The other 75 percent is still there for the State Government and for the local government.

Mr. Speaker, we need to learn these lessons, and, as we move toward the year 2000, the President has set certain goals. I applaud him for the goals. I support those goals. But we are going to be No. 1, as the President said we should be. If we are going to be No. 1 in math and science, then we are going to have to spend money to reach that goal. We are going to have to buy the necessary equipment. We are going to have to guarantee that the local schools are relieved of the burden of some of the expenditures on capital items, and even we are going to have to promote the training of more and more teachers. We cannot accomplish what has to be accomplished in this century in education without spending more money. There may be no immediate correlation between the dollars that are put in, but let us stop and think about the tremendous problem we face if we do not expend the money.

Mr. Speaker, we must spend more if we are serious about education. If this is an education President, then the budget should be an education budget as well.

BIPARTISANSHIP IN CAMPAIGN REFORM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker and Members, I, like I think every Member of this body, Republican and Democrat alike, have been very pleased and very thankful that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], our Speaker, has brought back the bipartisan fairness and decorum to this body that we have witnessed over the past few months, and it is within that context that I have to express my surprise at the remarks he apparently made yesterday regarding campaign reform.

One of the top priority issues of this Congress and the two sessions of this Congress on a bipartisan basis was campaign reform. The other was obviously the ethics reform. As my colleagues may recall or not recall, then Speaker Jim Wright and the Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] reported a task force, bipartisan task force, on ethics reform and, similarly, a bipartisan task force on campaign reform, six Democrats, six Republicans. I happen to have been one of those Republicans honored by being named to the campaign task force.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in campaign reform. I believe in the need for campaign reform, and I absolutely believe in the need for bipartisan campaign reform.

Thirty-five percent of the American people believe in our electoral process today based on turnout, the smallest of any turnout of any democracy in the world, and, frankly, it is a disgrace when compared to the 90 percent that turned out in Nicaragua last Sunday, so I was very disappointed that yesterday the Speaker apparently said that we are probably going to bring to the floor a Democratic campaign reform proposal because the Republicans would not accept some kind of spending limits.

Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed in that for a couple of reasons. First, if I recall correctly, it is the Republican leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] who said that he would discuss the issue of spending limits. I have not seen a similar comment from our Democratic leadership in discussing the issue of reducing the role of PAC's, increasing the role of raising money from within our congressional district and reducing the role of soft money, all issues which happen to be priority issues in the eyes of Republicans for real campaign reform. Second, I was disappointed that that statement would come at a time when I understand we are about to have the Speaker, and the Republican leader and others try to get together to take campaign reform off dead center. Now, if we are really committed in these talks to a bipartisan campaign reform, then let us withhold these kinds of partisan charges. But third, and most important of all, I was disappointed because as a member of that campaign bipartisan task force we better meet if we are serious.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is the bipartisan campaign reform task force has not met since August 1 of last year. Now, if we are truly serious about efforts to come up with a bipartisan reform, the first thing we have to do is take the six Democrats and the six Republicans, get them back into the room, and close the door and say, "Work out a deal. Come up with a compromise that you all can defend that is in the interests of the American people, and in the absence of doing that come meet with us in the leadership, BOB MICHEL, TOM FOLEY, and work out that deal so that in 1990 and in 1992 America still does not talk about only 35 percent voter turnout, but rather we have the highest voter turnout as the father of democracy."

Mr. Speaker, there is a chance for bipartisanship in campaign reform. There is a real need, and I hope that the words of the Speaker yesterday do not represent a decision by the majority party in this Congress that bipartisanship and campaign reform is dead because, if that is dead, if that is dead, then it will be to the detriment of our Nation and our democracy.

FARMERS NEED JUSTICE IN WETLANDS MANAGEMENT POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to protect farmers. It would exempt wetland that has been used for agricultural production purposes from regulation, under section 404 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, of deposit dredged and fill material.

My mission here is to work for fair play for farmers.

Wise wetlands management is of vital importance to the Nation and to the future of all Americans. So, the cost should be borne by all Americans, not primarily by the Nation's farm families.

It has long been my view that actions needed to feed, house, and clothe the Nation's people and to protect and conserve our Nation's environment can be carried out in harmony.

I urge that the Congress give full and favorable consideration to my bill.

Due to the lack of clear, concise, and understandable answers to questions, there is tremendous confusion among farmers of the Nation—

About just what requires a section 404 permit and what does not;

About what is a "wetland" and what is not; and,

About what restrictions the Government can impose as conditions for granting a section 404 permit.

The "normal farming" exemption in section 404(f) would seem to cover any concerns the agriculture industry might have. But, in practice, interpretation of section 404(f) by the Federal agencies can be confusing and inconsistent.

Farmers deserve better from their Government.

The fifth amendment to the Constitution says that if a person's property is taken for public purpose, the property owner must receive just compensation for the property.

If the American people want the wetlands saved, then all the American people, not just farmers and their families, should pay the cost. That is not happening when farmers' actions are being regulated under section 404.

Farmers are angry at what is happening. They are afraid of what will happen given the history of the actions the Government has already taken. I share their concern.

I am also concerned about inaction by Government agencies in connection with another matter related to section 404.

For nearly 4 months I have been trying to get answers and data out of the Department of the Army, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of the Interior, and the Department of Agriculture.

In November, I sent letters to each one asking some very detailed questions. I am still waiting for the answers.

A prudent Government agency would have had answers to many of those questions. And, it would have been able to answer others because it was keeping track of what it is doing. Not even those questions have been answered.

When Government agencies are so slow to respond to legitimate inquiries from Members of Congress that ought to tell us something has gone very wrong.

I urge that Congress take every care to ensure that any changes to section 404 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act or any other existing law and any new law that is written will be carefully constructed to protect the rights of farmers and their families.

And, I urge that Congress ensure that the costs associated with restricting farmers' use of agricultural lands in the name of protecting the environment is borne by all beneficiaries, not just by farmers.

PROBLEMS FOR FARMERS

As a class, American farmers are the Nation's first conservationists. Farmers are conservationists because their livelihood demands that they care for the integrity of the land and water.

Farmers do not deserve to be treated as destroyers of the environment.

Farmers do not deserve to be—

Encouraged by Government officials to apply for section 404 permits when those same officials fail to tell the farmers what the hazards of such action are; or

Required to give the Government control over two, four, and even five times as much land as that involved in alterations aimed at improving farming efficiency on their land; or

Forced to spend tens of thousands of dollars defending themselves against after-the-fact Government penalties for actions they took with the approval and encouragement of that same government; or

Obliged to spend their life savings and all that they can borrow to defend themselves against Government charges that they acted wrongly when the farmers' actions were taken to protect their families and land from the damage flowing from governmental action.

These are just a few of the types of actions which have been reported to me in connection with the current implementation of section 404.

The effort to preserve harmony between man and the environment will be ill-served by unbalanced implementation of section 404, such as is now occurring in connection with farmers.

When farmers are expected to comply with a provision of law, they should be able to demand and receive unambiguous, clear, and concise answers to their questions about actions they may wish to take which would be regulated under section 404. The questions farmers are asking are many. However, for some of them the answers are confusing or nonexistent.

A sampling of farmers' questions includes the following:

Does excavating land to build catfish ponds require a permit?

Does building a reservoir to contain surface water for irrigation require a permit?

Does building a levee to hold water in a seasonally flooded rice field require a permit, particularly when that field has been used for rice production in previous years?

Does precision leveling of land that hasn't been a wet, wetland for years require a permit?

Is land that was once a swamp but which was drained for agricultural production decades ago a "jurisdictional wetland"?

Wetlands protection is important to us all. But, placing restrictions on the use of land that has been farmed for generations doesn't mean "no net loss" of wetlands. It means a net gain of wetlands at the expense of unwilling, uncompensated landowners. I think that is wrong.

BROADER QUESTIONS

The implementation of section 404, particularly as it is being carried out now, has some very broad implications for the Nation.

Some of these implications include:

Revenue losses for the Federal Treasury, which will exacerbate the budget deficit;

Losses of agricultural export trade sales, which will aggravate the U.S. international balance of trade deficit troubles;

Potential increase in loan defaults which will further undermine the stability of private sector and Government sector financial organizations; and Erosion of established administrative policies and practices governing implementation of Federal laws.

All of these issues were covered in the questions which I directed to the Department of the Army, the Interior and Agriculture, and the Environmental Protection Agency.

I also asked for information on Federal Government programs, activities, and projects affected by the implementation of Federal "wetlands" policy; and on specific restrictions imposed on farmers as a part of the implementation of Federal "wetlands" policy.

In my letters to these Government departments and EPA, I specifically requested that the responses to my separate questions be provided as they were prepared, rather than waiting until responses to all of the questions were prepared.

CONCLUSION

It is time to put reason, justice, and equity for farmers into the enforcement of section 404.

H.R. 4133

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Agricultural Wetlands Exemption Act."

SEC. 2. AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT.

Section 404 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended (33 U.S.C. 1344), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following subsection:

"(u)(1) This section shall not apply to the discharge of dredged or fill material into any wetland:

"(A) which was used for agricultural production on any calendar date during the twenty-four months prior to the date of enactment of this subsection; and,

"(B) which was used for agricultural production for at least one year in the period between January 1, 1972 and the date of enactment of this subsection so long as such land shall be used for agricultural production.

"(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'agricultural production' shall include, but not be limited to, production of row crops; horticulture; vinticulture; silviculture; aquaculture; mariculture; grazing, haying; apiculture; hydroponics; production of tree fruits or nuts; raising of cattle, horses, poultry, swine, sheep, goats and other livestock; storage of surface water for agricultural production; distribution of water for agricultural production; conserving uses required as a condition of enrollment in an acreage reduction program administered by the Secretary of Agriculture under the Agricultural Act of 1949 or any amendments thereto; all other activities identified in Sec. 404(f)(1) of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (33 U.S.C. 1344) as of July 31, 1989 and the construction, expansion, improvement, maintenance and operation of farm residences and facilities."

NEW FREEDOM AND OPPORTUNITY IN LITHUANIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SARPALIUS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, at the turn of the century my ancestors left the country of Lithuania and came to this country seeking freedom and opportunity. This past week I had the opportunity to return to the country of Lithuania and watched them observe the final days of their election in their quest for freedom. Myself and three of our colleagues had that goal of going to Lithuania to watch the first elections ever held within the Communist Party where two parties were involved, one the Communist Party and the second was the Sajudis Party, a party that was put together in the quest for independence for the country of Lithuania, a small country.

We were denied that right to go into that country by the Soviets. My colleagues and I spent 5 days in a hotel in Berlin trying to get visas granted so we could go and observe and watch those elections.

We found it puzzling that at the same time the Soviets had granted visas to our Canadian friends, our friends from Austria, and other media throughout the world to witness these first elections that were held. My colleagues and I tried very desperately to be there at the time of the elections, but we hit a wall.

It was interesting that while in Berlin we were able to talk to people about the unification of Germany. We went to the Berlin Wall and saw that wall gradually come down. I brought with me a piece of that wall that once symbolized where the Communist Party was holding people in to believe in their form of government, but now it symbolizes freedom and the people of East Berlin now have the opportunity to obtain the opportunities and freedoms that we enjoy.

We were finally granted a visa to come to Lithuania. We were only there for 18 hours, but, oh, what an experience, what an experience to see the excitement in those people to be able to seek freedom and independence.

You see, at the end of World War II the Soviets had taken that country and had taken all their educated leaders, all of their teachers, they had taken close to one-third of the population of the country of Lithuania and executed them.

We heard of one case where 350,000 were sent up north and were forced to starve to death.

We saw a church, a Catholic church, where they took the bishop and imprisoned him for 27 years. They took that church and turned it into a symbol of atheism. Now the Lithuanians took the church and removed all the articles of atheism from that church and brought in the paintings, the statues and the alter, and turned the church back into a religious Catholic church. The cardinal was released from prison and is a symbol in that country.

You could see the enthusiasm among the Lithuanians on the right to be able to worship their God, to be able to have an election and choose their leaders, to have the opportunity to get up and speak and to say whatever they wanted to say. Oh, what a spark it put into our hearts to see that enthusiasm for democracy and for independence.

But the battle has only begin. The Soviets are now turning down any requests for visas for any Member of Congress to come and witness any other elections.

We saw history being made. We saw the beginning of the end of the Communist Party as we know it.

I encourage my colleagues to look at what is happening in Lithuania, to look at it with enthusiasm, to look at it with hope, look at the dreams they have of becoming an independent country and get behind their motives, get behind their dream, get behind their vision of being able to give to their children the same opportunities that we have been able to enjoy in this country.

We will see in the next few weeks a ripple occurring throughout the Communist Party. We will see elections in Estonia, Latvia, and other states within the country of the Communist Party. We will see a cry for democracy and we will witness the fall of the Communist Party.

I encourage my colleagues to do whatever you can to encourage support and enthusiasm for those people who are still struggling for freedom and independence as we know it.

AMERICA'S GRASSROOTS—THE NEW TARGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, over the last 2 years I have read chapters from a book, "The Japanese Conspiracy," by Marvin Wolf. That book, which was published in 1983, details how various segments of American industry have been targeted by the Japanese Government.

In fact, the book is such a hot item in Congress that a committee staffer told me they were unable to keep it from the library for more than 2 or 3 days because it was in such demand. I am pleased with that. We all need to know the kind of economic battle this country is in—this battle includes our businesses, our organizations, and the very fiber of America—our grassroots volunteers.

I was thinking about the targeting of our industries and all the criticisms by the Japanese about the alleged shortcomings of the American people when I read an article in the February 18, Washington Post titled "Nation's Capital in Eclipse As Pride and Power Slip Away."

That article quoted Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., a well-known historian, as saying that power was slipping away from Washington—and that means the American people—principally for two reasons.

One, "The age of the superpowers has come to an end" and two, "despite our wealth, we represent ourselves as poor, or refuse to mobilize our resources, so we circumscribe ourselves."

The article quoted my colleague SILVIO O. CONTE: "We're carrying this huge deficit, and we've become the world's debtor, and that means we've lost control of our own destiny."

I don't think so. We can regain our destiny. It is wrapped up in the American people and our wonderful political system. We are a Nation of volunteers and have an organization for everything where American citizens work out their goals and express a direction for business, for music, art, politics, and education. We have volunteer fire departments, rescue units—volunteer everything.

We are a friendly, outgoing, and helpful people. Sixty Minutes recently interviewed young Russian lawyers in the United States about what stood out to them about America. Each one replied, we were friendly, just smiling and encouraging one another and we were so free.

That freedom, friendliness, openness, and politeness has been generated by the spirit of volunteerism in this country. We won our freedom with a volunteer army and we have kept it with our political system and volunteerism.

Now, that is beginning to change. A foreign government wants to use it for its national economic gains. We are now seeing the reverse of the "Ugly American" who did not observe the customs of the country where he served, throwing his weight around loudly proclaiming what needed to be changed so a foreign country could be like us.

That book so captured our imaginations that we would admonish one another "Don't be an ugly American." Now we are seeing the reverse of that imported to the United States from other countries. It takes many forms.
